START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

MARCH 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-017

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 17

Volume 35-36

BSO-POPS
1916-1917 to BSO-POPS
1917-1918

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 35

BSO
Pops

1916 - 1917

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

HILL SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
8 MILK ST.
BOSTON

EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 7, 1916

NEW SYMPHONY POPS GET THEIR STRIDE

Boston has taken most kindly to the New Pops and Operativ Concerts which are enjoying a brief season of three weeks in Symphony Hall. It seems to be the general opinion that the orchestra has never played witr so much spirit as it does under Mr. Pasternack, and the three singers have given complete satisfaction.

The program for tonight is as follows:—

March, "The Cadets".....Sousa
Overture, "Masaniello" .....Auber
Waltz, "1001 Nights".....Strauss
Selection, "Robin Hood".....de Koven
a. Aria, "Vissi d' Arte" from "Tosca" Puccini
b. Aria, "Ritorna Vincitor" from "Aida" Verdi Miss Dor Gibson
a. Aria, "Madamina" from "Don Giovanni" Mozart
b. Toreador's Song from "Carmen"....Bizet
Constantine Nicolay
a. Benediction from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
b. Aria, "Mon coeur s'oevre a ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Miss Lillia Snelling
The Star Spangled Banner
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Suite, "Scenes Pittoresques".....Massenet
a. Menuet .....Bolzoni
b. Salut d'Amour .....Elgar
Marche aux flambeaux .....Meyerbeer

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 7, 1916

Here in Boston

At the third of the New Pops at Symphony Hall, this evening, the three singers will repeat the numbers that they sang on Tuesday, and Mr. Pasternack and the orchestra will be heard in various spirited pieces, viz:

March, "The Cadets".....Sousa
Overture, "Masaniello" .....Auber
Waltz, "One Thousand and One Nights".Strauss
Selection, "Robin Hood".....de Koven
Aria, "Vissi d'Arte" from "Tosca".....Puccini
Aria, "Ritorna Vincitor" from "Aida"....Verdi
Miss Gibson.
Aria, "Madamina" from "Don Giovanni" Mozart
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Nicolay.
Benediction from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Aria, "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Miss Snelling.
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Suite, "Scènes Pittoresques".....Massenet
Menuet.....Bolzoni
Salut d'Amour.....Elgar
Marche aux flambeaux.....Meyerbeer

Dr. Muck has already decided upon three novel pieces for the new series of Symphony Concerts—Sibelius's tone-poem, "Daughters of Ocean," as yet unheard in Boston; Chausson's romantic symphony, overlooked these many years on the shelf of the library where it has lain since Mr. Gericke's day; and Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche," which has not yet been illusively played in Boston.

Miss Myrna Sharlow, whose young abilities in song pleased in the final days of the Boston Opera Company and who has since ripened them, will return hither to sing next week at the New Pop concerts.

BOSTON HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916.

"CARMEN" NIGHT GIVEN AT THE POP CONCERTS

Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett Heard in Scenes from Opera.

The program of the Pop concert at Symphony Hall last evening was as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture, "Si j'etais roi".....Adam
Page's Song from "Les Huguenots...Meyerbeer
Miss Snelling.
Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
Scenes from Bizet's "Carmen."
Miss Myrna Sharlow, soprano.
Arthur Hackett, tenor.
(Their first appearance.)
Preludes to Acts II., III. and IV.
Micaela's Air, Act III.
Miss Sharlow.
Duet of Micaela and Don Jose, Act. I.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
Flower Song, Act II.
Mr. Hackett.
Prelude to Act I.
The Star Spangled Banner.
Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana".Mascagni
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Miss Myrna Sharlow, Miss Lillia Snelling, Arthur Hackett, Constantin Nicolay.
March, "The Ameer".....Herbert

Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett made their first appearance at these concerts on the occasion of "Carmen" night, last evening.

The second part of the program was devoted to excerpts from Bizet's popular opera. Miss Sharlow, remembered here as one of the younger members of the Boston Opera Company, is now a soprano of the Chicago Opera Company. She has made marked progress. Her voice has youthful freshness, while she sings both with spontaneity and a fitting sense of reserve. Mr. Hackett, also known in Boston, has a manly voice which is skilfully controlled. He gave an excellent performance of the "Flower Song," and in the duet his voice and Miss Sharlow's were sympathetically blended.

Miss Snelling, too, was heard in the Page's song from Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," while the quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto" was a feature of the third part of the program.

Mr. Pasternack conducted with his customary spirit, intelligence and discretion.

Another program of interest has been arranged for the Pop Concert tonight. This will be devoted largely to excerpts from Gounod's "Faust." A considerable part of it will be taken from the second act. In addition to this Mr. Nicolay will sing the Serenade from act 3, and the closing trio will be sung. Mr. Hackett, Miss Sharlow, Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay are all on the program, which will be in full as follows:

March, "Old Berlin".....Bion
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust"—
Prelude to Act I.
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling.
(a) King of Thule, (b) Jewel Song, from Act II
Miss Sharlow.
Mephisto's Serenade, Act III.
Mr. Nicolay.
Love Scene, Act II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust" (Last act).....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay.
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

BOSTON HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 14, 1916.

SINGERS ARE FEATURES OF 'POP' CONCERT

Sharlow, Snelling, Hackett and Nicolay Please in Excerpts from Gounod's "Faust"—Pasternack Conducts with Warmth—Is Especially Delicate in Solo Numbers.

Last evening was "Faust" night at the Pops. There was a varied program, the principal features being excerpts from Gounod's opera. The soloists were Myrna Sharlow, soprano; Lillia Snelling, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; and Constantin Nicolay, basso.

All of the singers gave pleasure. Mr. Nicolay was especially good in his interpretation of Mephisto's serenade. A song that lends itself more particularly to the surroundings of the opera, its sinister significance is often lost on the concert stage. But Mr. Nicolay was in the mood, and he sang as if on brimstone corner.

Pasternack Conducts.

Mr. Pasternack conducted with warmth and authority. There was a careful regard for nuances and his delicate touch was always in evidence during the solo numbers.

Tonight will be the second "Carmen" night, with the same soloists as last evening. The program will be as follows:

March, "Baden-Baden".....Kral
Overture, "Orphee aux Enfers"..Offenbach
Page's Song from "Les Huguenots"....
Meyerbeer
Miss Lillia Snelling.
Selection, "It Happened in Noordland"
Herbert
Scenes from Bizet's "Carmen."
Miss Myrna Sharlow, Soprano.
Mr. Arthur Hackett, Tenor.
Preludes to Acts II., III. and IV.
Macaela's Air, Act III.
Miss Sharlow.
Duet of Micaela and Don Jose, Act I.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
Flower Song, Act. II.
Mr. Hackett.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 6, 1916.

NEW SCHEME FOR FALL POPS MAKES BIG HIT

The supplementary season of Pops opened in Symphony Hall last night most auspiciously. The novelty of fall Pops appealed. There was also a desire to see what a real orchestral conductor would accomplish. Thirdly, there was the opportunity of enjoying vocal music with the regular orchestral program. The success of the start of this three weeks' extra season and the manifest eagerness for just what was provided would seem to indicate fall Pops have come to stay.

Josef Pasternack was tht conductor. The singers were Miss Dora Gibson, soprano; miss Lillie Snelling, contralto, and Constantin Nicolay, bass. The program is to be changed each night. Mr. Pasternack's leading of the 55 Symphony players was the feature of the evening and easily the biggest factor in the success of the concert.

This evening Dora Gibson, soprano; Lillia Snelling, contralto, and Constantin Nicolay will again be the soloists, each singing twice in the second part, while there will be a complete change of program as follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba".....
Gounod
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Puppenfee".....Bayer
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
(a) "Voi Lo Sappette, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
(b) "Pleurez, Pleurez, Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Dora Gibson.
(a) "Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
(b) Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
(a) "Connais-tu Le Pays," from "Mignon".....Thomas
(b) "Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu
(a) Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
(b) Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Rhapsodi, "Espana".....Chabrier

SOPRANO SOLOIST FOR FALL POPS

Miss Dora Gibson.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 9, 1916

PROSPERING POPS

The New Concerts at Symphony Hall Well Received—Miss Sharlow to Be Heard Next Week and Evenings of "Carmen" and of "Faust"

A READILY quickened public has discovered the New Pop Concerts, sought them out and approved them. It has heaped deserved applause upon the new conductor, Mr. Pasternack, for the songful fervor, the rhythmic bite, the forceful contrasts, the dramatizing warmth and the projecting vigor that he draws from the responsive band, according as the chosen piece is operatic fragment, Viennese waltz, favorite overture, lively march or passing tonal diversion. No conductor at The Pops these many years has struck such fire with band, music and audience. Similarly, the allotting of three-quarters of an hour of the concert to capable operatic singers in familiar excerpts from standard pieces has given hardly less pleasure. In a week the experiment of September Pops has justified itself, while two weeks remain in which to set the concerts among the annual customs of the town. For the programmes in immediate prospect, Mr. Pasternack will give a considerable part of the concert of next Tuesday evening to fragments of "Carmen" for the orchestra or for singers with orchestra, while on Wednesday he will do likewise by "Faust" for another favorite opera. On Tuesday, also, Miss Myrna Sharlow, now an advancing singer and a member of Mr. Campanini's company, will be heard with the pleasant memories of her earliest days at the Boston Opera House to precede her. For this, Saturday evening, the programme, abounding in Mr. Herbert's music, goes:

March, "Hands Across the Sea".....Sousa
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
Ballet Music from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Aria, "Vissi d'Arte" from "Tosca".....Puccini
Aria, "Ritorna Vincitor" from "Aida"....Verdi
Miss Gibson.
Aria, "Madamina" from "Don Giovanni" Mozart
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Nicolay.
Benediction from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Aria, "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saëns
(Solo Violin, Mr. Theodorowicz.)
Yestertioughts.—Punchinello .....Herbert
Overture, "Der Fledermaus".....Strauss

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 8, 1916.

"POPS" AT SYMPHONY HALL

The program for the Pop concert at Symphony Hall this evening will be as follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Martha".....Flotow
Waltz, "Luna".....Lincke
Ballet Suits, "Sylvia".....Delibes
(a) Prelude—Les Chasseresses.
(b) Intermezzo et valse lente. (c) Pizzicati.
(d) Cortege de Bacchus.
(a) "Voi Lo Sappete, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
(b) "Pleurez, Pleurez Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Dora Gibson.
(a) "Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
(b) Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
(a) "Connais-tu le Pays," from "Mignon"
.....Thomas
(b) "Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Waltz, "Emperor".....Strauss
(a) Adagio Pathetique.....Godard
(b) Prelude .....Jaernfelt
Selections, "Babes in Toyland".....Herbert
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916

PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Another program of very great interest has been arranged for the new Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. This will be devoted largely to excerpts from Gounod's "Faust," one of the most popular and beautiful works in the repertoire. A considerable part of it will be taken from the second act. And, in addition to this, Mr. Nicolay will sing the Seranade from Act 3, and the closing trio will be sung. Mr. Hackett, Miss Sharlow, Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay are all on the program.

The program in full is as follows:—

March, "Old Berlin".....Bion
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust"
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling
a. King of Thule (from Act II.)
b. Jewel Song (from Act II.)
Miss Sharlow
Mephisto's Serenade, Act III.
Mr. Nicolay
Love Scene, Act II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett
The Star Spangled Banner.
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust," Last Act.....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 8, 1916

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Common Sense from the Trenches—Lehmann at Sixty-Seven—Mr. Powell's New Sonata

TWO waltzes and a suite of ballet airs for the music of the dance in which Mr. Pasternack excels stand on the programme for the New Pop Concert this evening at Symphony Hall, along with six operatic pieces for the singers. The list goes:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Martha".....Flotow
Waltz, "Luna".....Lincke
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
"Voi lo sappete, O mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
"Pleurez, pleurez mes yeux" from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Gibson.
"Non piu andrai" from "Figaro's Wedding".....Mozart Ballad, "The Calf of Gold" from "Faust"
Gounod
Mr. Nicolay.
"Connais-tu le pays" from "Mignon"...Thomas
"Habañera" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Snelling.
Waltz, "Emperor".....Strauss
Adagio Pathétique .....Godard
Prelude .....Jaernfelt
Selections, "Babes in Toyland".....Herbert
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppé

The new version of "Salome" that Strauss, by report, prepared for the Court Opera at Dresden, appeared in actual performance to be no more than a lowering of the music of Herodias's daughter so that it might fall within the compass of Mme. von der Osten's mezzo-soprano voice and an occasional lightening and clarifying of the orchestral part. As some say in Germany, Mme. Farrar may now sing the music—if and when she chooses.

Into the intermittent, over-prolonged and sometimes rather silly discussion in the Parisian newspapers about the proper disposition of the French toward German music in concert-hall and opera house, a "trooper in the trenches," as he signs himself, has projected this shaft of common sense: "Let the sacred union of the country be maintained and strengthened up to the day of victory, but for Heaven's sake after the war let everyone be free to like whatever he thinks likable. If all Frenchmen took to liking and hating in a mass the same things they would cease to be Frenchmen. It would be a great pity and a great bore, too."

Mr. Powell, the pianist, who began to make his way in Boston last season in the ears of an interested and discriminating

[2]

BOSTON JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916

"CARMEN" NIGHT BIG SUCCESS AT NEW POPS

Myrna Sharlow and Arthur Hackett Make Brilliant Debut as Pop Soloists—May Naudain Now Vaudeville Star—Other Theatrical Items.

By E. F. Harkins

New Pops! Nonpareil Pops!

The golden opinion won from a surprised and thoroughly delighted audience last week when the new Pops and operatic concerts began at Symphony Hall could hardly be improved upon, and yet it seemed last night that the Pops reached the very acme of their brilliancy.

A big factor in this triumphant innovation is the operatic music. Last night was called "Carmen" night. Excerpts from the popular Bizet opera occupied the whole middle section of the program. Myrna Sharlow, whose beautiful soprano voice blossomed forth a few years ago at the Boston Opera House, and Arthur Hackett, a Boston tenor, made their first appearance as Pop soloists and were most enthusiastically welcomed. Miss Sharlow sang Micaela's third-act song, and Mr. Hackett the famous "Flower Song," and they were also heard in the duet allotted to Micaela and Don Jose in the first act of the opera. Their singing was excellent.

The quite matchless Pop orchestra, conducted by Josef Pasternack, performed the "Carmen" preludes capitally. Mr. Pasternack is now generally hailed as the ablest conductor in the history of these concerts. However, he owes much to the exceptionally fine caliber of this band of symphony men, many of whom are virtuosi of more than local renown.

Nor were the operatic numbers limited to "Carmen." Miss Snelling, an unusually gifted contralto, sang the page's florid song from "The Huguenots," and, to cap all this, there was a rousing performance of the immortal quartet from "Rigoletto," with Mr. Nicolay as the basso. The other numbers on the program were likewise performed in a manner that sustained the enthusiasm of the audience from first to last. The hall was crowded, for these new Pops are truly the talk of the town.

Tonight will be "Faust" night. The program follows:

March, "Old Berlin".....Blon
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust":
Prelude to Act. I.
Siebel's Flower Song, Act. II.
Miss Snelling.
a. King of Thule, from Act. II.
b. Jewel Song, from Act. II.
Miss Sharlow.
Mephisto's Serenade, Act. III.
Mr. Nicolay.
Love Scene, Act. II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust," Last Act.....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay.
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

May Naudain Again

May Naudain is making her first appearance here in vaudeville as one of several headline attractions on a de luxe bill being presented at B. F. Keith's. Yes, the same Miss Naudain, exactly; the sparkling prima donna of bygone "Little Cherub" and "Girls of Gottenburg" days.

And thereby hangs a tale.

You remember the very pleasing impression Miss Naudain used to make in musical comedy with her velvety voice and her sort of June rose personality? Well, she is just the same this week as she sings Anatol Friedland's songs at Keith's, with the composer accompanying her; but it was this tempting engagement that took her away from her favorite field of musical comedy.

It happened while she was singing in "Katinka" in New York last season. Katinka was her first role in light opera or musical comedy since the retirement—marital, of course—that caused her several years' absence from the stage. She was very happy in "Katinka," she says, and she is big enough to say that she thinks Audrey Maple is singing her old part beautifully at the Shubert Theatre; but the vaudeville opportunity was quite irresistible.

Vaudeville pays enormously well, and,

BOSTON JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 9, 1916.

NEW POP CONDUCTOR AND SOLOIST

MYRNA SHARLOW — JOSEF PASTERNACK

Journal
Sept. 9, 1916.

POP CONCERTS, WITH SINGERS, A BIG SUCCESS

Josef Pasternack, the Conductor, Finds Favor—Miss Sharlow to Sing.

The new Pops and operatic concerts, which began a three-weeks' run at Symphony Hall last Tuesday night, are a most emphatic success. Nothing that Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has ever attempted in Boston has so immediately won the complete favor of the public.

The success of these new concerts proves what has been a long time suspected, that Boston welcomes Pop concerts for a few wteks in September. The innovation of vocal music has been most warmly commended, and the singers engaged have shown themselves to be of unusual quality.

The most significant feature of the season, however, seems to be the success of the conductor, Josef Pasternack. Mr. Pasternack has shown himself in the concerts of the past week to be much more than a conductor of routine accomplishments. He takes as much pains with a simple march as he does with a more pretentious suite. His Vienna waltzes are remarkable because of the rhythm he gives them while his accomplishments in the operatic selections sung by the vocalists show what a thorough training he has had in this department.

Monday night will witness the last apparance of Miss Gibson, the soprano. The other soloists will be Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay.

Tuesday night a considerable part of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Bizert's "Carmen." Some of the principal airs will be sung, while the orchestra will play selections from the opera. In addition, there will be unusual miscellaneous works for the orchestra in the first and third parts.

On Tuesday Myrna Sharlow, soprano, will make her first appearance. Miss Sharlow is now one of the lyric sopranos of the Chicago Opera Company, but it was as a member of the former Boston Opera Company that she became noted. Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay will be on the program with her.

On Wednesday night Mr. Pasternack will devote a considerable part of the program to excerpts from Gounod's "Faust."

The program for tonight follows:

March, "Hands Across the Sea".....Sousa
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
Ballet Music from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Aria, "Vissi d' Arte," from "Tosca"..Puccini
Aria," "Ritorna Vincitor," from "Aida".Verdi
Miss Gibson
Aria, "Madamina," from "Don Giovanni"...
.....Mozart
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Nicolay.
Benediction from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Miss Snelling
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Solo Violin, Mr. Theodorowicz.
Yesterthoughts, Punchinello.....Herbert
Overture, "Der Fledermaus".....Strauss

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916.

NEW SOLOISTS POPULAR AT POP CONCERT

The second week of the New Pops began last night with two new soloists, Myrna Sharlow, soprano, and Arthur Hackett, tenor. There was also a noticeable addition to the number of vocal selections, a duet and quartet being added to the usual numbers. It was a big night both in point of attendance and enthusiasm. The audience could not begin to get its fill, even with several encores in addition to the 12 numbers on the program.

First honors were about equally divided between Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett and the "Cavalleria" selection. Miss Sharlow, a promising singer in her Boston Opera House days, shows exceptional progress. Mr. Hackett is one of the most satisfactory tenors of the day. Mr. Pasternack strengthened first opinion of being far and away the best leader the Pops have had in years.

Tonight's program will be:

March, "Old Berlin".....Blon
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust"—
Prelude to Act I.
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling.
(a) King of Thule, (b) Jewel Song, from Act II
Miss Sharlow.
Mephisto's Serenade, Act III.
Mr. Nicolay.
Love Scene, Act II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust" (Last act).....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay.
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

Boston American

SEPTEMBER 10, 1916

NEW POPS HAVE WON APPROVAL

Innovation of Vocal Music Is Welcomed by Boston Audiences.

The new pops and operatic concerts, which began at Symphony Hall last Tuesday night to run for three weeks, are a success. Nothing that Manager Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attempted in Boston in the years he has held his post has so immediately won the complete favor of the public.

The success of the concerts proved what has been a long time suspected, that Boston welcomes pop concerts for a few weeks in September. The innovation of vocal music has been warmly welcomed.

The significant feature of the season seems to be the success of the conductor, Josef Pasternack. Mr. Pasternack has shown himself in the concerts of the past week to be much more than a conductor of routine accomplishments. In every respect he seems to be a most unusual conductor. He takes as much pains with a simple march as he does with a more pretentious suite. His Vienna waltzes are remarkable because of the rhythm he gives them.

Mr. Pasternack has arranged an interesting scheme of programs for the coming week. Tomorrow night will be a miscellaneous program, and this will be the last appearance of Miss Gibson, the soprano. The soloists will be Miss Gibson, Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay.

Tuesday night a considerable part of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen." Some of the principal airs will be sung, while the orchestra will play selections from the opera. In addition there will be the usual miscellaneous works for the orchestra in the first and third parts.

On this evening Myrna Sharlow, soprano, will make her first appearance. Miss Sharlow, who is now one of the lyric sopranos of the Chicago Opera Company, is remembered in Boston because of her connection with the old Boston Opera Company.

MISS MYRNA SHARLOW, soprano, who will appear at Symphony Hall. She is a member of the Chicago Opera company.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 12, 1916

NEW SOLOIST FOR POPS TONIGHT

Myrna Sharlow.

Tomorrow Night at the New Pops in Symphony Hall, Myrna Sharlow, Soprano, Formerly of the Boston Opera Company and Now a Mecber of the Chicago Opera Company, Makes Her Debut as Soloist at These Concerts. Miss Sharlow Will Be Heard in Selections from "Carmen."

THE NEW POPS

A program of unusual attractiveness has been prepared for the New Pops and operatic concerts in Symphony Hall this evening. It is "Carmen" night and most of the pieces played and sung will be taken from Bizet's opera. Myrna Sharlow, the young soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, will make her first appearance at these concerts, and a tenor, Mr. Arthur Hackett of this city, has been engaged. Both Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay, who had such success last week, will continue. In addition to the excerpts from "Carmen," the famous quartet from "Rigoletto" finds its place in the last part of the program.

The program is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture, "Si j'etais roi".....Adam
Page's Song from "Les Huguenots"..Meyerbeer
Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
Scenes from Bizet's "Carmen."
Miss Myrna Sharlow, soprano; Mr. Arthur Hackett, tenor. (Their first appearance.)
Prelude to Acts II., III. and IV.
Micaela's Air, Act III.
Miss Sharlow.
Duet of Micaela and Don Jose, Act I.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
Flower Song, Act II.
Mr. Hackett.
Prelude to Act I.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"..
Mascagni
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Miss Myrna Sharlow, Miss Lillia Snelling, Mr. Arthur Hackett, Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
March, "The Ameer".....Herbert

[3]

BOSTON JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916.

"CARMEN" NIGHT BIG SUCCESS AT NEW POPS

Myrna Sharlow and Arthur Hackett Make Brilliant Debut as Pop Soloists—May Naudain Now Vaudeville Star—Other Theatrical Items.

By E. F. Harkins

New Pops! Nonpareil Pops!

The golden opinion won from a surprised and thoroughly delighted audience last week when the new Pops and operatic concerts began at Symphony Hall could hardly be improved upon, and yet it seemed last night that the Pops reached the very acme of their brilliancy.

A big factor in this triumphant innovation is the operatic music. Last night was called "Carmen" night. Excerpts from the popular Bizet opera occupied the whole middle section of the program. Myrna Sharlow, whose beautiful soprano voice blossomed forth a few years ago at the Boston Opera House, and Arthur Hackett, a Boston tenor, made their first appearance as Pop soloists and were most enthusiastically welcomed. Miss Sharlow sang Micaela's third-act song, and Mr. Hackett the famous "Flower Song," and they were also heard in the duet allotted to Micaela and Don Jose in the first act of the opera. Their singing was excellent.

The quite matchless Pop orchestra, conducted by Josef Pasternack, performed the "Carmen" preludes capitally. Mr. Pasternack is now generally hailed as the ablest conductor in the history of these concerts. However, he owes much to the exceptionally fine caliber of this band of symphony men, many of whom are virtuosi of more than local renown.

Nor were the operatic numbers limited to "Carmen." Miss Snelling, an unusually gifted contralto, sang the page's florid song from "The Huguenots," and, to cap all this, there was a rousing performance of the immortal quartet from "Rigoletto," with Mr. Nicolay as the basso. The other numbers on the program were likewise performed in a manner that sustained the enthusiasm of the audience from first to last. The hall was crowded, for these new Pops are truly the talk of the town.

Tonight will be "Faust" night. The program follows:

March, "Old Berlin".....Blon
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust":
Prelude to Act I.
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling.
a. King of Thule, from Act. II.
b. Jewel Song, from Act. II.
Miss Sharlow.
Mephisto's Serenade, Act. III.
Mr. Nicolay.
Love Scene, Act. II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust," Last Act.....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay.
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

May Naudain Again

May Naudain is making her first appearance here in vaudeville as one of several headline attractions on the de luxe bill being presented at B. F. Keith's. Yes, the same Miss Naudain, exactly; the sparkling prima donna of bygone "Little Cherub" and "Girls of Gottenburg" days.

And thereby hangs a tale.

You remember the very pleasing impression Miss Naudain used to make in musical comedy with her velvety voice and her sort of June rose personality? Well, she is just the same this week as she sings Anatol Friedland's songs at Keith's, with the composer accompanying her; but it was this tempting engagement that took her away from her favorite field of musical comedy.

It happened while she was singing in "Katinka" in New York last season. Katinka was her first role in light opera or musical comedy since the retirement—marital, of course—that caused her several years' absence from the stage. She was very happy in "Katinka," she says, and she is big enough to say that she thinks Audrey Maple is singing her old part beautifully at the Shubert Theatre; but the vaudeville opportunity was quite irresistible.

Vaudeville pays enormously well, and,

BOSTON JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 9, 1916.

NEW POP CONDUCTOR AND SOLOIST

MYRNA SHARLOW — JOSEF PASTERNACK

Journal
Sept. 9, 1916.

POP CONCERTS, WITH SINGERS, A BIG SUCCESS

Josef Pasternack, the Conductor, Finds Favor—Miss Sharlow to Sing.

The new Pops and operatic concerts, which began a three-weeks' run at Symphony Hall last Tuesday night, are a most emphatic success. Nothing that Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has ever attempted in Boston has so immediately won the complete favor of the public.

The success of these new concerts proves what has been a long time suspected, that Boston welcomes Pop concerts for a few wteks in September. The innovation of vocal music has been most warmly commended, and the singers engaged have shown themselves to be of unusual quality.

The most significant feature of the season, however, seems to be the success of the conductor, Josef Pasternack. Mr. Pasternack has shown himself in the concerts of the past week to be much more than a conductor of routine accomplishments. He takes as much pains with a simple march as he does with a more pretentious suite. His Vienna waltzes are remarkable because of the rhythm he gives them while his accomplishments in the operatic selections sung by the vocalists show what a thorough training he has had in this department.

Monday night will witness the last apparance of Miss Gibson, the soprano. The other soloists will be Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay.

Tuesday night a considerable part of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Bizert's "Carmen." Some of the principal airs will be sung, while the orchestra will play selections from the opera. In addition, there will be unusual miscellaneous works for the orchestra in the first and third parts.

On Tuesday Myrna Sharlow, soprano, will make her first appearance. Miss Sharlow is now one of the lyric sopranos of the Chicago Opera Company, but it was as a member of the former Boston Opera Company that she became noted. Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay will be on the program with her.

On Wednesday night Mr. Pasternack will devote a considerable part of the program to excerpts from Gounod's "Faust."

The program for tonight follows:

March, "Hands Across the Sea".....Sousa
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
Ballet Music from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Aria, "Vissi d' Arte," from "Tosca"..Puccini
Aria," "Ritorna Vincitor," from "Aida".Verdi
Miss Gibson
Aria, "Madamina," from "Don Giovanni"...
.....Mozart
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Nicolay.
Benediction from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Aria, "Mon coeur s'oevre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Miss Snelling
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Solo Violin, Mr. Theodorowicz.
Yesterthoughts, Punchinello.....Herbert
Overture, "Der Fiedermaus".....Strauss

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916.

NEW SOLOISTS POPULAR AT POP CONCERT

The second week of the New Pops began last night with two new soloists, Myrna Sharlow, soprano, and Arthur Hackett, tenor. There was also a noticeable addition to the number of vocal selections, a duet and quartet being added to the usual numbers. It was a big night both in point of attendance and enthusiasm. The audience could not begin to get its fill, even with several encores in addition to the 12 numbers on the program.

First honors were about equally divided between Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett and the "Cavalleria" selection. Miss Sharlow, a promising singer in her Boston Opera House days, shows exceptional progress. Mr. Hackett is one of the most satisfactory tenors of the day. Mr. Pasternack strengthened first opinion of being far and away the best leader the Pops have had in years.

Tonight's program will be:

March, "Old Berlin".....Blon
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne".....Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust"—
Prelude to Act I.
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling.
(a) King of Thule, (b) Jewel Song, from Act II
Miss Sharlow.
Mephisto's Serenade, Act III.
Mr. Nicolay.
Love Scene, Act II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Trio from "Faust" (Last act).....Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay.
March, "The Wizard of the Nile".....Herbert

Boston American—

SEPTEMBER 10, 1916.

NEW POPS HAVE WON APPROVAL

Innovation of Vocal Music Is Welcomed by Boston Audiences.

The new pops and operatic concerts, which began at Symphony Hall last Tuesday night to run for three weeks, are a success. Nothing that Manager Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attempted in Boston in the years he has held his post has so immediately won the complete favor of the public.

The success of the concerts proved what has been a long time suspected, that Boston welcomes pop concerts for a few weeks in September. The innovation of vocal music has been warmly welcomed.

The significant feature of the season seems to be the success of the conductor, Josef Pasternack. Mr. Pasternack has shown himself in the concerts of the past week to be much more than a conductor of routine accomplishments. In every respect he seems to be a most unusual conductor. He takes as much pains with a simple march as he does with a more pretentious suite. His Vienna waltzes are remarkable because of the rhythm he gives them.

Mr. Pasternack has arranged an interesting scheme of programs for the coming week. Tomorrow night will be a miscellaneous program, and this will be the last appearance of Miss Gibson, the soprano. The soloists will be Miss Gibson, Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay.

Tuesday night a considerable part of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen." Some of the principal airs will be sung, while the orchestra will play selections from the opera. In addition there will be the usual miscellaneous works for the orchestra in the first and third parts.

On this evening Myrna Sharlow, soprano, will make her first appearance. Miss Sharlow, who is now one of the lyric sopranos of the Chicago Opera Company, is remembered in Boston because of her connection with the old Boston Opera Company.

MISS MYRNA SHARLOW, soprano, who will appear at Symphony Hall. She is a member of the Chicago Opera company.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 12, 1916.

NEW SOLOIST FOR POPS TONIGHT

Myrna Sharlow.

Tomorrow Night at the New Pops in Symphony Hall, Myrna Sharlow, Soprano, Formerly of the Boston Opera Company and Now a Mecber of the Chicago Opera Company, Makes Her Debut as Soloist at These Concerts. Miss Sharlow Will Be Heard in Selections from "Carmen."

THE NEW POPS

A program of unusual attractiveness has been prepared for the New Pops and operatic concerts in Symphony Hall this evening. It is "Carmen" night and most of the pieces played and sung will be taken from Bizet's opera. Myrna Sharlow, the young soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, will make her first appearance at these concerts, and a tenor, Mr. Arthur Hackett of this city, has been engaged. Both Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay, who had such success last week, will continue. In addition to the excerpts from "Carmen," the famous quartet from "Rigoletto" finds its place in the last part of the program.

The program is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture, "Si j'etais roi".....Adam
Page's Song from "Les Huguenots"..Meyerbeer
Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
Scenes from Bizet's "Carmen."
Miss Myrna Sharlow, soprano; Mr. Arthur Hackett, tenor. (Their first appearance.)
Prelude to Acts II., III. and IV.
Micaela's Air, Act III.
Miss Sharlow.
Duet of Micaela and Don Jose, Act I.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.
Flower Song, Act II.
Mr. Hackett.
Prelude to Act I.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"..
Mascagni
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Miss Myrna Sharlow, Miss Lillia Snelling, Mr. Arthur Hackett, Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
March, "The Ameer".....Herbert

[3]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 11, 1916

SURMISES ABOUT THE SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

One Cause of the Length and Variety of the List for the New Season—New Songs by Mr. Loeffler—One Opera Company for Four Cities—Another Strange "Carmen"—Posthumous Reger—Items, Observations and Opinions

EVEN after four months, speculation harps upon the reasons for the seeming change in the policy of the Symphony Concerts that announces fifteen "assisting artists" for the new series, whereas seven or eight have sufficed in recent years. With the four virtuosi from the string choir included for their annual concertos, no less than nineteen soloists will be distributed through the twenty-four pairs of concerts instead of the twelve or thirteen that last season, for example, bedecked them. By long precedent, Dr. Muck will have the first and the last pair of concerts to himself, but with only three more between for programmes that will not require adjustment in substance and in length to solo pieces. Hitherto, he has led twice—and sometimes thrice—that number free from what the purists of symphonic music call an intruding element. (Even singers be such in austere ears, the pianists and the violinists with their concertos happen to be playing symphonic music too.)

The chief cause of the change is not far to seek. For the new season and for the first time since the concerts came into being, the seats are sold by subscription, renewable from year to year, and not by annual auction. The management wished to signalize this new order of things as widely and clearly as possible upon the actual and the potential publics of the concerts in the hope to stimulate the one and widen the other. A ready means was the announcement of an uncommonly long, various and catholic list of "assisting artists" from singers of the Metropolitan to resident virtuosi, from established masters to deserving newcomers. Hence the nineteen soloists and hence the inclusion of this or that unexpected name in the lists. Moreover, the anxious and austere purists may soothe their perturbations. Because the nineteen are serving the well-being of the concerts this season, it does not follow that nineteen more will succeed them in each and every winter to come.

Here in Boston

With a seldom-heard old overture of Boieldieu among the items, the programme for the sixth of the New Pop concerts in Symphony Hall this evening, stands:

March, "Americaine" ..... Ganne
Overture, "The Caliph of Bagdad" ..... Boieldieu
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais" ..... Waldteufel
Ballet Music from "Coppelia" ..... Delibes
"Voi lo Sappete, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
"Pleurez, Pleurez Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid" ..... Massenet

Miss Gibson.

"Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Ballad, "The Calf of Gold" from "Faust" ..... Gounod

Mr. Nicolay.

"Connais-tu le Pays," from "Mignon" ..... Thomas
"Habanera," from "Carmen" ..... Bizet

Miss Snelling.

Overture, "Phèdre" ..... Massenet
Waltz, "Spring, Beautiful Spring" ..... Lincke
Selection, "The Only Girl" ..... Herbert
March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa

In Boston, as in the other cities that "The Flonzaleys" regularly visit, they will announce the first concert of the new series as a memorial concert to the late Mr. de Coppett the founder and the sustainer of the quartet and make the programme from pieces that he warmly liked Beethove 's quartet in E-flat, opus 127, during the hearing of which he died; Smetana's quartet, "From My Life," and Mozart's quartet in C. While the elder de Coppet made no provision in his will for the future of "The Flonzaleys," his surviving son has taken over all his obligations toward them.

According to the manager of Mme. Frisch, she will include next winter in the programmes of her concerts in Boston and elsewhere, three new songs by Mr. Loeffler.

BOSTON JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 14, 1916.

"CARMEN" MUSIC AT POPS AGAIN TONIGHT

The great success of the Pop Concert of Tuesday night, when excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen" were featured, has prompted a repetition tonight, so far as the vocal numbers are concerned. The list of orchestral numbers arranged by Mr. Pasternack are new. The program follows:

March, "Baden-Baden" ..... Kral
Overture, "Orphee aux Enfers" ..... Offenbach
Page's song from "Les Huguenots" .. Mayerbeer

Miss Snelling.

Selection, "It Happened in Noordland" ..... Herbert

Scenes from Bizet's "Carmen"

Miss Myrna Sharlow, soprano; Mr. Arthur Hackett, Tenor.

Preludes to Acts II., III. and IV.
Micaela's Air, Act III.

Miss Sharlow.

Duet of Micaela and Don Jose, Act I.

Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett.

Flower Song, Act II.

Mr. Hackett.

Prelude to Act I.

"The Star-Spangled Banner."

Overture, "Hungarian Lustspiel" ... Keler-Bela
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi

Miss Sharlow, soprano; Mr. Hackett, tenor; Miss Snelling, contralto; Mr. Nicolay, basso.

March, "Hoch und Deutschmeister" .... Ertel

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 13. 1916

NEW VOICES FEATURE OF THE "POPS"

Myrna Sharlow and Arthur Hackett Charm

BY OLIN DOWNES

A feature of the Pop concert last night in Symphony Hall was the appearance for the first time at these concerts of Myrna Sharlow, the young lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera company, and Arthur Hackett, tenor.

Mr. Pasternack had decided on airs and orchestral bits from Bizet's "Carmen" as part of the programme. In addition to the music from "Carmen" Miss Snelling sang the page's song from the "Huguenots," and a quartet consisting of Mmes. Sharlow and Snelling, Messrs. Hackett and Nicolay sang the quartet from "Rigoletto." The orchestral pieces were by Schubert, Adam, Strauss, Mascagni, Herbert.

WELL REMEMBERED

Miss Sharlow is well remembered in Boston through her appearances in seasons past with the Boston Opera Company and other appearances in concert. Again the fresh and beautiful quality of her voice and her sense of style commanded hearty applause. After singing Micaela's air from Act III. of "Carmen" she added an encore piece with piano accompaniment.

Mr. Hackett's voice, a voice of exceptionally fine quality, handled last night with true art, makes him one of the most promising tenors of the younger generation in this country. This voice is working out to better and better advantage and the singer's skill and intelligence in interpretation are continually growing.

These scenes from "Carmen" were heard: The preludes, for orchestra, to Acts II., III. and IV.; Micaela's air from Act III; the duet of Micaela and Jose, Act I.; the Flower Song from Act II.; and for orchestra, the prelude to Act I.

Mr. Pasternack confirmed previous impressions of his excellent abilities as a conductor. The Pop concerts are indeed new and most entertaining events under his baton. Mr. Pasternack is not only a skilled and experienced conductor of many kinds of music; he is a musician of authority and individuality. He holds real rehearsals for these concerts, and he succeeds in making the players carry out his wishes. The brilliance and the elegance of Adam's overture, "Si j'etais Roi"; the gayety and sensuousness of the waltz from Strauss' "Fledermaus"; the piquancy and the dramatic force of the entractes from "Carmen"—all these things were his.

Seldom has the music of "Carmen," in or out of the Boston Opera House sounded so warm and so convincing. This evening there will be sung, by the same singers, excerpts from Gounod's "Faust," in addition to other operatic music and orchestral pieces.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 13, 1916

A Discovery in Tenors at the New Pops—Miss Sharlow Reappears — Prospective Ballets for Boston — Items and Announcements

THE New Pops and Operatic Concerts, as the programme labels them, fulfilled abundantly last evening the second half of this official designation. Of the twelve items on the list, five were fragments for orchestra or for voices with orchestra of "Carmen"; a sixth and a seventh were the quartet from "Rigoletto" and the Page's air from the first act of "The Huguenots"; a potpourri from "Cavalleria Rusticana" was added for good measure; while even the chosen waltz came out of Strauss's operetta, "Die Fledermaus." Perhaps Adam's overture to his old opéra-comique, "Si j'étais Roi," deserves to be called operatic, too; but while the prelude survives in the concert-hall, even in provincial France all that follows is dead and buried in the theatre. Of course Verdi's quartet, defying the years by warmth of melody, dramatically differentiated or assembled voices and mingled ardor and expertness of workmanship, is a "standard concert piece" that once more the audience would hear twice over. "Standard," too, is or was the air from "The Huguenots" in which the Page salutes the Queen with what seems nowadays a heavily rhythmed and calculatingly ornate cavatina—"effective"—still, though hardly so as Miss Snelling somewhat laboriously sang it. As for the excerpts from "Carmen," Micaela's prayerful air in the mountains and Jose's amorous testimony to the gypsy and her flower are concert-pieces, too; but the duet between the peasant girl and the soldier—none too engaging in the opera itself—falls flat elsewhere, especially when one of the singers is groping through his part. More grateful were the introductions to the third and the fourth acts, tone-poems in miniature and as full of atmosphere as though they had been signed yesterday. In Mr. Nikisch's time the public of the Symphony Concerts heard them gladly.

Besides the established Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay two newcomers shared in these operatic exercises—Miss Myrna Sharlow, the remembered saviour of a matinée at the Opera House in which Mme. Melba was "unable to appear" and the younger singer won the audience with her Mimi of "Bohème," and Mr. Arthur Hackett, an operatic tenor of present ability and future promise actually resident in Boston. Miss Sharlow, now established in the Chicago Opera, keeps her young and demure presence; has deepened and warmed her soprano tones; bettered her practice of the art of song and gained the projecting power that makes phrase and progression bear music and mood into the ears of her hearers, with no coarsening of the vocal means. Mr. Hackett, on the strength of his performance last evening, outside the duet in which he could only grope, seemed a discovery indeed. His voice is of large and pure tenor quality, unclouded, unshakable, unforced. Intelligence and skill control it; richness and ardor grace it; while an instinctive and unpractised sense of operatic phrase, accent and cumulation guides and points it. In his tones at least is sense of the theatre and of moving and musical operatic utterance. Justly an audience that had not suspected the existence of such a tenor in its own town applauds him.

The leader in all these good and pleasant deeds was the new conductor, Mr. Pasternack, confirming the virtues he disclosed a week ago and promising more if the management wisely confide to him next spring the regular but now somewhat dry and mechanical Pops. He quickens his orchestra and he stirs his hearers; his ear judges, balances, smoothes, brightens such tone as the men, now on their mettle even in a Pop, willingly give him. His rhythms snap; his phrases glow; music under his hand is steadily in motion and alive; he undulates pace and accent shrewdly; neither the expanding warmth of operatic song nor the flow and "kick" of a Viennese waltz in sustained beat or sharp transition, evades him; while he can be elegant and adroit with the polished measures of Adam and Boieldieu. Their amiable music smiled out of his "reading"; Strauss's waltz regained vivacity, fancy and savor of the theatre; the introduction to the fourth act of "Carmen" kept tonal and rhythmic brilliance; while the preluding to the third missed only a little of misty and mysterious suggestion of the dawn and the emerging figures in somewhat too large an orchestral tone. For the first time in years a conductor of the Pops means something to the audience.

Here in Boston

According to present announcements, more or less interspersed with [illegible]bes," the repertory of the Russian Ballet during the week that it will [illegible] at the Opera House in Nov[illegible] will traverse for novel pieces the "choreographic versions" of "Til Eulenspiegel" and "The Mephisto Waltz"; the mimed scene underneath the waters in the palace of the river god arranged from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera of "Sadko"; Reynaldo Hahn's pictorial and exotic ballet of legendary India, "The Blue God"; "Narcisse," the mythological mimo-drama to Tschrépnin's music of which Mr. Nijinsky is fonder than are most pub-as much as the soloists.

Another program of very great interest has been arranged for the concert tonight. This will be devoted largely to excepts from Gounod's "Faust," one of the most popular and beautiful works in the repertoire. A considerable part of it will be taken from the second act. And, in addition to this, Mr. Nicolay will sing the Seranade from Act 3, and the closing trio will be sung. Mr. Hackett, Miss Sharlow, Miss Snelling and Mr. Nicolay are all on the program.

The program in full is as follows:—

March, "Old Berlin" ..... Blon
Overture, "Fra Diavolo" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
Ballet Suite, "Egyptienne" ..... Luigini
Scenes from Gounod's "Faust"
Siebel's Flower Song, Act II.
Miss Snelling
a. King of Thule (from Act II.)
b. Jewel Song (from Act II.)
Miss Sharlow
Mephisto's Serenade, Act III.
Mr. Nicolay
Love Scene, Act II.
Miss Sharlow and Mr. Hackett
The Star Spangled Banner.
Overture, "The Bohemian Girl" ..... Balfe
Trio from "Faust," Last Act ..... Gounod
Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay
March, "The Wizard of the Nile" .... Herbert

EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER THIRTEEN,

Myrna Sharlow Feature at the Tuesday "Pops"

Young Lyric Soprano Was Well Received in "Carmen" Program

Miss Myrna Sharlow, lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, and for a time a member of our own former opera, was the dazzling light at Symphony Hall last night on the occasion of her first appearance with the new "pops." It was "Carmen" night and the program, containing several excerpts from Biset's popular work, was enthusiastically received by one of the largest audiences that has attended these concerts.

Miss Sharlow, young and of great charm, had everything in her favor, save for a slight nervousness she could not at first overcome, to demonstrate the beautiful voice with which she has been endowed. She sang Micaela's air from the third act with much effect and was recalled again and again.

In her duet with Arthur Hackett from the first act she again scored heavily, and rather overshadowed the tenor, although he sang excellently. The "Flower Song" by Mr. Hackett gave him his real opportunity of the evening. Later these artists appeared with Lillia Snelling and Constantin Nicolay in the quartet from Rigoletto.

Josef Paternack, the new leader of the Pops, was again the matchless handler of the orchestra. His reading of the Carmen numbers particularly was done with intelligence and discretion and he was applauded quite

[4]

Boston American

SEPTEMBER 17, 1916.

Closing Week of New "Pop" Concerts

THE brief season of New Pops and Operatic Concerts in Symphony Hall comes to an end next Saturday evening. The following week, the many members of the orchestra will be busy with the Worcester Festival; then on Monday, October 9, the entire orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal of the Symphony season.

The success that has attended these new popular concerts in Symphony Hall has fully vindicated the judgment of Mr. Ellis in establishing them and it is likely that they will become an annual feature of the early Fall. The concerts have been invaluable, if only in discovering to Boston a conductor of such remarkable talent as Mr. Pasternack, but all agree that they have been most delightful from a musical point of view.

Mr. Pasternack has arranged some very pleasing programs for the coming week. All of them will be more or less of a miscellaneous nature. The same singers that have had so much success the past week will appear at each concert—Myrna Sharlow, soprano; Lillia Snelling, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Constantin Nicolay, bass.

In the course of the week Miss Sharlow is to sing the Gavotte from Massenet's "Manon," the Waltz Song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," and Mimi's Air from "La Boheme." Miss Snelling will sing the Drinking Song from "Lucrezia Borgia," "Che fare" from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the famous "Ah! Mon fils" from Myerbeer's "The Prophet."

Mr. Hackett will sing, among other things, the air "O Paradiso" from Myerbeer's "L'Afracaine" and Lohengrin's Narrative; while Mr. Nicolay will sing the Cavatina and Aria from the first act of "Lucrezia Borgia," the grand Aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and the Drinking Song from Bizet's "The Fair Maid of Perth."

Miss Sharlow and Miss Snelling will, on certain nights, sing the "Barcarolle" from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman," and Miss Snelling and Mr. Hackett will sing the duo, "Di nestri monti" from "Il Trovatore."

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 17, 1916.

ND MUSICAL REVIEW

SAYS CONDUCTING IS ART THAT CAN'T BE TAUGHT

Josef Pasternack Admits That a Certain Technic Can Be Acquired by Diligent Study—"But the Art Itself Must Be Within the Individual," He Insists.

By KATHARINE WRIGHT.

"Conducting cannot be taught," says Josef Pasternack, the gifted conductor of the new Pops and operatic concerts at Symphony Hall. "A certain technic can, of course, be acquired by diligent study, but the art itself must be within the individual. A man goes on the stage. Either he becomes at once conscious of possessing the divine spark, or he knows himself to be a failure. If he is sure of his inability not even work will help him. He had best leave conducting alone.

"A certain master declared recently that he could make a fine conductor out of any musician who came into his studio. This is folly! Toscanini, the second greatest conductor in the world, refused the position offered him by his native town of Parvia because he was expected to teach and pass on the secrets of his art."

Nothing can shake Mr. Pasternack's belief that conductors are born, not made. He is just as positive that a man cannot ply two trades at the same time. He himself was a viola player and for eight years sat at the first viola desk in the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra. Then Toscanini noticed him and made him assistant conductor. On that day Mr. Pasternack packed up his instrument and sent it to his brother, also an accomplished musician.

The conductor has been in America for 21 years. Those who have asked eagerly concerning his nationality may amuse themselves in trying to pronounce Czenstochau, his birthplace, a few miles from Warsaw, and one of the first towns to be seized by the invading Germans.

Had Ambition, but No Money.

"When I first came to America," continued Mr. Pasternack, puffing a cigarette reflectively, "I did what every other foreign artist had done before me, looked about for employment and was forced to be contented with very humble positions. I had plenty of ambition, but no money. About 15 years ago I was playing in an obscure restaurant where Edouard de Reszke often took his meals. One day he asked my name and, hearing that like himself I was a Pole, became interested in my future. He asked me if I was not ashamed to waste my talent in so poor a place and gave me a letter to Alfred Hertz, the Wagnerian conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House. To my delight, I was made second viola, then first. Then Toscanini encouraged me to try conducting.

"Unfortunately he wished me to play twice a week in the orchestra as well, but only when he conducted. This I found a bad plan, for with great hopes of a future as a conductor before me I wished to devote all my time familiarizing myself with scores and to the rehearsals for performances I was engaged to direct. This disagreement was the cause of my leaving the Metropolitan.

"The only thing for me at the moment was to go abroad. Dr. Muck was very kind and with his help I got work at some of the German opera houses. However, I was not enthusiastic about this phase of my career. Opera in Germany, with the exception of that given in the larger cities, such as Dresden, Berlin, Manheim, Munich, cannot be compared with the performances given in America for one dollar.

"It is true the orchestras are large, but—how poor! The scenery is wretched. There are no singers. I had been used to the orchestra of the Metropolitan. Still I gained experience. After a few months spent at small German and Italian opera houses I returned to America and was engaged for the Century.

Was Lured to Boston.

"When this failed the Aborn company lured me to Boston with the promise of a good orchestra. A local choral society, however, was holding a festival. No players of any experience were to be had. The first night I was obliged to whistle most of the above part. The second night the man was scared at my angry looks and went home. This engagement was a severe disappointment..

"Then came Kavinia Park, where I have been for several years. In the afternoons there are concerts and at night operatic performances."

At this point in the conversation Constantin Nicolay, the stalwart Greek bass, entered the rooms, and chatting with Mr. Pasternack in French and Italian revealed the latter as an admirable linguist. His English is fluent and the colloquial phrases of the vernacular are not foreign to his vocabulary. The same may be said of his French and Italian.

"German, Russian and Polish I have to speak at home," he explained smilingly. "I learned Hungarian because I love Hungarian music and wished to understand the race more intimately. I had my first lessons in English at home in school where we were taught English and French alternating for an hour a week."

Besides his other talents Mr. Pasternack plays every instrument in the orchestra with the exception of the harp. He also admitted modestly that he composes. The other day he sold some dozen songs to a well known publisher. He has written orchestral works and an opera, but he has not yet attempted to dispose of them.

Returning for a moment to the discussion of the profession nearest his heart Mr. Pasternack called Dr. Muck the greatest conductor in the world.

Josef Pasternack.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 6, 1916.

NEW POPS INTRODUCED IN BRILLIANT FASHION

Josef Pasternack, the Conductor, and Several Opera Singers Are Enthusiastically Greeted at Symphony Hall—News and Gossip of the Stage.

By E. F. L.

Better Pops all around.

That may be described as the watchword of the new series of evening concerts at Symphony Hall.

The marvelous sight of a score of garcons standing spellbound while the singing was going on, and paying no more heed to the chances of collecting tips than if they were millionaires with pockets full of the aristocratic cigars that George Cohan advertises in "Hit-the-Trail Holliday," was witnessed perhaps for the first time on record.

And for the first time in many years there is a Pop conductor who knows what he wants and gets it.

The new September Pops would be well worth commending if they had nothing more to brag of than this conductor, Josef Pasternack, who extracts more thrilling music from the band of 50 or so than his immediate predecessors were able to get from an orchestra half as large again. Mr. Pasternack, who is well known in New York, but who is a stranger here, is a brilliant leader—a man of authority and true interpretative spirit. Those who have found Pop performances more or less perfunctory will find them so no longer. The new conductor was most enthusiastically welcomed last night. It has been a long time since there was anything really soul-stirring at these concerts.

To crown the novelties the management is introducing a vocal division into the program. This week the singers are Constantin Nicolay, a basso, now under engagement with the Ellis Opera Company; Lillia Snelling, a contralto, formerly with the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Dora Gibson, a dramatic soprano, who captured a large share of the vocal honors last night. This proved, all in all, an extremely popular innovation. Next week there will be a quartet of singers.

The new Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, until after Sept. 25. The program for tonight follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Puppenfee".....Bayer
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
"Voi lo Sappete, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
"Pleurez, Pleurez Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Gibson.
"Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Nicolay.
"Connais-tu Le Pays," from "Mignon"..Thomas
"Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Snelling.
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu
Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 6, 1916.

'POP' CONCERT SEASON OPENS AUSPICIOUSLY

Introduction of Operatic Singing Gives Pleasing Variety to Program — Mr. Pasternach Directs Orchestra with Noteworthy Discrimination—Audience Enthusiastic.

The new season of Pop concerts began auspiciously last evening at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

March, "Loraine".....Ganne
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Freut euch des Lebens".....Strauss
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet
a. Aria, from "Tosca".....Puccini
b. Aria, from "Aida".....Verdi
Miss Dora Gibson.
a. Aria, from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
b. Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
a. Benediction from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
b. Aria, from "Samson et Dalila"..Saint-Saens
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
March, "With Banners Flying".....Bion

Many patrons of the annual spring concerts were pleased by the introduction of operatic music given by experienced singers. This innovation, which lends variety to the programs, is a pronounced success.

Mr. Pasternach, an able conductor, already known in Boston, directed the admirable orchestra with spirit and discrimination. The pieces played were of a popular nature. The operatic arias were both pleasing and familiar.

Miss Snelling, an American contralto, began her career in the opera school established by the late Heinrich Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House. She has sung in opera both abroad and in America. Her singing shows skilful training and she is by nature emotional. Miss Gibson created a leading role in "The Children of Don" and that of Queen Yasbeau in "Joan of Arc," given during Raymond Roze's season at Covent Garden. Her voice is powerful, suited to dramatic expression. Mr. Nicolay, a Greek, one of the principal basses of the Chicago Opera Company, sang with the customary animation of the opera singer in concert. Recalled, he gave "The Two Grenadiers."

There was applause for orchestra, conductor and singers. Songs and pieces were added to the program.

This evening Dora Gibson, soprano; Lillia Snelling, contralto, and Constantin Nicolay will again be the soloists, each singing twice in the second part, while there will be a complete change of program as follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Puppenfee".....Bayer
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
(a) "Voi Lo Sappette, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
(b) "Pleurez, Pleurez, Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Dora Gibson.
(a) "Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
(b) Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
(a) "Connais-tu Le Pays," from "Mignon".....Thomas
(b) "Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Dame Blanche"..Boieldieu
(a) Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
(b) Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916

DEATH IN RANKS OF SYMPHONY

Peter Sadony, Bassoonist, Dies After Operation

Peter Sadony, first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the foremost bassoonists in the world, died yesterday in Scobey Hospital, following an operation for appendicitis. He is survived by a wife and a son. Funeral arrangements will be made today.

Mr. Sadony was born in Wiesbaden, Germany, in 1867. He studied under Frenderberg, Kogel and Siebeskind. He played in the orchestra of Regensberg, Berlin, Riga and under Gustav Mahler in Hamburg. He was professor in the Conservatory of Cologne in 1894 and first bassoon in the Guerzenich Orchestra of that city.

He became the first bassoon in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1895, which post he held to the time of his death. He was also first bassoon of the Longy Club.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916.

Peter Sadony.

Peter Sadony, who was first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday in Scobey Hospital after an operation for appendicitis. He was born in Wiesbaden, Germany, in 1867, and studied at the Wiesbaden Conservatory under Frenderberg and later under Kogel in Cassel and Siebeskind in Berlin. He played in the orchestras and operas in Regensberg, Berlin, Riga and in Hamburg under Gustav Mahler.

In 1894 he received a call as professor in the Conservatory of Cologne and at the same time became first bassoon in the Guerzenich Orchestra of that city. These positions he gave up in the fall of 1905 to become first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he held from that time until his death. He was also first bassoon of the Longy Club. A widow and one son survive him.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916.

MR. PASTERNACK GIVES NEW PROGRAM AT "POPS"

Miss Snelling and Mr. Hackett Will Sing Duet This Evening.

Another new program was presented by Mr. Pasternack at the New Pops concert at Symphony Hall last evening.

The orchestral numbers included pieces by Ganne, Weber, Harbert, Strauss, Nicolai. Mr. Hackett sang an aria, "O Paradis," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine." Mr. Nicolay was heard in the cavatina and aria from act I. of Donizetti's "Lucretia Borgia," while Miss Sharlow and Miss Snelling were heard in arias from Wagner's "Lohengrin," Massanet's "Manon" and Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman."

The program for this evening will be as follows:

March, "Manhattan Beach".....
Overture, "Jubilee".....Weber
(a) "Che faro senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo".....Gluck
(b) "Ah! Mon fils," from "Le Prophete," Miss Snelling.....Meyerbeer
Waltz, "Freut euch des Lebens"..Strauss
"Entrance of Guests to the Wartburg," "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Lohengrin's Narrative, from "Lohengrin," Mr. Hackett.....Wagner
(a) "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart
(b) "Qual fiamma," from "Pagliacci," Miss Sharlow.....Leoncavallo
Overture, "Raymond".....Thomas
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "Madame Sherry".....Hoschna
(a) Grand Aria from "Don Carlos"..Verdi
(b) Drinking Song from "La jolie Fille de Perthe," Mr. Nicolay.....Bizet
Duet, "Al Nostri Monti," Miss Snelling and Mr. Hackett.....Verdi
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 17, 1916.

ND MUSICAL REVIEW

SAYS CONDUCTING IS ART THAT CAN'T BE TAUGHT

Josef Pasternack Admits That a Certain Technic Can Be Acquired by Diligent Study—"But the Art Itself Must Be Within the Individual," He Insists.

By KATHARINE WRIGHT.

"Conducting cannot be taught," says Josef Pasternack, the gifted conductor of the new Pops and operatic concerts at Symphony Hall. "A certain technic can, of course, be acquired by diligent study, but the art itself must be within the individual. A man goes on the stage. Either he becomes at once conscious of possessing the divine spark, or he knows himself to be a failure. If he is sure of his inability not even work will help him. He had best leave conducting alone.

"A certain master declared recently that he could make a fine conductor out of any musician who came into his studio. This is folly! Toscanini, the second greatest conductor in the world, refused the position offered him by his native town of Parvia because he was expected to teach and pass on the secrets of his art."

Nothing can shake Mr. Pasternack's belief that conductors are born, not made. He is just as positive that a man cannot ply two trades at the same time. He himself was a viola player and for eight years sat at the first viola desk in the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra. Then Toscanini noticed him and made him assistant conductor. On that day Mr. Pasternack packed up his instrument and sent it to his brother, also an accomplished musician.

The conductor has been in America for 21 years. Those who have asked eagerly concerning his nationality may amuse themselves in trying to pronounce Czenstochau, his birthplace, a few miles from Warsaw, and one of the first towns to be seized by the invading Germans.

Josef Pasternack.

Had Ambition, but No Money.

"When I first came to America," continued Mr. Pasternack, puffing a cigarette reflectively, "I did what every other foreign artist had done before me, looked about for employment and was forced to be contented with very humble positions. I had plenty of ambition, but no money. About 15 years ago I was playing in an obscure restaurant where Edouard de Reszke often took his meals. One day he asked my name and, hearing that like himself I was a Pole, became interested in my future. He asked me if I was not ashamed to waste my talent in so poor a place and gave me a letter to Alfred Hertz, the Wagnerian conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House. To my delight, I was made second viola, then first. Then Toscanini encouraged me to try conducting.

"Unfortunately he wished me to play twice a week in the orchestra as well, but only when he conducted. This I found a bad plan, for with great hopes of a future as a conductor before me I wished to devote all my time familiarizing myself with scores and to the rehearsals for performances I was engaged to direct. This disagreement was the cause of my leaving the Metropolitan.

"The only thing for me at the moment was to go abroad. Dr. Muck was very kind and with his help I got work at some of the German opera houses. However, I was not enthusiastic about this phase of my career. Opera in Germany, with the exception of that given in the larger cities, such as Dresden, Berlin, Manheim, Munich, cannot be compared with the performances given in America for one dollar.

"It is true the orchestras are large, but—how poor! The scenery is wretched. There are no singers. I had been used to the orchestra of the Metropolitan. Still I gained experience. After a few months spent at small German and Italian opera houses I returned to America and was engaged for the Century.

Was Lured to Boston.

"When this failed the Aborn company lured me to Boston with the promise of a good orchestra. A local choral society, however, was holding a festival. No players of any experience were to be had. The first night I was obliged to whistle most of the above part. The second night the man was scared at my angry looks and went home. This engagement was a severe disappointment..

"Then came Kavinia Park, where I have been for several years. In the afternoons there are concerts and at night operatic performances."

At this point in the conversation Constantin Nicolay, the stalwart Greek bass, entered the rooms, and chatting with Mr. Pasternack in French and Italian revealed the latter as an admirable linguist. His English is fluent and the colloquial phrases of the vernacular are not foreign to his vocabulary. The same may be said of his French and Italian.

"German, Russian and Polish I have to speak at home," he explained smilingly. "I learned Hungarian because I love Hungarian music and wished to understand the race more intimately. I had my first lessons in English at home in school where we were taught English and French alternating for an hour a week."

Besides his other talents Mr. Pasternack plays every instrument in the orchestra with the exception of the harp. He also admitted modestly that he composes. The other day he sold some dozen songs to a well known publisher. He has written orchestral works and an opera, but he has not yet attempted to dispose of them.

Returning for a moment to the discussion of the profession nearest his heart Mr. Pasternack called Dr. Muck the greatest conductor in the world.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 6 1916.

NEW POPS INTRODUCED IN BRILLIANT FASHION

Josef Pasternack, the Conductor, and Several Opera Singers Are Enthusiastically Greeted at Symphony Hall—News and Gossip of the Stage.

By E. F. I

Better Pops all around.

That may be described as the watchword of the new series of evening concerts at Symphony Hall.

The marvelous sight of a score of garcons standing spellbound while the singing was going on, and paying no more heed to the chances of collecting tips than if they were millionaires with pockets full of the aristocratic cigars that George Cohan ad- [illegible] Holliday," was witnessed perhaps for the first time on record.

And for the first time in many years there is a Pop conductor who knows what he wants and gets it.

The new September Pops would be well worth commending if they had nothing more to brag of than this conductor, Josef Pasternack, who extracts more thrilling music from the band of 50 or so than his immediate predecessors were able to get from an orchestra half as large again. Mr. Pasternack, who is well known in New York, but who is a stranger here, is a brilliant leader—a man of authority and true interpretative spirit. Those who have found Pop performances more or less perfunctory will find them so no longer. The new conductor was most enthusiastically welcomed last night. It has been a long time since there was anything really soul-stirring at these concerts.

To crown the novelties the management is introducing a vocal division into the program. This week the singers are Constantin Nicolay, a basso, now under engagement with the Ellis Opera Company; Lillia Snelling, a contralto, formerly with the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Dora Gibson, a dramatic soprano, who captured a large share of the vocal honors last night. This proved, all in all, an extremely popular innovation. Next week there will be a quartet of singers.

The new Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, until after Sept. 25. The program for tonight follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Puppenfee".....Bayer
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
"Vol lo Sappete, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
"Pleurez, Pleurez Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Gibson.
"Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Nicolay.
"Connais-tu Le Pays," from "Mignon"..Thomas
"Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Snelling.
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu
Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

BOSTON HERALD
SEPTEMBER 6, 1916.

'POP' CONCERT SEASON OPENS AUSPICIOUSLY

Introduction of Operatic Singing Gives Pleasing Variety to Program — Mr. Pasternach Directs Orchestra with Noteworthy Discrimination—Audience Enthusiastic.

The new season of Pop concerts began auspiciously last evening at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

March, "Loraine".....Ganne
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Freut euch des Lebens".....Strauss
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet
a. Aria, from "Tosca".....Puccini
b. Aria, from "Aida".....Verdi
Miss Dora Gibson.
a. Aria, from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
b. Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
a. Benediction from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
b. Aria, from "Samson et Dalila"..Saint-Saens
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
March, "With Banners Flying".....Blon

Many patrons of the annual spring concerts were pleased by the introduction of operatic music given by experienced singers. This innovation, which lends variety to the programs, is a pronounced success.

Mr. Pasternach, an able conductor, already known in Boston, directed the admirable orchestra with spirit and discrimination. The pieces played were of a popular nature. The operatic arias were both pleasing and familiar.

Miss Snelling, an American contralto, began her career in the opera school established by the late Heinrich Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House. She has sung in opera both abroad and in America. Her singing shows skilful training and she is by nature emotional. Miss Gibson created a leading role in "The Children of Don" and that of Queen Yasbeau in "Joan of Arc," given during Raymond Roze's season at Covent Garden. Her voice is powerful, suited to dramatic expression. Mr. Nicolay, a Greek, one of the principal basses of the Chicago Opera Company, sang with the customary animation of the opera singer in concert. Recalled, he gave "The Two Grenadiers."

There was applause for orchestra, conductor and singers. Songs and pieces were added to the program.

This evening Dora Gibson, soprano; Lillia Snelling, contralto, and Constantin Nicolay will again be the soloists, each singing twice in the second part, while there will be a complete change of program as follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Puppenfee".....Bayer
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
(a) "Voi Lo Sappette, O Mamma," from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
(b) "Pleurez, Pleurez, Mes Yeux," from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Miss Dora Gibson.
(a) "Non Piu Andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
(b) Ballade, "The Calf of Gold," from "Faust".....Gounod
Mr. Constantin Nicolay.
(a) "Connais-tu Le Pays," from "Mignon".....Thomas
(b) "Habanera," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Miss Lillia Snelling.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Dame Blanche"..Boieldieu
(a) Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
(b) Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916

DEATH IN RANKS OF SYMPHONY

Peter Sadony, Bassoonist, Dies After Operation

Peter Sadony, first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the foremost bassoonists in the world, died yesterday in Soobey Hospital, following an operation for appendicitis. He is survived by a wife and a son. Funeral arrangements will be made today.

Mr. Sadony was born in Wiesbaden, Germany, in 1867. He studied under Frenderberg, Kogel and Siebeskind. He played in the orchestra of Regensberg, Berlin, Riga and under Gustav Mahler in Hamburg. He was professor in the Conservatory of Cologne in 1894 and first bassoon in the Guerzenich Orchestra of that city.

He became the first bassoon in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1895, which post he held to the time of his death. He was also first bassoon of the Longy Club.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916.

Peter Sadony.

Peter Sadony, who was first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday in Scobey Hospital after an operation for appendicitis. He was born in Wiesbaden, Germany, in 1867, and studied at the Wiesbaden Conservatory under Frenderberg and later under Kogel in Cassel and Siebeskind in Berlin. He played in the orchestras and operas in Regensberg, Berlin, Riga and in Hamburg under Gustav Mahler.

In 1894 he received a call as professor in the Conservatory of Cologne and at the same time became first bassoon in the Guerzenich Orchestra of that city. These positions he gave up in the fall of 1905 to become first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he held from that time until his death. He was also first bassoon of the Longy Club. A widow and one son survive him.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1916.

MR. PASTERNACK GIVES NEW PROGRAM AT "POPS"

Miss Snelling and Mr. Hackett Will Sing Duet This Evening.

Another new program was presented by Mr. Pasternack at the New Pops concert at Symphony Hall last evening.

The orchestral numbers included pieces by Ganne, Weber, Harbert, Strauss, Nicolai. Mr. Hackett sang an aria, "O Paradis," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine." Mr. Nicolay was heard in the cavatina and aria from act I. of Donizetti's "Lucretia Borgia," while Miss Sharlow and Miss Snelling were heard in arias from Wagner's "Lohengrin." Massanet's "Manon" and Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman."

The program for this evening will be as follows:

March, "Manhattan Beach".....
Overture, "Jubilee".....Weber
(a) "Che faro senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo".....Gluck
(b) "Ah! Mon fils," from "Le Prophete," Miss Snelling.....Meyerbeer
Waltz, "Freut euch des Lebens"...Strauss
"Entrance of Guests to the Wartburg," "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Lohengrin's Narrative, from "Lohengrin," Mr. Hackett.....Wagner
(a) "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart
(b) "Qual fiamma," from "Pagliacci," Miss Sharlow.....Leoncavallo
Overture, "Raymond".....Thomas
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "Madame Sherry".....Hoschna
(a) Grand Aria from "Don Carlos"...Verdi
(b) Drinking Song from "La Jolie Fille de Perthe," Mr. Nicolay.....Bizet
Duet, "Ai Nostri Monti," Miss Snelling and Mr. Hackett.....Verdi
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 17, 1916

Pasternack at the Pops

Conductor Who Came Rather Suddenly to Attention of Bostonians Says Conducting Can't Be Taught —Other News of Music

Joseph Pasternack, whose conspicuous success as conductor of the fall season for the Pop concerts has brought him rather suddenly to the attention of the people of Boston, was interviewed by the writer of these lines two days ago. Mr. Pasternack made an immediate impression when he opened the new Pop season a fortnight ago in Symphony Hall. These concerts—it is no reproach to the players or conductors—had fallen rather into routine grooves. The men are excellent players. Able musicians of the orchestra led the performances of their colleagues. Rather perfunctory rehearsals were held. The music for the most part was not exacting in its demands. When serious masterpieces were played they were works with which the men were thrice familiar. The principal difficulty was the fact that players got up from the ranks and waved the stick over the heads of their fellows, who regarded their gestures with complacency if not with indifference. It is an old and well tried saw that the men are very few who can step out from a desk in the orchestra and make that orchestra perform for them. Therefore Mr. Pasternack came under peculiarly favorable conditions for making new precedents. That he did this in so striking a manner, and that he injected so much new life and musical value into the Pop performances cannot, however, be laid wholly at the door of his personal novelty. He has shown himself a conductor of exceptional capabilities in a city not uncritical of its conductors. He is far more experienced in the interpretation of operatic music than any member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, especially when the performances of solo singers are in question, is a very important qualification for such concerts. But Mr. Pasternack, whatever kind of music he has interpreted, has proven himself an excellent musician and leader. And after all, in and out of the ranks, a man is a talented conductor, or he is not.

"What, in your opinion," I asked Mr. Pasternack, "makes a great conductor?"

"I don't know," he answered.

I thought I would try it another way. "What should be the musical attainments of a conductor?"

"I don't know.

"The reason I don't know," said Mr. Pasternack, "is simply this: you cannot make a conductor. A conductor is born. Excellent musicians labor for years at conducting, and are never successful. Other men, with not half of their musical knowledge are. There are just two things necessary to make a conductor. One is to be born with that kind of a talent. The other is, an endless amount of experience.

"Conducting is a thing which cannot be taught. The only thing to be said to anyone who wants to conduct is—conduct!

"I would not say that to a pianist or a singer. I would say, Go into your studio, study hard for so many years with as good a master as you can find. At a certain time you will be in a position to try yourself publicly. Then you can see. But with a conductor there is only one thing to do. Get a stick in your hand as quickly as you can, and conduct anywhere and everywhere that you get a chance to. It will quickly be seen whether you conduct.

"There is a technic of the stick, and a most important technic it is. Every man has his own particular way of expressing his wishes to his orchestra. The true conductor's methods will be a true index to his musical characteristics. But to certain essentials all conductors must conform. The first thing is the clear expression of one's wishes. Unless a conductor can do that no amount of musical learning will help him.

"A conductor who starts has to learn to control himself under all circumstances before he can inspire his men with confidence in him. That is a very hard thing. If the men once sense the fact that their leader is uncertain of something, he might as well lay down his stick. He will get nothing from that orchestra. But of course in beginning there is inevitably nervousness and mental confusion, and the only way these things can be overcome is simply by the ironing out process of experience.

"Undoubtedly a very great thing for a conductor is a knowledge of the technic of orchestra instruments, and ability to play wind and stringed instruments at least a little. In this particular thing I am very fortunate. For I began as a boy of seven to play the violin and then the flute in my father's band. My father and grandfather were both bandmasters. And when I was eight years old I waved the stick about for a rehearsal or two. In the later years I played professionally on every instrument in the orchestra save the harp.

"It helps. Yet no better proof of the fact that it is another quality than mere musical knowledge which makes the great conductor is furnished than the opposing fact that there have been very great conductors who had not the detailed knowledge of orchestral instruments that many think essential. But those conductors had ears. After all, that is the basis. If there is 'an ear' it will teach a man anything in the course of years. Toscanini has 'an ear.' He plays the 'cello, possibly one or two other instruments. But let an orchestra try to fool him! And I could tell you the name of another well-known Metropolitan conductor — this happened some years ago—who met his first bassoonist one morning coming in to rehearsal and discovered that the man had a swollen throat and was hardly to whisper. 'Well,' he said, 'sit down and read through your part, anyhow. You don't have to play.' And he was very much astonished, and could hardly credit his ear, when he heard the tone of the first bassoon. That conductor, a well-known and excellent musician, did not know that a man could play a bassoon with his lungs and his lips, even if he couldn't make a sound in his throat.

"The lot of a conductor is not an easy one. In the first place he has to find an orchestra to conduct, and orchestras are few, and few conductors die and few resign. In the second place, the early years are certain to be spent almost as much in fighting inimical influences and rivals, and surviving the intrigues that any important position, perhaps, entails—particularly if that position is in an opera house.

"Of course," said Mr. Pasternack, "that is part of the game. That is another kind of technic you have to develop, and a technic you may have to rely on in the early years as much as you rely on your technic of the stick. Who doesn't have to develop this technic? A conductor learns a great deal beside music. And yet, the work of the conductor is so essential and its importance is becoming so generally recognized that if you once show people you know your business and they thoroughly understand that fact, there is always something to do."

Mr. Pasternack was born in Poland in '81. As a boy he became very familiar with the orchestra, as has been shown. He spent two and a half years at the Warsaw Conservatory. He then came to America, without connections, in search of any musical work he might find. Eduoard de Reszke, who had known him as a boy in Europe—as Dr. Muck also knew Mr. Pasternack—found him playing in a cafe, and recommended him as a viola player for the Metropolitan Orchestra. That was the start in America. Pasternack played in the orchestra of the Metropolitan for 11 years. Toscanini became interested in his talent for conducting, and valued his skill as a viola player so much that he obtained a ruling whereby, in his later season, Mr. Pasternack was the first viola player when Toscanini conducted, and was released from duty for the other performances.

Pasternack also conducted very successfully the Sunday night concerts of the Metropolitan, and certain of the performances when the company was on the road. But the openings were too few. He decided to resign his position and get a place as a regular conductor of opera. Four years ago he left the Metropolitan and went to Italy. There he had invaluable experience conducting in various Italian opera houses. In 1912 his record at the Metropolitan commended him for the Century Opera Company, and he conducted there during the two seasons of that company's existence. Last summer he conducted the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in Lavinia Park. From there he came to Boston.

His impressions of Italian music and musicians were unusual. Mascagni he considers a far greater musician, and even technician, than Puccini. The opera "Iris" is to him full of genius. Other operas of Mascagni, such as "Ysabeau," have great music in them. "Compare Masagni's first opera, 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' and compare Puccini's first work for the stage, 'Le Villi'—there is no camparison," said Mr. Pasternack. "One is cheap and flimsy and amateurish; the other is the work of a born master of music drama, full of dramatic feeling, of the most plenteous musical inspiration, and already very individual, not only in his ideas, but his style. Of course, Puccini learned much, and he is very clever. I make one exception in this comparison—Puccini's 'Le Boheme' is a beautiful work of lasting value. Otherwise I see very little in his works. Puccini is infinitely Mascagni's superior in his wise choice of libretti based on works with which the public is already familiar, and in his treatment of his libretti. That is the trouble with Mascagni—his flimsy libretti. But as for his genius—he is worth a hundred Puccinis."

"There are other Italians. Zandonai's 'Francesca da Rimini' is an opera full of talent. Montemezzi has certainly followed an admirable model—Wagner's 'Tristan,' and has shown real talent and very poetical and artistic tendencies in this work. And he is still quite a young man. There ought to come from his pen more important works than 'L'Amore dei Tre Re.' I am not sure, however, whether any Italian ought to try to cultivate the symphonic style of the second act of 'L'Amore.' The symphonic model is certainly not native to the Latin genius, and hitherto the Italians who have attempted to express themselves in this way have come to grief."

The Italian orchestras, he said, were almost without exception very poor. This was partly because of the lack of long opera seasons in Italy, and therefore, of long engagements for the same orchestras in the same opera house. Nor did the Italian public expect as much of its orchestras as other European publics. No finer opera was produced anywhere in the world than the finest performances of the Metropolitan in New York. In America we had wonderful operatic productions, but—how few of them. Two or three great opera companies in the whole country, and very little between them and no opera at all . . . . . Then the bell rang for the rehearsal.

JOSEF PASTERNACK
Conductor at Pops, who tells his views on music to Olin Downes.

---

om TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. e SEP 17 1916
so,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A most interesting announcement is made by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the six concerts it will give in Providence the coming season, beginning Tuesday, Oct. 17. The orchestra, for the first time since it has been coming to Providence, will bring its entire personnel of 100 men when that number is needed by the music on the program. Since the very beginning, the orchestra has been hampered by the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall where the concerts are given. At best, the total number of men that could be accommodated on the stage was between 75 and 80, and if there was a piano soloist this number had to be reduced. To bring this reduction about, the string sections had chiefly to be sacrificed and, as a result, Dr. Muck and his predecessors have been unable to play many modern works requiring a great orchestra which they have felt Providence should hear.

William H. Brennan, the business manager of the orchestra, accompanied by Joseph D. Blaisdell, the superintendent of Symphony Hall, Boston, were in Providence last Wednesday morning and went carefully over the question of enlarging the stage. They find that it is possible to build an extension which will accommodate the entire orchestra without sacrificing but very little of the seating capacity of Infantry Hall. As a result, this work is to be done at once and when the orchestra appears here for its first concert, it will come in full force.

---

n EVENING NEWS
ress: Baltimore, Md.
e
e

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Lyric Theater the coming season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for the option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings. The dates are: November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Baltimore. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

From Providence
Address:
Date or

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A most interesting announcement is made by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the six concerts it will give in Providence the coming season beginning Tuesday, Oct. 17. The orchestra, for the first time since it has been coming to Providence, will bring its entire personnel of 100 men when that number is needed by the music on the program. Since the very beginning, the orchestra has been hampered by the small size of the stage in Infantry hall where the concerts are given. At best, the total number of men that could be accommodated on the stage was between 75 and 80, and if there was a piano soloist this number had to be reduced. To bring this reduction about, the string sections had chiefly to be sacrificed and, as a result, Dr. Muck and his predecessors have been unable to play many modern works requiring a great orchestra which they have felt Providence should hear.

William H. Brennan, the business manager of the orchestra, accompanied by Joseph D. Blaisdell, the superintendent of Symphony hall, Boston, were in Providence last Wednesday morning and went carefully over the question of enlarging the stage. They find that it is possible to build an extension which will accommodate the entire orchestra without sacrificing but very little of the seating capacity of Infantry hall. As a result, this work is to be done at once and when the orchestra appears here for its first concert, it will come in full force.

[6]

TIMES
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 2 4 1916

Music Notes.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's Great Orchestra to Give Four Concerts at Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

This orchestra has again, as its conductor, that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, the great soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest [illegible] violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, [illegible] brillian Russian pianist.

[illegible] concerts will be given under the [illegible]s of the Brooklyn Institute of [illegible] Sciences as in the past.

om CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
te SEP 2 4 1916

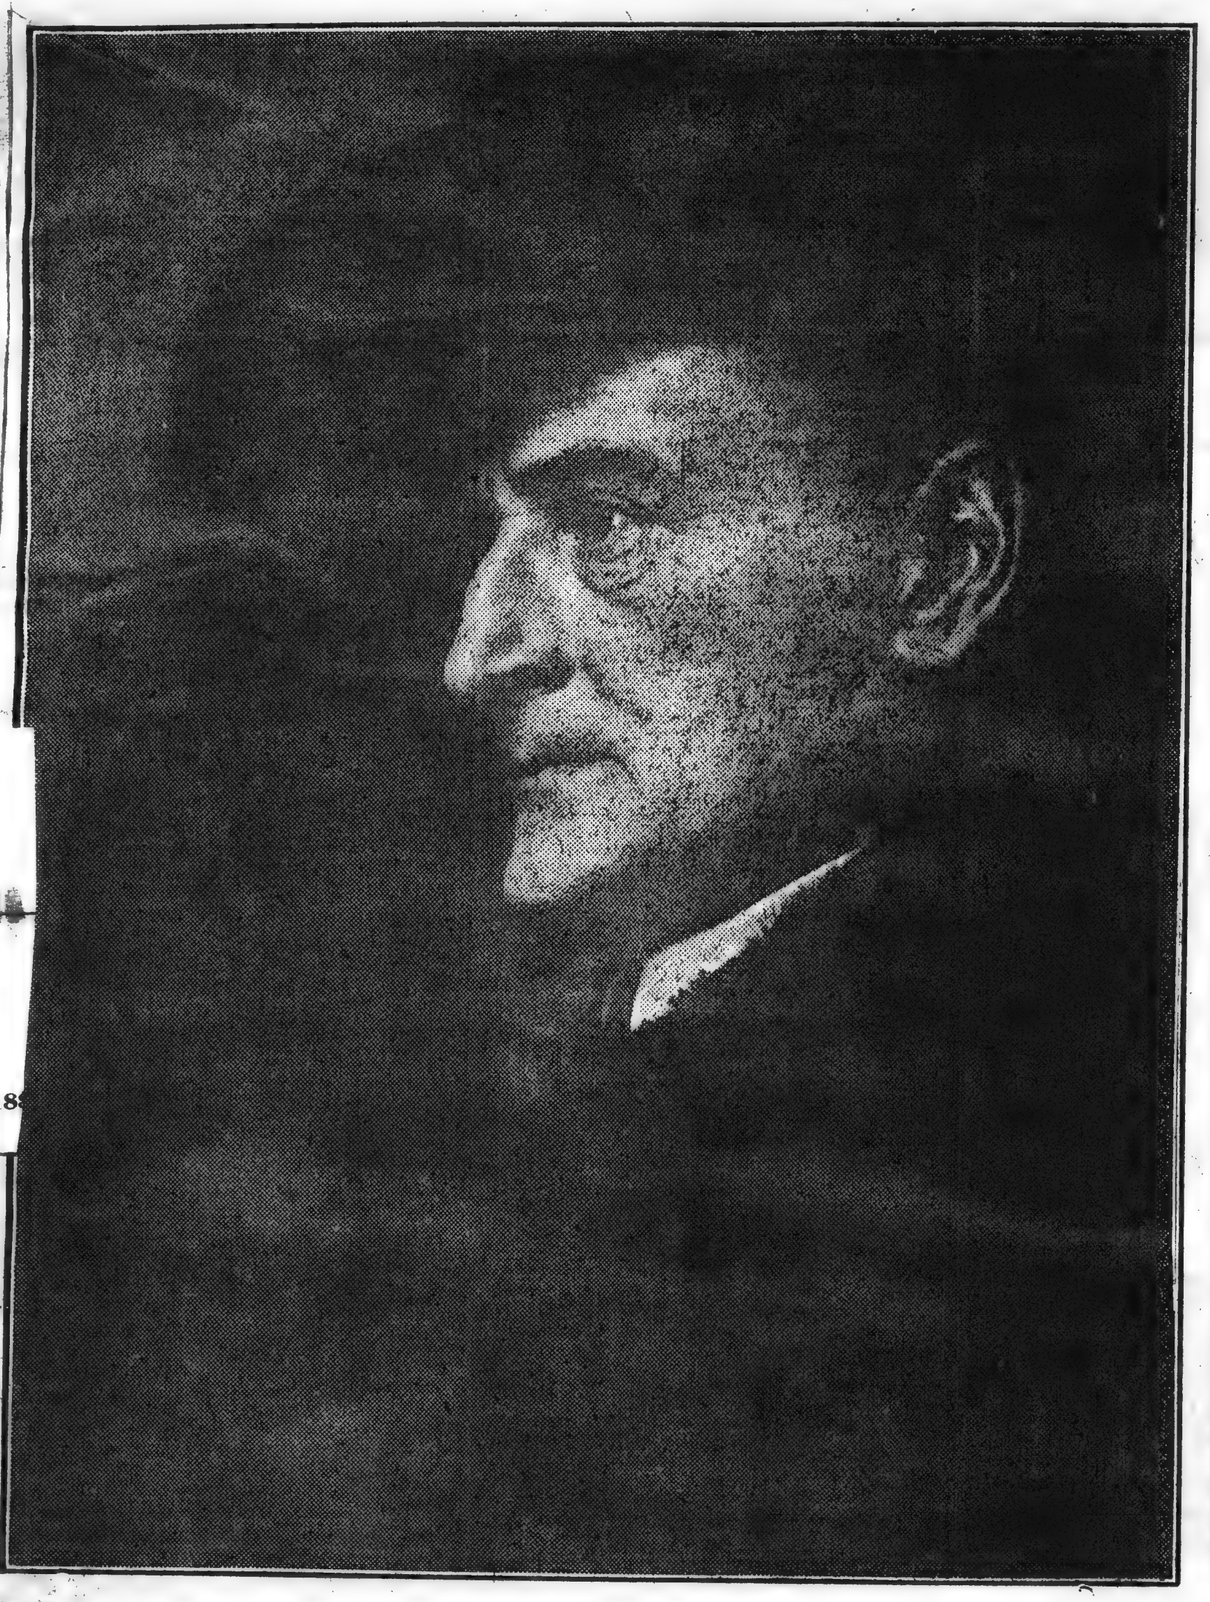
The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 4, Feb. 16 and March 16. This orchestra, it goes without saying, has again as its conductor that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, the great soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brilliant Russian pianist. Others will be added to the list shortly. The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date Sept 23, 1916 SEP 2

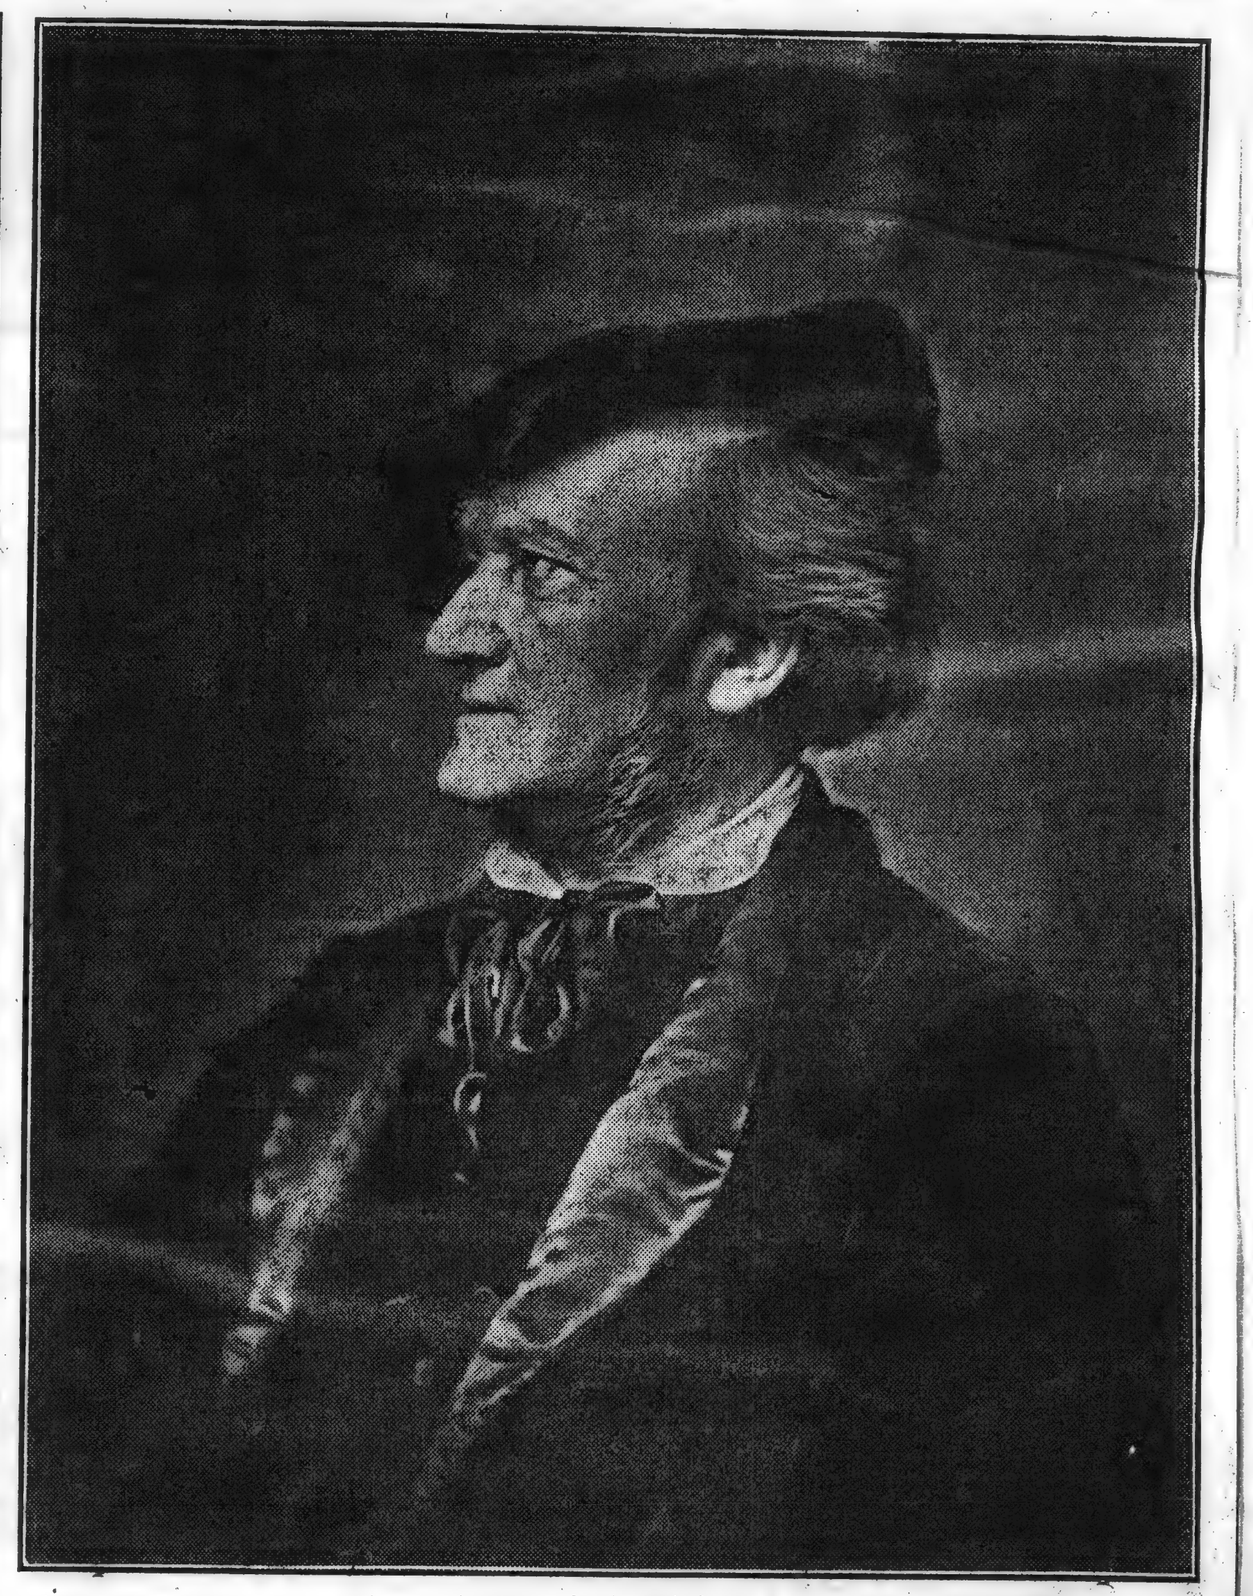
Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Academy on Friday evenings. The dates are: October 20, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1916

Visualizing a Much-Remarked Resemblance



Karl Muck



Richard Wagner

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other, a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era; and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
SEPTEMBER 23, 1916

GRAND MUSICAL SEASON PROMISED

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN ON OCTOBER 13

Emmy Destinn One of Stars—Russian Ballet and Opera Also on List

Boston will have this year the greatest musical season in its history. A superb series of Symphony concerts, an opera season with many interesting novelties and many favorite singers, a short season of Russian ballet, the regular Sunday afternoon concerts that mean musical life for so many Bostonians, new artists as well as old favorites in recitals galore, hotel musicales and various musical entertainments by the Flonzaleys and the Kneisels, the Longy Club, the Apollo Club, the Cecilia, Handel and Haydn and the People's Choral Union make the coming season one of the greatest promise.

The Symphony season is of course of paramount importance. Our unexcelled orchestra takes second place to no visiting organization, and the series of concerts which begin Oct. 13 and end May 5 will be of the usual brilliancy. The orchestra will play 110 concerts between the beginning and the closing of the season. Forty-eight of them will be in Boston.

List of Coming Stars

The new method of disposing of tickets by subscription at fixed prices has been a success. Good seats are still obtainable—especially for the Saturday evening concerts. This year the orchestra will feature more soloists than in many years.

John McCormack will sing with the orchestra, much to the delight of his many local admirers. The ballad singer who has charmed many a Boston audience with songs, it must be confessed not always of the highest order, will appear in a classical program which Dr. Muck is arranging. He is a beautiful singer of Mozart. It will undoubtedly be gratifying to him to be heard in a program of the best music. Other great singers to appear are Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Menalte Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan. Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the Lieder singers, also appear. Pianists to appear are Paderewski, Carl Friedberg, a newcomer; Ernest Schelling, Heinrich Gebhard and Boston's own Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who will play her own concerto. Albert Spalding, the violinist, is another interesting newcomer.

TIMES
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 2 3 1916

Music Notes.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's Great Orchestra to Give Four Concerts at Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

This orchestra has again, as its conductor, that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, the great soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, brillian Russian pianist.

concerts will be given under the s of the Brooklyn Institute of Science as in the past.

om CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

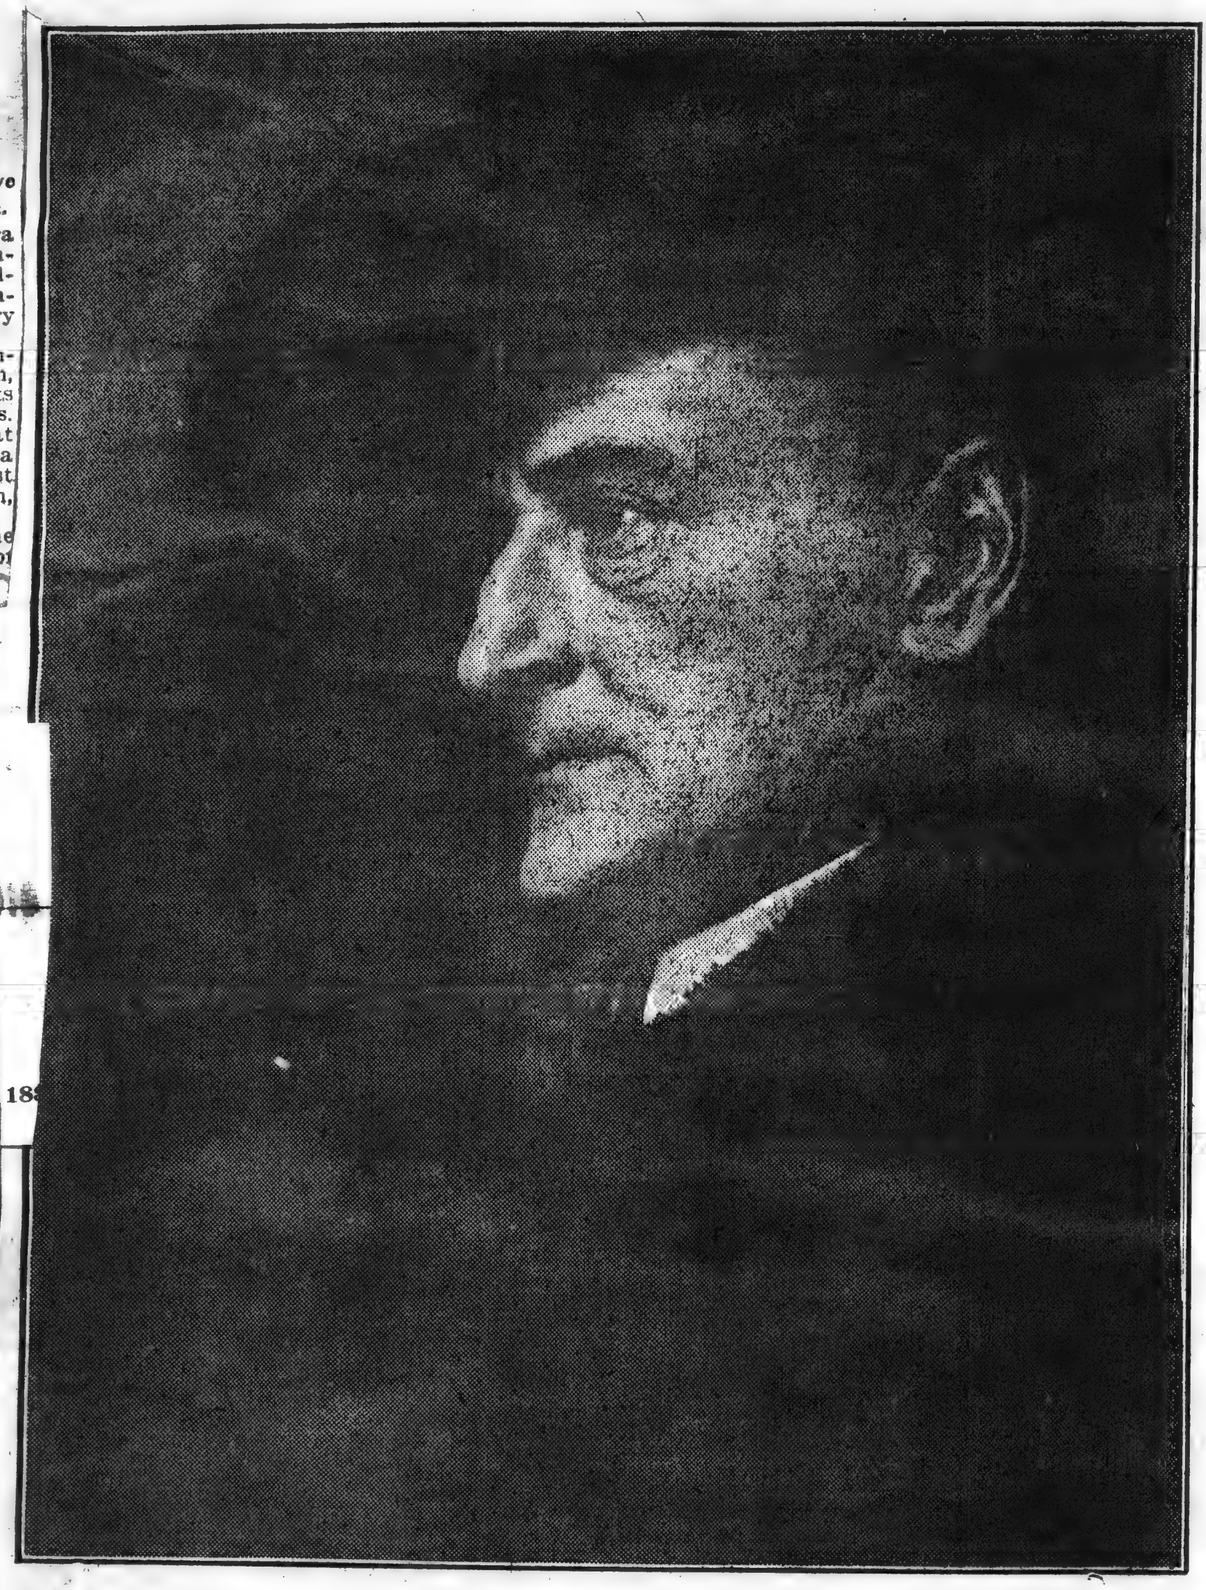
te SEP 24 1916

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 4, Feb. 16 and March 16. This orchestra, it goes without saying, has again as its conductor that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series.

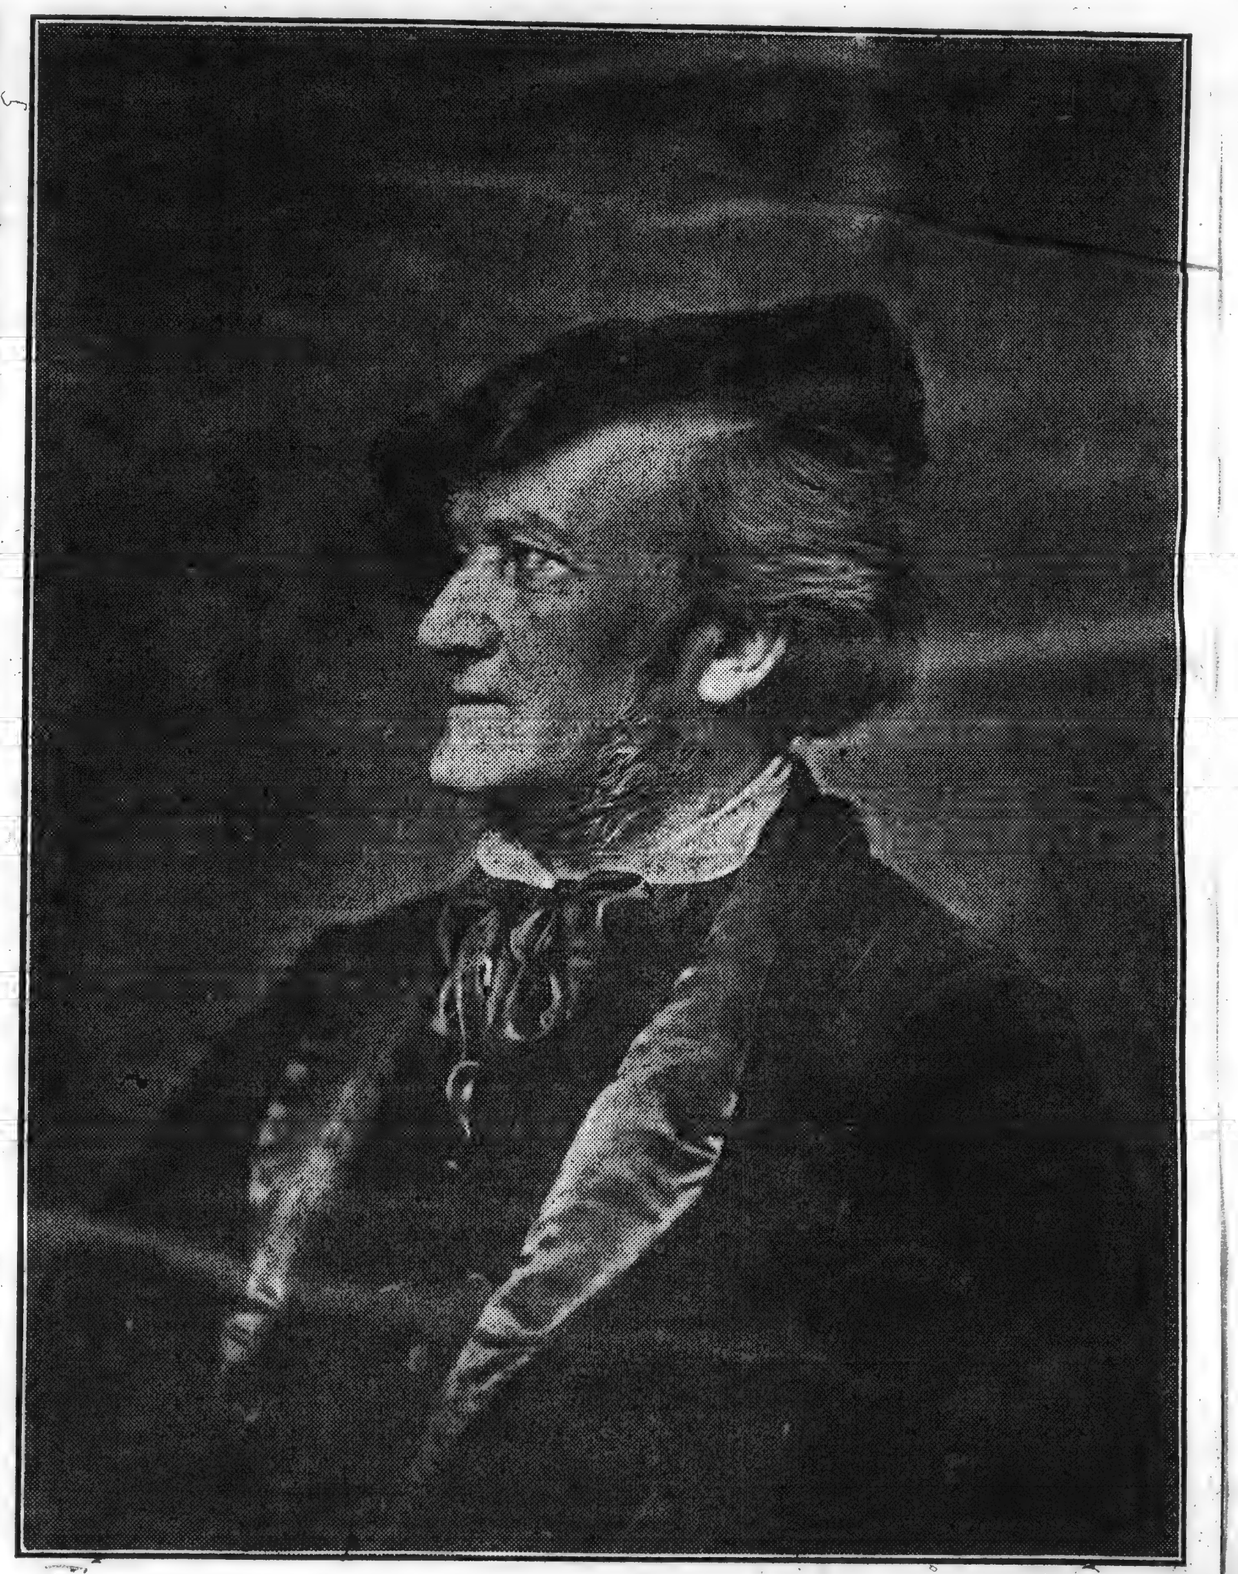
rom EVENING TELEGRA
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate Sept 23, 1916, SEP 2

subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Academy on Friday evenings. The dates are: October 20, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

Visualizing a Much-Remarked Resemblance



Karl Muck



Richard Wagner

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other, a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era; and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
SEPTEMBER 23, 1916

GRAND MUSICAL SEASON PROMISED

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN ON OCTOBER 13

Emmy Destinn One of Stars—Russian Ballet and Opera Also on List

Boston will have this year the greatest musical season in its history. A superb series of Symphony concerts, an opera season with many interesting novelties and many favorite singers, a short season of Russian ballet, the regular Sunday afternoon concerts that mean musical life for so many Bostonians, new artists as well as old favorites in recitals galore, hotel musicales and various musical entertainments by the Flonzaleys and the Kneisels, the Longy Club, the Apollo Club, the Cecilia, Handel and Haydn and the People's Choral Union make the coming season one of the greatest promise.

The Symphony season is of course of paramount importance. Our unexcelled orchestra takes second place to no visiting organization, and the series of concerts which begin Oct. 13 and end May 5 will be of the usual brilliancy. The orchestra will play 110 concerts between the beginning and the closing of the season. Forty-eight of them will be in Boston.

List of Coming Stars

The new method of disposing of tickets by subscription at fixed prices has been a success. Good seats are still obtainable—especially for the Saturday evening concerts. This year the orchestra will feature more soloists than in many years.

John McCormack will sing with the orchestra, much to the delight of his many local admirers. The ballad singer who has charmed many a Boston audience with songs, it must be confessed not always of the highest order, will appear in a classical program which Dr. Muck is arranging. He is a beautiful singer of Mozart. It will undoubtedly be gratifying to him to be heard in a program of the best music. Other great singers to appear are Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Menalte Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan. Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the Lieder singers, also appear. Pianists to appear are Paderewski, Carl Friedberg, a newcomer; Ernest Schelling, Heinrich Gebhard and Boston's own Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who will play her own concerto. Albert Spalding, the violinist, is another interesting newcomer.

TIMES
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music Notes.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's Great Orchestra to Give Four Concerts at Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

This orchestra has again, as its conductor, that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, the great soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brillian Russian pianist.

The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences as in the past.

om CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 4, Feb. 16 and March 16. This orchestra, it goes without saying, has again as its conductor that most brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series.

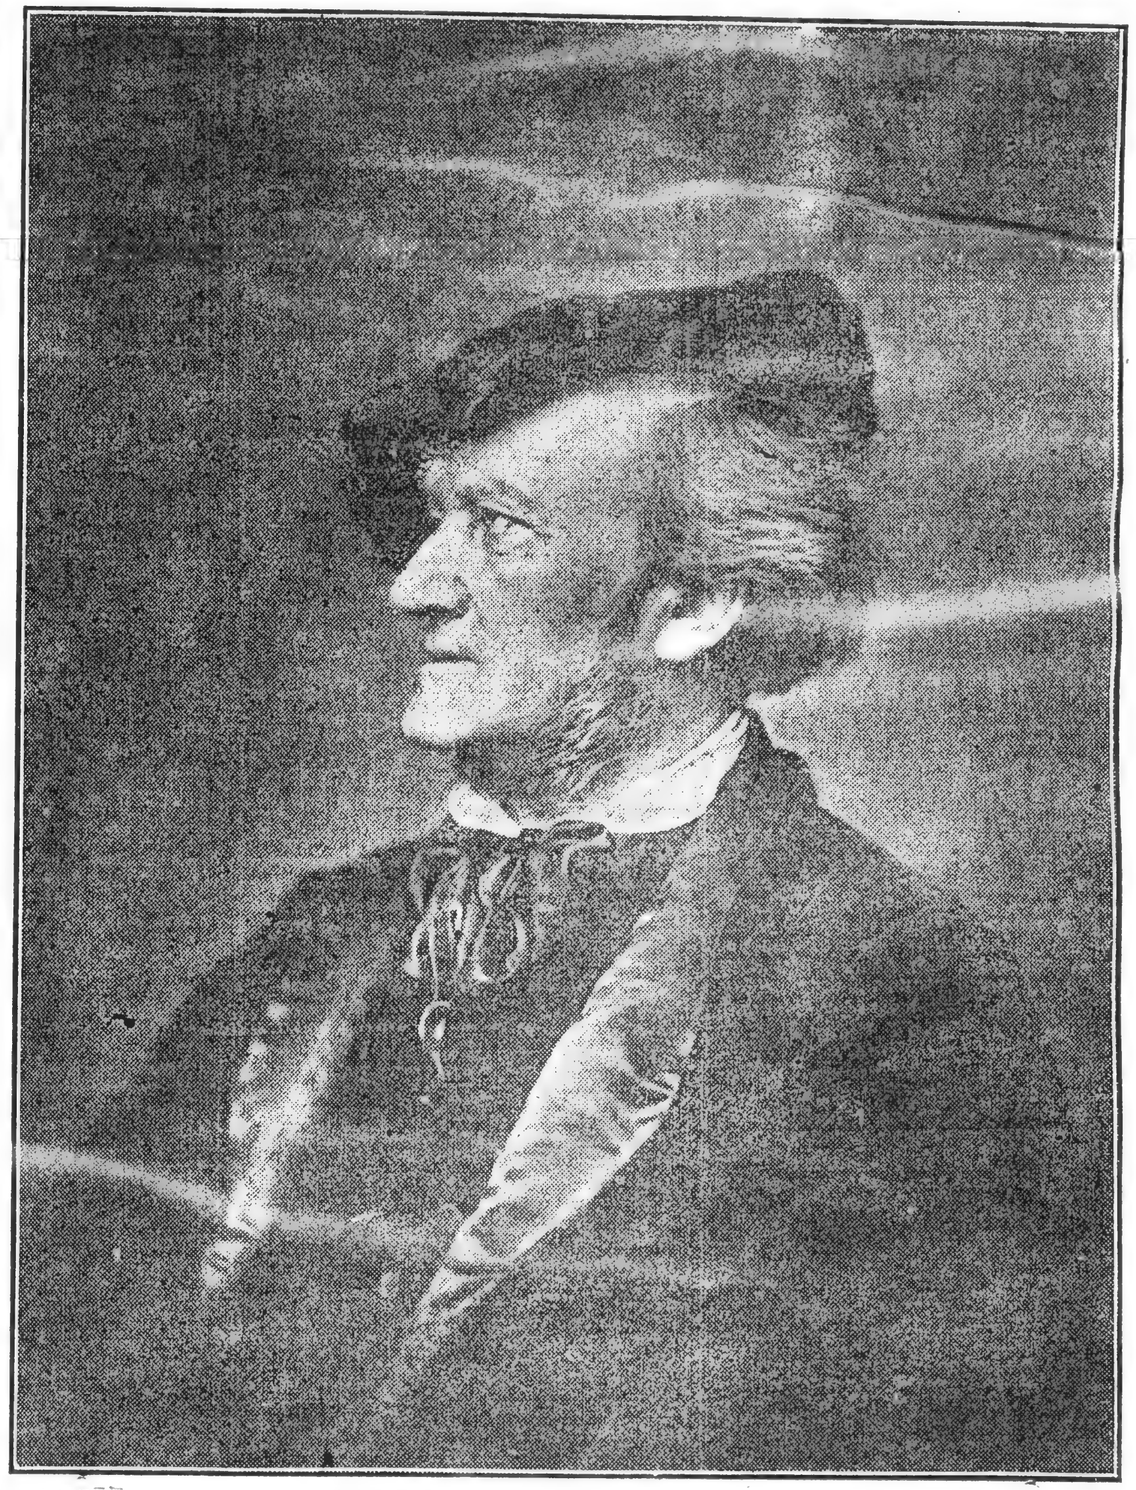
rom EVENING TELEGRA
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Academy on Monday evenings. The dates are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced at soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

Visualizing a Much-Remarked Resemblance

Karl Muck



Richard Wagner

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other, a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era; and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1916

GRAND MUSICAL SEASON PROMISED

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN ON OCTOBER 13

Emmy Destinn One of Stars—Russian Ballet and Opera Also on List

Boston will have this year the greatest musical season in its history. A superb series of Symphony concerts, an opera season with many interesting novelties and many favorite singers, a short season of Russian ballet, the regular Sunday afternoon concerts that mean musical life for so many Bostonians, new artists as well as old favorites in recitals galore, hotel musicales and various musical entertainments by the Flonzaleys and the Kneisicls, the Longy Club, the Apollo Club, the Cecilia, Handel and Haydn and the People's Choral Union make the coming season one of the greatest promise.

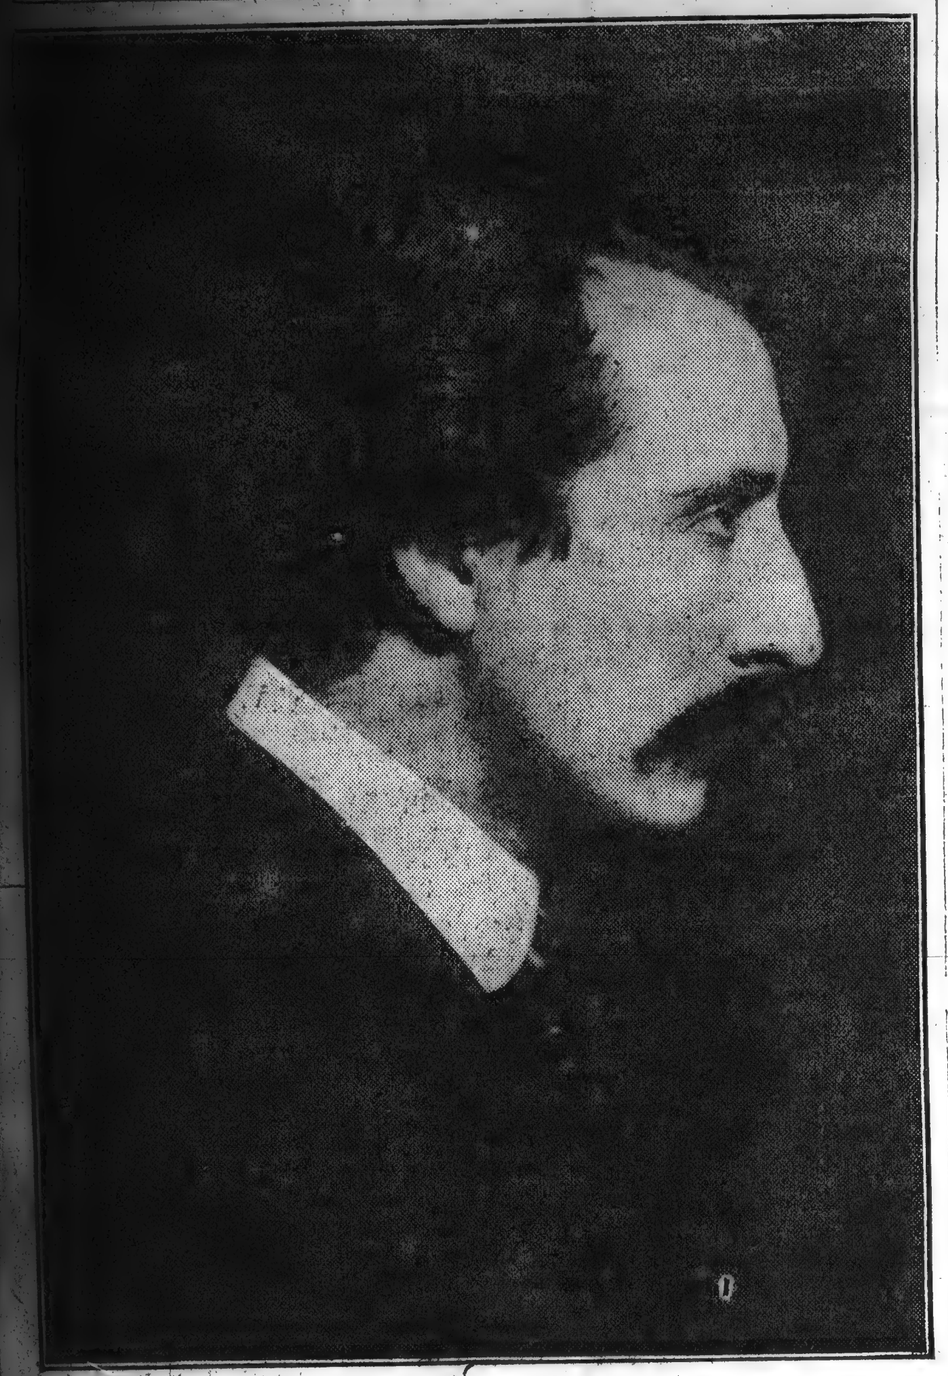
The Symphony season is of course of paramount importance. Our unexcelled orchestra takes second place to no visiting organization, and the series of concerts which begin Oct. 13 and end May 5 will be of the usual brilliancy. The orchestra will play 110 concerts between the beginning and the closing of the season. Forty-eight of them will be in Boston.

List of Coming Stars

The new method of disposing of tickets by subscription at fixed prices has been a success. Good seats are still obtainable—especially for the Saturday evening concerts. This year the orchestra will feature more soloists than in many years.

John McCormack will sing with the orchestra, much to the delight of his many local admirers. The ballad singer who has charmed many a Boston audience with songs, it must be confessed not always of the highest order, will appear in a classical program which Dr. Muck is arranging. He is a beautiful singer of Mozart. It will undoubtedly be gratifying to him to be heard in a program of the best music. Other great singers to appear are Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Menalie Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan. Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the Lieder singers, also appear. Pianists to appear are Paderewski, Carl Friedberg, a newcomer; Ernest Schelling, Heinrich Gebhard and Boston's own Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who will play her own concerto. Albert Spalding, the violinist, is another interesting newcomer.

What Dr. Muck Offers



(Photograph by Ira L. Hill)

Ernest Schelling, Pianist
With Characteristic Oriental Air

At the Sign of the Symphony Concerts

Intact Orchestra, Proved Conductor, Swarming Soloists and Much Novel Music for the New Series

By all precedent of the past, two weeks hence should come the annual sales at auction of seats for a new series of Symphony Concerts. By actual announcement a year ago, there will be no more such sales; while by actual process of last spring and last summer, the public has already preëmpted its places according to the new terms of subscription. With little fuss and less objection this material change in the routine of the concerts has almost accomplished itself. Outside the ticket-agents, who miss a pretty sum in commissions, few regret the abandonment of the outworn, clumsy machinery of the auctions. Most frequenters of the concerts find a new satisfaction in the right to renew their sittings from year to year by the mere filling of a blank and the sending of a cheque, and even to hand them on, as a sort of family heirloom, to their next of kin. Hardly any have complained of the prices newly fixed and they, for the most part, were those who from irresistible instinct would like to haggle at every box-office window and see what sort of bargain they could drive with the ticket-seller within.

The proof of the pudding is the eating and as the diagrams at Symphony Hall now bear witness only a few scattered places remain untaken for Friday afternoons; the lowest-priced seats for Saturday evenings have all been sold—an auspicious sign of the presence of the public that the orchestra most needs; while no more sittings at higher terms are left than the public is likely to absorb in the three weeks before the beginning of the concerts. Admittedly, to increase the subscription for Saturday evenings is one of the few problems that press upon the management. To them it must attract a widening public of newcomers, of the younger generation, of tasters, as it were, of the pleasures of the concerts and the new dispensation in the sale of sittings seems to be helping toward a solution. Perhaps before long a wise direction will see the way clear to subscriptions to a half, a third or a quarter of the evening concerts which is no more than some of the essential public desire or can afford. Not always, either, can they find others to divide with them a subscription for a whole season.

—

So has outworn custom happily vanished from the Symphony Concerts, even if the public of Saturday evenings may not yet receive the fifteen minutes' grace that a beginning at 8.15 instead of the exacting eight would assure them. No longer are the afternoon concerts absurdly called the "rehearsals" that in any real sense of the word they never were; no longer is ticket-buying clogged by the sluggish procedure of auction sales. Yet, in a sense, the routine of the orchestra and the concerts in recent years endures. Thus, between the beginnings on Oct. 13 and 14 next and the endings on May 4 and 5, there will be the usual six intervals in the succession of the twenty-four afternoons and the twenty-four evenings. These "free days" for a faithful public fall on Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1 and 2, Jan. 5 and 6, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17, when the orchestra will be absent on its monthly journeys to New York and southward; and again on Jan. 26 and 27, when sundry cities of the Middle States, from Syracuse and Buffalo to Ann Arbor and Detroit will hear it. As usual it will undertake a series of concerts in various cities of New England—eight in Cambridge, six in Providence and so forth—until the sum of them at home and abroad for the whole season rises to 110. No more are possible or desirable, if conductor and orchestra are to maintain their standards of performance; while in those rigidly sustained standards are the life and the fame of both.

—

The new method of subscription aside, the innovation of the new year is the increase in the number of the "assisting artists." No less than fifteen are to be heard at as many pairs of concerts, while as usual Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack of the violins and Mr. Warnke and Mr. Malkin of the violoncellists will be "soloists" at four more. Contrary to previous custom, the list of engaged singers and virtuosi was published last spring and has since been many times repeated. Each of us, according to inclination, will regret the absence of some eminent name from it—Mr. Thibaud's or Mr. Zimbalist's, Mr. Casals's or Mr. Bauer's—but to include all who deserve or are believed to deserve place, would necessitate forty pairs of concerts or else concerts in which the orchestra provided only discreet interludes and serviceable accompaniments for the nominally "assisting" artists.

As it is, there is no reason to reproach a list that enumerates Mmes. Destinn, Culp, Gerhardt, Gadski and Homer among the established singers; Messrs. Paderewski and Gabrilowitsch among the justly eminent pianists, and adds to them Mr. Kreisler for a violinist of equal and acknowledged rank. In years past the management has sometimes seemed to overlook the rising generation in its choice of "assisting artists." Summoning Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House among the singers, Mr. Spalding among the violinists and Mr. Schelling and Mr. Friedberg among the pianists, it has appreciably abated the reproach. It has proved its courage also in a deserved invitation to Mr. McCormack to the dismay of the superior folk who are sure that high popularity and high artistry may never go hand in hand. Perhaps the tenor's exquisite singing of Mozartean and other eighteenth-century airs may persuade them out of their prejudice. Finally, one resident virtuoso, Mr. Gebhard, and one long associated with Boston, Mrs. Beach, have their places on a truly catholic list, as laudable in its omission of some outworn talents and too familiar presences as in its inclusion of new. Yet at the end, as at the beginning, the surprise is its length. Perhaps the explanation is a desire to signalize the concerts, under new terms of subscription, to a public that is wont to applaud many of these "soloists." Their numbers, wide departure as it is from the policy of a recent past, does not imply any disposition to subordinate to them orchestra, conductor and the music itself.

That orchestra, which Dr. Muck—its most exacting judge—acknowledged last spring was more and more becoming the perfect instrument of his ideal, will sit little changed three weeks hence on the stage of Symphony Hall. A new bassoon-player, who must be quickly chosen, will succeed the dead Sadony and there will be

Continued on Following Page

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Pianist
Photographed at Last in Maturity

BOSTON JOURNAL
SEPTEMBER 23, 1916.

MORE SOLOISTS THAN USUAL ON SYMPHONY LIST

Paderewski, McCormack and Kreisler Among Stars Engaged.

In three weeks the musical season of 1916-17 will be in full swing, for the first pair of Symphony concerts come Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The Friday concerts are even now practically sold out for the season. The sale for the Saturday concerts is already larger than it has often been in the past and the demand for seats is constant. Yet for these concerts good seats are still to be had at all prices except the lowest.

48 Boston Concerts

The Symphony season will run its usual term of 30 weeks, ending May 5. In that time Boston will get its usual 24 pair of concerts. The Fridays and Saturdays omitted because of the orchestra being out of town are Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1, 2, Jan. 5, 6, 26 and 27, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17. A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged—48 for Boston, 10 for New York, 8 for Cambridge, 6 for Providence, 5 each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, 3 each for Hartford and Worcester, 2 each for New Bedford and Springfield, with single concerts in various cities of New England and the Middle West.

It is necessary to search one's memory for many years back to find a season when the management has offered to its patrons a list of soloists so long, so comprehensive and so distinguished as that announced for the season of 1916-1917. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violoncellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving only six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

McCormack a Soloist

The salient feature which strikes the eye in looking over the list is the number of distinguished singers engaged. Of these there are seven, just half of the total number of assisting artists who come from outside the orchestra. Six of these are women. Of these, four are distinguished members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mesdames Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are the most distinguished concert singers of the day, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt.

The seventh singer engaged is John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular singer of the day. In addition to his lovely voice, he is a consummate artist and it is doubtful if there lives today a man or woman who can sing as he can sing, the suave, flowing melodies of the eighteenth century. Lilli Lehmann has called him the greatest singer of Mozart. His appearance at the Symphony concerts will be an event of extraordinary interest.

Mrs. Beach's Return

Of pianists there are six, headed by the master, Paderewski. The others are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Friedberg makes his first appearance here with the orchestra.

Mrs. Beach, who is one of the most talented musicians Boston has produced, has not appeared with the Symphony Orchestra for many years. She will play her own concerto, a work that has not yet been heard here.

The two violinists drawn from outside the orchestra are Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding. Kreisler has become a fixture in the Symphony schedule. Mr. Spalding, whose rise into the front rank of contemporary violinists has been rapid, makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has been spending the summer in Maine. Again, as at the beginning of last year, he warns the Symphony public not to look for too many novelties. He is planning the revival of several very interesting works which have not been heard here for a long time.

dress:

SEP 23 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have only next week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings. The dates are: November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1916

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Pianist
Photographed at Last in Maturity

At the Sign of the Symphony Concerts

Intact Orchestra, Proved Conductor, Swarming Soloists and Much Novel Music for the New Series

By all precedent of the past, two weeks hence should come the annual sales at auction of seats for a new series of Symphony Concerts. By actual announcement a year ago, there will be no more such sales; while by actual process of last spring and last summer, the public has already preempted its places according to the new terms of subscription. With little fuss and less objection this material change in the routine of the concerts has almost accomplished itself. Outside the ticket-agents, who miss a pretty sum in commissions, few regret the abandonment of the outworn, clumsy machinery of the auctions. Most frequenters of the concerts find a new satisfaction in the right to renew their sittings from year to year by the mere filling of a blank and the sending of a cheque, and even to hand them on, as a sort of family heirloom, to their next of kin. Hardly any have complained of the prices newly fixed and they, for the most part, were those who from irresistible instinct would like to haggle at every box-office window and see what sort of bargain they could drive with the ticket-seller within.

The proof of the pudding is the eating and as the diagrams at Symphony Hall now bear witness only a few scattered places remain untaken for Friday afternoons; the lowest-priced seats for Saturday evenings have all been sold—an auspicious sign of the presence of the public that the orchestra most needs; while no more sittings at higher terms are left than the public is likely to absorb in the three weeks before the beginning of the concerts. Admittedly, to increase the subscription for Saturday evenings is one of the few problems that press upon the management. To them it must attract a widening public of newcomers, of the younger generation, of tasters, as it were, of the pleasures of the concerts and the new dispensation in the sale of sittings seems to be helping toward a solution. Perhaps before long a wise direction will see the way clear to subscriptions to a half, a third or a quarter of the evening concerts which is no more than some of the essential public desire or can afford. Not always, either, can they find others to divide with them a subscription for a whole season.

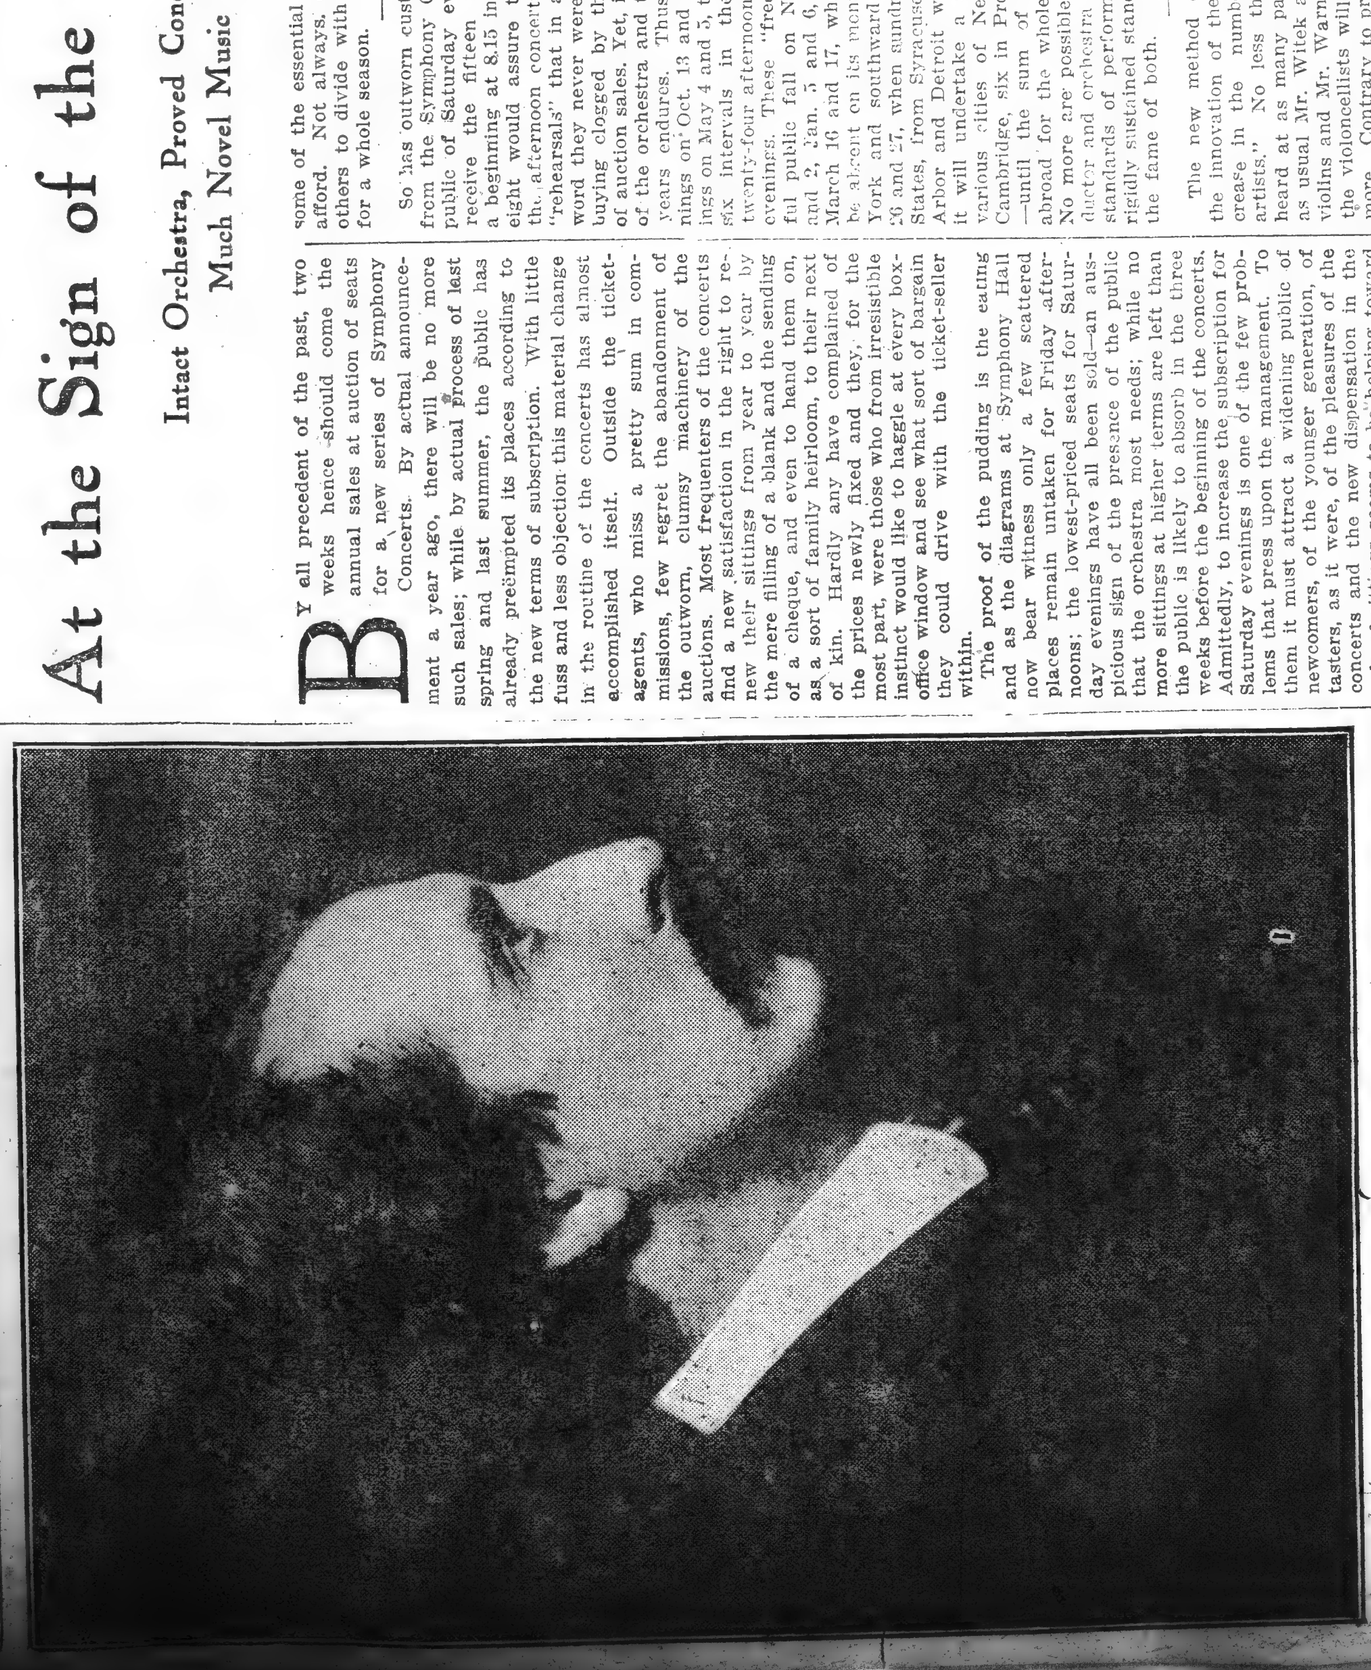
So has outworn custom happily vanished from the Symphony Concerts, even if the public of Saturday evenings may not yet receive the fifteen minutes' grace that a beginning at 8.15 instead of the exacting eight would assure them. No longer are the afternoon concerts in reality called the "rehearsals" that in any real sense of the word they never were; no longer is ticket-buying clogged by the sluggish procedure of auction sales. Yet, in a sense, the routine of the orchestra and the concerts in recent years endures. Thus, between the beginnings on Oct. 13 and 14 next and the ends on May 4 and 5, there will be the usual six intervals in the succession of the twenty-four afternoons and the twenty-four evenings. These "free days" for a faithful public fall on Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1 and 2, Jan. 5 and 6, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17, when the orchestra will be absent on its monthly journeys to New York and southward; and again on Jan. 26 and 27, when sundry cities of the Middle States, from Syracuse and Buffalo to Ann Arbor and Detroit will hear it. As usual it will undertake a series of concerts in various cities of New England—eight in Cambridge, six in Providence and so forth —until the sum of them at home and abroad for the whole season rises to 110. No more are possible or desirable, if conductor and orchestra are to maintain their standards of performance; while in those rigidly sustained standards are the life and the fame of both.

The new method of subscription aside, the innovation of the new year is the increase in the number of the "assisting artists." No less than fifteen are to be heard at as many pairs of concerts, while as usual Mr. Witek and Mr. Malkin of the violins and Mr. Warnke and Mr. Malkin of the violoncellists will be "soloists" at four more. Contrary to previous custom, the list of engaged singers and virtuosi was published last spring and has since been many times repeated. Each of us, according to inclination, will regret the absence of some eminent name from it—Mr. Thibaud's or Mr. Zimbalist's, Mr. Casals's or Mr. Bauer's —but to include all who deserve or are believed to deserve place, would necessitate forty pairs of concerts or else concerts in which the orchestra provided only discreet interludes and serviceable accompaniments for the nominally "assisting" artists.

As it is, there is no reason to reproach a list that enumerates Mmes. Destinn, Culp, Gerhardt, Gadski and Homer among the established singers; Messrs. Paderewski and Gabrilowitsch among the justly eminent pianists, and adds to them Mr. Kreisler for a violinist of equal and acknowledged rank. In years past the management has sometimes seemed to overlook the rising generation in its choice of "assisting artists." Summoning Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House among the singers, Mr. Spalding among the violinists and Mr. Schelling and Mr. Friedberg among the pianists, it has appreciably abated the reproach. It has proved its courage also in a deserved invitation to Mr. McCormack to the dismay of the superior folk who are sure that high popularity and high artistry may never go hand in hand. Perhaps the tenor's exquisite singing of Mozartean and other eighteenth-century airs may persuade them out of their prejudice. Finally, one resident virtuoso, Mr. Gebhard, and one long associated with Boston, Mrs. Beach, have their places on a truly catholic list, as laudable in its omission of some outworn talents and too familiar presences as in its inclusion of new. Yet at the end, as at the beginning, the surprise is its length. Perhaps the explanation is a desire to signalize the concerts, under new terms of subscription, to a public that is wont to applaud many of these "soloists." Their numbers, wide departure as it is from the policy of a recent past, does not imply any disposition to subordinate to them orchestra, conductor and the music itself.

That orchestra, which Dr. Muck—its most exacting judge—acknowledged last spring was more and more becoming the perfect instrument of his ideal, will sit little changed three weeks hence on the stage of Symphony Hall. A new bassoon-player, who must be quickly chosen, will succeed the dead Sadony and there will be

Continued on Following Page



(Photograph by Ira L. Hill)

Ernest Schelling, Pianist
With Characteristic Oriental Air

BOSTON JOURNAL,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1916.

MORE SOLOISTS THAN USUAL ON SYMPHONY LIST

Paderewski, McCormack and Kreisler Among Stars Engaged.

In three weeks the musical season of 1916-17 will be in full swing, for the first pair of Symphony concerts come Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The Friday concerts are even now practically sold out for the season. The sale for the Saturday concerts is already larger than it has often been in the past and the demand for seats is constant. Yet for these concerts good seats are still to be had at all prices except the lowest.

48 Boston Concerts

The Symphony season will run its usual term of 30 weeks, ending May 5. In that time Boston will get its usual 24 pair of concerts. The Fridays and Saturdays omitted because of the orchestra being out of town are Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1, 2, Jan. 5, 6, 26 and 27, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17. A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged—48 for Boston, 10 for New York, 8 for Cambridge, 6 for Providence, 5 each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, 3 each for Hartford and Worcester, 2 each for New Bedford and Springfield, with single concerts in various cities of New England and the Middle West.

It is necessary to search one's memory for many years back to find a season when the management has offered to its patrons a list of soloists so long, so comprehensive and so distinguished as that announced for the season of 1916-1917. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violoncellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving only six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

McCormack a Soloist

The salient feature which strikes the eye in looking over the list is the number of distinguished singers engaged. Of these there are seven, just half of the total number of assisting artists who come from outside the orchestra. Six of these are women. Of these, four are distinguished members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mesdames Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are the most distinguished concert singers of the day, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt.

The seventh singer engaged is John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular singer of the day. In addition to his lovely voice, he is a consummate artist and it is doubtful if there lives today a man or woman who can sing as he can sing, the suave, flowing melodies of the eighteenth century. Lilli Lehmann has called him the greatest singer of Mozart. His appearance at the Symphony concerts will be an event of extraordinary interest.

Mrs. Beach's Return

Of pianists there are six, headed by the master, Paderewski. The others are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Friedberg makes his first appearance here with the orchestra.

Mrs. Beach, who is one of the most talented musicians Boston has produced, has not appeared with the Symphony Orchestra for many years. She will play her own concerto, a work that has not yet been heard here.

The two violinists drawn from outside the orchestra are Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding. Kreisler has become a fixture in the Symphony schedule. Mr. Spalding, whose rise into the front rank of contemporary violinists has been rapid, makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has been spending the summer in Maine. Again, as at the beginning of last year, he warns the Symphony public not to look for too many novelties. He is planning the revival of several very interesting works which have not been heard here for a long time.

n
dress:

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have only next week in which to remit and secure their tickets for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings. The dates are: November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

[8]

Julia Culp.
(C) Aime Dupont, New York.

Elena Gerhardt.

Louise Homer.

Johanna Gadski.
(C) Mishkin, New York.

(Copyright Hartsook.)
John McCormack, Tenor.

Melanie Kurt, Soprano.

Albert Spalding, Violinist.

Carl Friedberg, Pianist.

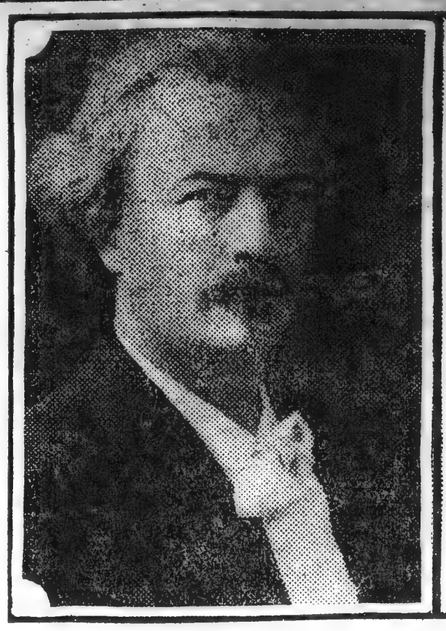
MORNING TELEGRAPH

ess: New York City

SEP 24 1916

Subscribers to both series of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have until October 1 to remit their checks to Boston and take up their tickets. Notices have already been sent out and the greater part of them have already responded. Such tickets as are not taken up by that time will be allotted to applicants, and as there is a waiting list of more than three hundred for each series of concerts, those who wish to save their seats should take note of this fact.

PREMIER STARS OF THE COMING SYMPHONY SEASON



PADEREWSKI
(Photo copyrighted by Hartsook.)

EMMY DESTINN

JOHN M'CORMACK

BOSTON TRAVELER, S. SEPTEMBER 23, 1916.

Symphony Announces Plans for New Season

Unusually Large Number of Soloists Feature of Prospectus—Four to Be Heard for First Time at These Concerts.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The new season for the Boston Symphony orchestra, the prospectus for which, just issued, being the item of the week in musical circles, opens Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The outstanding feature of the prospectus is the large number of soloists engaged, there being 19, practically all stars of the first magnitude, four being heard at these concerts for the first time, and including seven singers, six pianists, four violinists and two 'cellists. In other words, all but five of the 24 pair of concerts will have an assisting soloist. The four artists to be heard for the first time are Melanie Kurt, soprano of the Metropolitan opera company, heard here with the company last season; John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular tenor of the day; Albert Spalding, violinist, who has a following envied by many, and Carl Friedberg, pianist, known here through his successful recitals.

The list of soloists has for singers Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Melanie Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan opera company; Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt and John McCormack. For pianists, Paderewski, Carl Friedberg, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who will play her own new concerto; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling and Heinrich Gebhard. For violinists, Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack of the orchestra, Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding, and for 'cellists, Messrs. Wambe and Malkin of the orchestra.

Important Revivals Coming.

Like a year ago Dr. Muck promises few novelties. It is known, however, that he has several important revivals in mind, works he has never done in Boston.

The orchestra will be away Nov. 3-4, Dec. 1-2, Jan. 5-6 and 26-27, Feb. 16-17 and March 16-17. In addition to the 48 concerts in Boston, New York has 10; Cambridge, eight; Providence, six; Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, five each; Worcester and Hartford, three each; New Bedford and Springfield, two each, with single concerts in various other New England cities. The cities scheduled for the western trip in the end of January are

(Continued on Page D.)

(Continued from Page A.)

Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

The new method of disposing of season tickets by subscription at fixed prices instead of by auction sale is working out to the satisfaction of everybody. The Friday concerts are even now practically sold out for the season, only a few scattered seats at medium prices remaining unsold. The sale for the Saturday concerts is already larger than it has often been in the past and the demand for seats is constant. Yet for these concerts, good seats are still to be had at all prices, except the lowest, $15.

Grand Opera Season.

Still another item of the week is the arrival of the singers of the Boston National Grand Opera Company. Max Rabinoff, managing director, the beginning of rehearsals for the three weeks season to open at the Boston Opera House, Jan. 1, and the quick response of the public to the opening of the subscription list at Steinert's. This response echoes the appreciation of the fulfilment of promises made by Mr. Rabinoff last year when he gave Boston a season never to be forgotten, and the knowledge that he has added materially both to his already strong list of artists and his excellent repertoire.

Cecilia Society.

The Cecilia Society, Chalmers Clifton, conductor, announces three concerts for the coming year, on the evenings of Dec. 14, Feb. 14 and April 12. Rehearsals begin next week, Thursday evening, in Chipman Hall, Tremont Temple, and the works of the first concert, which are of unusual interest, will be taken up. These consist of three pieces, ancient, classic and contemporary. A church cantata by Bach, "Sleepers Awake;" Brahms's "Song of Fate" and a new composition by Frederick S. Converse, "The Peace Pipe," which will be heard for the first time in Boston. An orchestra of 65 symphony players will assist. The second concert Feb. 14, will be held in Jordan Hall, and will be a cappella, with pieces by Palestrina, Vittioria and others. The third concert, on April 12, in Symphony Hall, will mark the presentation of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The Russian Ballet opens a week's engagement at the Boston Opera House Nov. 6.

Efram Zimbalist, violinist, and Emil Gogorza, baritone, are to give a recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Oct. 8, at 3:30.

Widespread interest in the coming series of Tremont Temple concerts is shown in the large number of inquiries already being received.

The closing of the Fall Pops leaves a general desire that they may become an annual affair.

W. R. McDonald of the Steinert building reports exceptional interest being shown by the musical public in his second series of Copley Plaza Musicales. The latest to appear includes the Russian Symphony Orchestra, Mme. Barrientos, the Spanish coloratura soprano; Mme. Edvina, of the Covent Garden and Metropolitan Opera; Povla Frisch, the dramatic soprano; Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan, and Ernest Schelling, the pianist. Announcements of additional artists to complete the series of programs will be forthcoming. There will be eight musicales in the series, as follows: Tuesday afternoons, at 3:15; Dec. 5 and 19, Jan. 2 and 16, Feb. 6 and 20, March 6 and 20.

(Copyright Aime Dupont)
Louise Homer, Contralto Record.
She is equally famous in concert and in opera, and she is a Symphony star of high rank.

[9]

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1916

SOLOISTS FOR THE SYMPHONY SEASON NAMED

List Contains Nineteen of Leading Artists—New Choral Society Enters Field—Older Organizations Announce Plans

The prospectus for the approaching season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begins Oct. 13-14, contains promise of much beautiful and interesting music. There will be the usual 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, the end of the season coming Saturday, May 5. During six weeks of the season, the orchestra will be away and the dates when no concerts will be given are Nov. 3, 4, Dec. 1, 2, Jan. 5, 6, 26 and 27, Feb. 16, 17 and March 16, 17. A schedule of 110 concerts is planned for the orchestra between the opening and close of the season in Boston. In addition to the 48 in Boston, New York has 10, Cambridge eight, Providence six, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, five each; Worcester and Hartford three each, New Bedford and Springfield two each, with single concerts in various other New England cities. The cities scheduled for the western trip in the end of January are Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

The new method of disposing of season tickets by subscription at fixed prices instead of by auction sale is working out, the management says, to the satisfaction of everybody. The Friday concerts are now practically taken for the season, only a few scattered seats at medium prices remaining unsold. The sale for the Saturday concerts is already larger than it has often been in the past and the demand for seats is constant. Yet for these concerts good seats are still to be had, except the cheapest, $15.

The number of soloists engaged for the concerts is as large and as eminent as usual. Altogether 19 soloists are announced for the 24 pairs of concerts. Seven of these are singers, six are pianists, four are violinists and two are violoncellists. The singers are Mmes. Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Melanie Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan opera company; Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, two of the leading concert singers of our time, and John McCormack. Of these singers, two, Mme. Kurt and Mr. McCormack, will be making their first appearance with the Symphony orchestra. Mme. Destinn has appeared with the orchestra but once, and that was several years ago. The others have appeared often.

The list of pianists is headed by the master, Paderewski, whom the war still detains in this country. Included in it is a newcomer to Symphony hall, Carl Friedberg, an artist who has been heard here in recital, and a talented Boston artist who has been absent for many years, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mrs. Beach will play her own concerto. The others will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling and Heinrich Gebhard of this city.

Two violinists come from the orchestra: the concertmaster, Mr. Witek, and his assistant, Mr. Noack. Of the other two, one of course it Fritz Kreisler, who will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the second pair of concerts, Oct. 20-21. The other will be Albert Spaulding, another newcomer among the soloists.

Both the 'cellists on the list are members of the orchestra: Messrs. Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin.

Dr. Muck has been no further away than the coast of Maine during the summer and if the number of scores he has marked and returned to the copyist be a criterion, he has worked much more than he has idled. It is understood that he has planned most thoroughly his scheme of programs for the season, but, according to his custom, he will say little or nothing about them. He promises, however, few novelties. The problem of securing music from abroad is even more difficult than it was a year ago. Yet during last season he was able to present 11 works unknown to the Symphony patrons, no less than seven of these being by American composers. Doubtless he will be able to do as well this year. It is known, however, that he has several important revivals in mind, works he has never done in Boston.

Pop Season Ends

The interesting season of "new pops and operatic concerts" in Symphony hall comes to an end tonight. The success of these has been such that unquestionably concerts of this description will be a feature of the fall season next year, as the pops have been for so many years a feature of the spring season. Tonight's program reminds one of the annual request night in the spring season of pops. All the orchestral works are well-tried favorites, and the four singers are scheduled for the numbers in which they have won the greatest favor in the last three weeks; moreover, the final trio from "Faust" and quartet from "Rigoletto." The program in its entirely is as follows:

March, "Stars and Stripes," Souza; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; "Mon coeur s'ouvre a toi voix," from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns (Miss Snelling); "Toreador Song," from "Carmen," Bizet (Mr. Nicolay); rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; Largo, Handel (violin, Mr. Theodorowicz; harp, Mr. Cella; organ, Mr. Marshall); "Un bel dì," from "Madama Butterfly," Puccini (Miss Sharlow); "O Paradise," from "L'Africaine," Meyerbeer (Mr. Hackett); ballet music from "Giaconda," Ponchielli; waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; trio from "Faust," Gounod (Miss Sharlow, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay); quartet from "Rigoletto," Verdi (Miss Sharlow, Miss Snelling, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Nicolay); overture, Tannhäuser," Wagner.

rom SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
ate SEP 2 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S THREE SOLOISTS

SUBSCRIBERS to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Lyric Theatre the coming season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evenings. The dates are November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Baltimore.

SOCIAL FOLLIES TO BE

rom AMERICAN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
ate SEP 24 1916

worthy.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

This season the Boston Symphony concerts will be five in number, as usual, and given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings. The dates are November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Baltimore.

Symphony Gathers Famed Leaders of Opera and Concert for New Season

Four of the stars who will appear in Boston during the Symphony season.

Boston AMERICAN
SEPT 26, 1916

WITH the season of 1916-1917 the Symphony Orchestra passes into the second half of its third decade and may be said to have reached in years that ripe maturity it long since attained in art. The thirty-sixth season should be the most satisfying in its history. As the concerts of last year showed, Dr. Muck's efforts since his return in 1912 to refine and, at the same time, invigorate the performances of the orchestra have come to their full fruition.

Unusually generous is the management this year in the matter of assisting artists. The published list contains nineteen names of distinguished musicians, seven of whom are singers, six pianists, four violinists and two 'cellists. Of these, four are drawn from the orchestra, Messrs. Witek and Noack, concert master and second concert master, respectively, and Messrs. Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin, who are the leaders of the violoncello section.

The singers are Mesdames Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished concert singers, and John McCormack. The list is most comprehensive.

The first four named rank high in the world of opera and are equally prominent in concert. Messrs. Gadski and Homer have appeared often with the Symphony Orchestra. The voice of Emmy Destinn has been heard but once at Symphony concerts and that several years ago. Mme. Kurt will be a newcomer, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned.

The engagement of Mr. McCormack comes as a just recognition of a consummate artist. The list of pianists is headed by the master, Paderewski, whom the war still keeps in this country. The others are Ossip Gabrilowitsch; the talented American, Ernest Schelling; Carl Friedberg, Heinrich Gebhard and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Friedberg is another artist new to the Symphony concerts. Until the war began Mrs. Beach had for some time been a prominent figure in the musical worlds of Berlin and Munich. She will play a new concerto of her own.

Fritz Kreisler is one of the four violinists engaged. The second is Albert Spalding, who is making his first appearances with the orchestra. Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, the other two, together with Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, the cellist, are among those master musicians who make the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is.

The entire symphony season will run its usual term of thirty weeks, beginning Friday afternoon, October 13, and ending Saturday evening, May 5.

PROMINENT SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

THE SUNDAY HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 24, 1916.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra has sent out the prospectus for the season of 1916-1917. Pictures of artists who will appear at concerts of this season will be found in the rotogravure section of the Herald today.

"For the first time in almost a generation the season of Symphony concerts will not be preceded by four days of auction sales of seats. This method of selling season tickets has been banished to the limbo of things, good in their day, which have outlived their usefulness and its passing has roused no regret. On the contrary, the new plan of selling season tickets for both the Friday and Saturday series by subscription at fixed prices became popular at its very announcement. The plan itself has received no criticism and the scale of prices fixed for both series seems to have been more than generally satisfactory. Moreover, these many constant patrons of the concerts who have always felt a certain proprietary interest in the Symphony orchestra have had that feeling emphasized because through the new method of seat disposal they may at their will become virtually owners of their seats. The possession of seats in one season acts as an option on those seats for the succeeding year and this option renews itself from year to year automatically. The uncertainty of securing again the seats one has had and enjoyed is gone, together with the uncertainty as to the price one must pay for the concerts. If not so picturesque as the auction sales, the subscription is much more practical and satisfactory.

"The response of the public to the new method of sale has been highly gratifying to the management. The Friday concerts are already practically sold out, only a few seats scattered here and there being unsold. For the Saturday concerts the choice of seats is far wider, seats being available at all prices except the lowest, $15. None the less, the sale for this series has been constant and it is the belief of the management that by the opening of the season very few will be left for single sale.

"The season promises to be most exacting in work for the orchestra. Boston will have its usual 24 Friday afternoon concerts and the same number of concerts on the following Saturday evenings, the same program being played at each pair of the series. The opening concert is set for Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, with the first of the Saturday concerts the following evening. The season ends Saturday evening, May 5, thus giving the usual 24 pairs of concerts in 30 weeks. The other six weeks of the season are taken by the customary trips, five to the South and one to the middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season without concerts are Nov. 3-4, Dec. 1-2, Jan. 5-6 and 26-27, Feb. 16-17 and March 16-17.

"A schedule of 110 concerts is planned for the orchestra between the opening and close of the season in Boston. In addition to the 48 in Boston, New York has ten, Cambridge eight, Providence six, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, five each; Worcester and Hartford, three each; New Bedford and Springfield, two each; with single concerts in various other New England cities. The cities scheduled for the western trip in the end of January are Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

"Dr. Muck will again be at the head of the orchestra and it is hoped that he will continue as its conductor for many years to come. It is unnecessary here in Boston again to note the unusual qualities of this gifted man or again to record his remarkable achievements. According to himself, last season, for the first time since his return, he felt the orchestra was reaching the plane of performance he had been striving for and that henceforth he would feel at liberty to attempt things which earlier had seemed impossible. When one remembers the remarkable series of concerts of last season, the promise for the coming year is unusually rich.

"During the summer Dr. Muck has been in Maine, and there he has spent hours each day working on scores in preparation for the season. He promises few novelties. It is impossible to get new music from Europe, and equally impossible to get music which is not new for some revivals he desires; but the library of the Symphony orchestra is rich in scores, and in addition to the 'standard works' of the past he will play a number of works which from the rarity of their performance will count almost as novelties.

"The orchestra itself shows fewer changes in its personnel than it has at the beginning of any season in recent years. Dr. Muck, since his return four years ago, has gradually and effectively eliminated the weak spots that had appeared and now he has it in the condition he has been aiming at. The work of the orchestra last season reached a standard never before attained and the double process of refinement and invigoration which has been going on these last years should bring even more remarkable results the coming season."

The list of soloists is long, comprehensive and distinguished. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the 'cellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

Seven distinguished singers have been engaged. Of these, four are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are celebrated concert singers of the day, Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt. All these singers have appeared here in Symphony concerts, except Melanie Kurt. Miss Destinn has appeared but once. Mme. Kurt, first heard here during last spring's engagement of the Metropolitan opera company, made a particularly favorable impression as Isolde. The seventh singer engaged is John McCormack, the most popular singer of our time. His art is not limited to the ballads which, at his concerts, he sings so gracefully. Lilli Lehmann has called him the greatest singer of Mozart. Felix Weingartner was enthusiastic over his singing the music of "Don Ottavio."

Of pianists, there are six, headed by Paderewski. The others are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Of these, both Messrs. Gabrilowitsch and Schelling appeared with much success last season. Mr. Friedberg has been heard here only in recital and in a Kneisel concert. Mrs. Beach has not appeared with the Symphony orchestra for many years. She will play her own concerto.

The two violinists drawn from outside the orchestra are Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding. Mr. Kreisler, owing to the war, has become an annual feature of the Symphony season. It is said that as long as he is in this country, so long will he appear yearly with the orchestra. Mr. Spalding, whose rise into the front rank of contemporary violinists, has been followed with interest, will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has already many admirers in Boston through his recitals.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

SEPTEMBER 30, 1916.

DR. MUCK HAS FEW NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY

For Obvious Reasons, the Classics Will Dominate the Season.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, expects to return from Maine next week. He has had a restful summer and is not only in good condition physically, but in high spirits.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season, which begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday night, Oct. 14. He has had with him a large number of works he has never done in Boston.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius; a symphony called "Vita," by Noren, whose "Kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago; Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for Strings," op. 133, and Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar." The Beethoven fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar," one of the most beautiful works of Russian composers, was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music and was played during the performances last winter of the Ballet Russe.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Other novelties may be expected, but classic works will make up the bulk of the programs. Novelties are scarce, and for obvious reasons.

Emmy Destinn

Famous "Butterfly," "Tosca" and "Aida," fine star for the Symphony.

36th Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 36th season of the Symphony Orchestra opens with the concerts on Friday afternoon, Oct 13, and Saturday evening, Oct 14. For the first time in almost a generation the season will not be ushered in by the picturesque auction sales of season tickets, which have in the past filled four days of the week preceding the first concerts. Such sales have gone forever, for the good results and the general satisfaction which come from the new method of selling by subscription at fixed prices far surpass the biggest expectations of Mr Ellis, the manager, whose decision made the change possible. Over 75 percent of the holders of seats last season renewed their subscriptions for 1916-1917.

There are a few, very few, scattered seats for the Friday concerts, these at the intermediate prices. For the Saturday concerts already the sale is as large as it has been many years after the auctions, and the prospects are that by Oct 14 very few seats will be left. At present, seats may be secured at all the different prices except the lowest, $15.

The full season of the Symphony Orchestra beginning Oct 13-14 will run for 30 weeks, ending May 4-5. In this time, a total of 110 concerts will be given, 24 pairs in Boston on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings; 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, six in Providence, five each in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brookline, three each in Worcester and Hartford, two each in New Bedford and Springfield, the remainder being single concerts in New England and in cities of the Middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season when there will be no concerts are Nov 3-4, Dec 1-2, Jan 5-6 and 26-27, Feb 16-17 and March 16-17.

The remarkable achievements of last Winter should be more than duplicated in the approaching season. The personnel of the orchestra shows fewer changes than it has at the beginning of any season since Mr Gericke's time. It is now a perfectly disciplined, united body of master musicians.

Dr Muck has been spending the Summer in Maine. Judging from the number of scores he has had with him and returned to the copyist, he has mapped out his plans for the season with much greater thoroughness than ever before. Music printing is languishing during the war and it is quite impossible to secure new music from Central Europe. None the less, it will be remembered that despite Dr Muck's warning a year ago, he presented during the season no less than 11 works which were new to Boston, seven of these being by Americans.

Unusually interesting is the list of soloists who are engaged for the season. Of these there are seven, six women and one man. Of the women, four are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, Mmes Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two, Mmes Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, confine themselves entirely to the concert stage. All of these artists, except Mmes Destinn and Kurt, have in years past frequently been soloists at the Symphony concerts and are held in great favor. Emmy Destinn has appeared as soloist but once, and that several years ago; while Mme Kurt appeared for the first time in Boston last Spring as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and is one of the newcomers of the Symphony season.

The seventh singer engaged is none other than John McCormack. This will be his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr Muck is arranging for this occasion a classical program with Mr McCormack to sing airs by Mozart.

There will be six pianists, headed by the master, Paderewski. These are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs H. H. A. Beach. Of these, the newcomer at the Symphony concerts is Carl Friedberg, who has made a most favorable impression in recital here. There will be a very warm welcome for Mrs H. H. A. Beach, that most talented Boston woman, who returns after an absence from the Symphony concerts of 16 years.

In addition to the two violinists of the orchestra, Messrs Witek and Noack, there will be two other violin soloists, Fritz Kreisler, who will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the second pair of concerts, Oct 20-21. The other will be that most admirable American artist, Albert Spalding, who will make his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra.

The violoncello will be represented by Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin, who are among the chief ornaments of the Symphony Orchestra.

Use the best advertising

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra has sent out the prospectus for the season of 1916-1917. Pictures of artists who will appear at concerts of this season will be found in the rotogravure section of the Herald today.

"For the first time in almost a generation the season of Symphony concerts will not be preceded by four days of auction sales of seats. This method of selling season tickets has been banished to the limbo of things, good in their day, which have outlived their usefulness and its passing has roused no regret. On the contrary, the new plan of selling season tickets for both the Friday and Saturday series by subscription at fixed prices became popular at its very announcement. The plan itself has received no criticism and the scale of prices fixed for both series seems to have been more than generally satisfactory. Moreover, these many constant patrons of the concerts who have always felt a certain proprietary interest in the Symphony orchestra have had that feeling emphasized because through the new method of seat disposal they may at their will become virtually owners of their seats. The possession of seats in one season acts as an option on those seats for the succeeding year and this option renews itself from year to year automatically. The uncertainty of securing again the seats one has had and enjoyed is gone, together with the uncertainty as to the price one must pay for the concerts. If not so picturesque as the auction sales, the subscription is much more practical and satisfactory.

"The response of the public to the new method of sale has been highly gratifying to the management. The Friday concerts are already practically sold out, only a few seats scattered here and there being unsold. For the Saturday concerts the choice of seats is far wider, seats being available at all prices except the lowest, $15. None the less, the sale for this series has been constant and it is the belief of the management that by the opening of the season very few will be left for single sale.

"The season promises to be most exacting in work for the orchestra. Boston will have its usual 24 Friday afternoon concerts and the same number of concerts on the following Saturday evenings, the same program being played at each pair of the series. The opening concert is set for Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, with the first of the Saturday concerts the following evening. The season ends Saturday evening, May 5, thus giving the usual 24 pairs of concerts in 30 weeks. The other six weeks of the season are taken by the customary trips, five to the South and one to the middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season without concerts are Nov. 3-4, Dec. 1-2, Jan. 5-6 and 26-27, Feb. 16-17 and March 16-17.

"A schedule of 110 concerts is planned for the orchestra between the opening and close of the season in Boston. In addition to the 48 in Boston, New York has ten, Cambridge eight, Providence six, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, five each; Worcester and Hartford, three each; New Bedford and Springfield, two each; with single concerts in various other New England cities. The cities scheduled for the western trip in the end of January are Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

"Dr. Muck will again be at the head of the orchestra and it is hoped that he will continue as its conductor for many years to come. It is unnecessary here in Boston again to note the unusual qualities of this gifted man or again to record his remarkable achievements. According to himself, last season, for the first time since his return, he felt the orchestra was reaching the plane of performance he had been striving for and that henceforth he would feel at liberty to attempt things which earlier had seemed impossible. When one remembers the remarkable series of concerts of last season, the promise for the coming year is unusually rich.

"During the summer Dr. Muck has been in Maine, and there he has spent hours each day working on scores in preparation for the season. He promises few novelties. It is impossible to get new music from Europe, and equally impossible to get music which is not new for some revivals he desires; but the library of the Symphony orchestra is rich in scores, and in addition to the 'standard works' of the past he will play a number of works which from the rarity of their performance will count almost as novelties.

"The orchestra itself shows fewer changes in its personnel than it has at the beginning of any season in recent years. Dr. Muck, since his return four years ago, has gradually and effectively eliminated the weak spots that had appeared and now he has it in the condition he has been aiming at. The work of the orchestra last season reached a standard never before attained and the double process of refinement and invigoration which has been going on these last years should bring even more remarkable results the coming season."

The list of soloists is long, comprehensive and distinguished. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the 'cellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

Seven distinguished singers have been engaged. Of these, four are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are celebrated concert singers of the day, Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt. All these singers have appeared here in Symphony concerts, except Melanie Kurt. Miss Destinn has appeared but once. Mme. Kurt, first heard here during last spring's engagement of the Metropolitan opera company, made a particularly favorable impression as Isolde. The seventh singer engaged is John McCormack, the most popular singer of our time. His art is not limited to the ballads which, at his concerts, he sings so gracefully. Lilli Lehmann has called him the greatest singer of Mozart. Felix Weingartner was enthusiastic over his singing the music of "Don Ottavio."

Of pianists, there are six, headed by Paderewski. The others are Carl Fried-

PROMINENT SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Emmy Destinn

Famous "Butterfly," "Tosca" and "Aida," fine star for the Symphony.

36th Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 36th season of the Symphony Orchestra opens with the concerts on Friday afternoon, Oct 13, and Saturday evening, Oct 14. For the first time in almost a generation the season will not be ushered in by the picturesque auction sales of season tickets, which have in the past filled four days of the week preceding the first concerts. Such sales have gone forever, for the good results and the general satisfaction which come from the new method of selling by subscription at fixed prices far surpass the biggest expectations of Mr Ellis, the manager, whose decision made the change possible. Over 75 percent of the holders of seats last season renewed their subscriptions for 1916-1917.

There are a few, very few, scattered seats for the Friday concerts, these at the intermediate prices. For the Saturday concerts already the sale is as large as it has been many years after the auctions, and the prospects are that by Oct 14 very few seats will be left. At present, seats may be secured at all the different prices except the lowest, $15.

The full season of the Symphony Orchestra beginning Oct 13-14 will run for 30 weeks, ending May 4-5. In this time, a total of 110 concerts will be given, 24 pairs in Boston on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings; 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, six in Providence, five each in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brookline, three each in Worcester and Hartford, two each in New Bedford and Springfield, the remainder being single concerts in New England and in cities of the Middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season when there will be no concerts are Nov 3-4, Dec 1-2, Jan 5-6 and 26-27, Feb 16-17 and March 16-17.

The remarkable achievements of last Winter should be more than duplicated in the approaching season. The personnel of the orchestra shows fewer changes than it has at the beginning of any season since Mr Gericke's time. It is now a perfectly disciplined, united body of master musicians.

Dr Muck has been spending the Summer in Maine. Judging from the number of scores he has had with him and returned to the copyist, he has mapped out his plans for the season with much greater thoroughness than ever before. Music printing is languishing during the war and it is quite impossible to secure new music from Central Europe. None the less, it will be remembered that despite Dr Muck's warning a year ago, he presented during the season no less than 11 works which were new to Boston, seven of these being by Americans.

Unusually interesting is the list of soloists who are engaged for the season. Of these there are seven, six women and one man. Of the women, four are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, Mmes Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two, Mmes Julia Clup and Elena Gerhardt, confine themselves entirely to the concert stage. All of these artists, except Mmes Destinn and Kurt, have in years past frequently been soloists at the Symphony concerts and are held in great favor. Emmy Destinn has appeared as soloist but once, and that several years ago; while Mme Kurt appeared for the first time in Boston last Spring as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and is one of the newcomers of the Symphony season.

The seventh singer engaged is none other than John McCormack. This will be his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr Muck is arranging for this occasion a classical program with Mr McCormack to sing airs by Mozart.

There will be six pianists, headed by the master, Paderewski. These are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs H. H. A. Beach. Of these, the newcomer at the Symphony concerts is Carl Friedberg, who has made a most favorable impression in recital here. There will be a very warm welcome for Mrs H. H. A. Beach, that most talented Boston woman, who returns after an absence from the Symphony concerts of 16 years.

In addition to the two violinists of the orchestra, Messrs Witek and Noack, there will be two other violin soloists, Fritz Kreisler, who will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the second pair of concerts, Oct 20-21. The other will be that most admirable American artist, Albert Spalding, who will make his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra.

The violoncello will be represented by Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin, who are among the chief ornaments of the Symphony Orchestra.

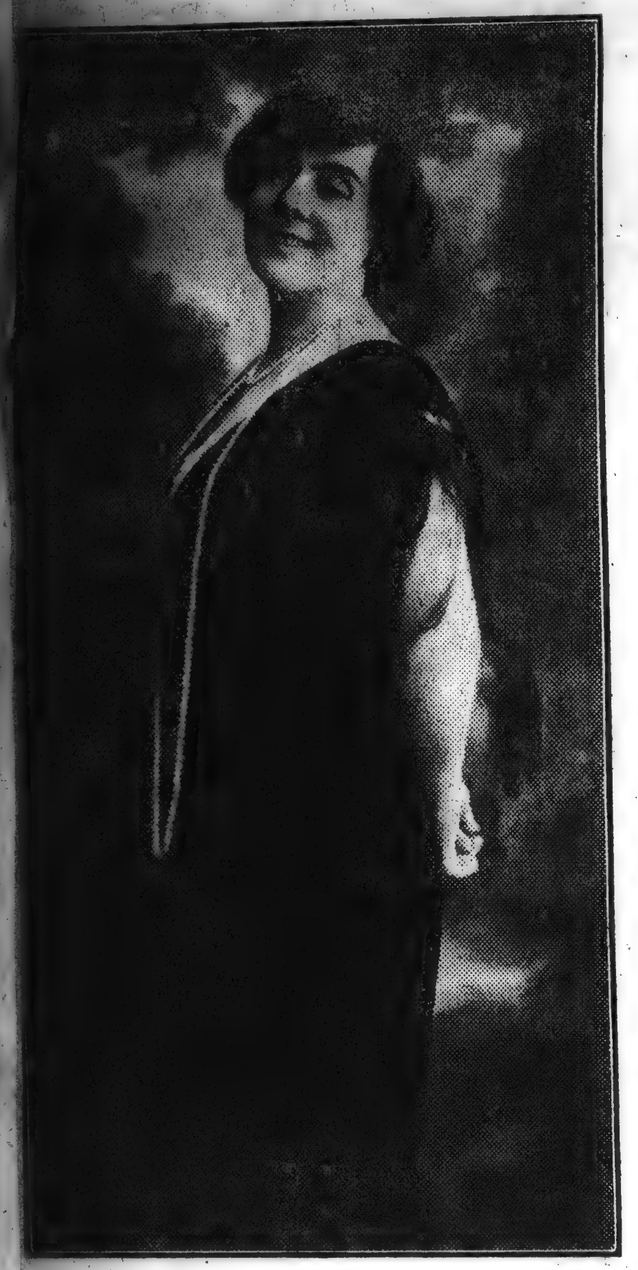
Use the best advertising

DAILY NEWS PICTORIAL

Boston Evening Record

TUESDAY SEPTEMBER 26, 1916

Notable Boston Symphony Soloists for Coming Year—War Scenes of Europe and New York—Other Pictures of Interest



Julia Culp

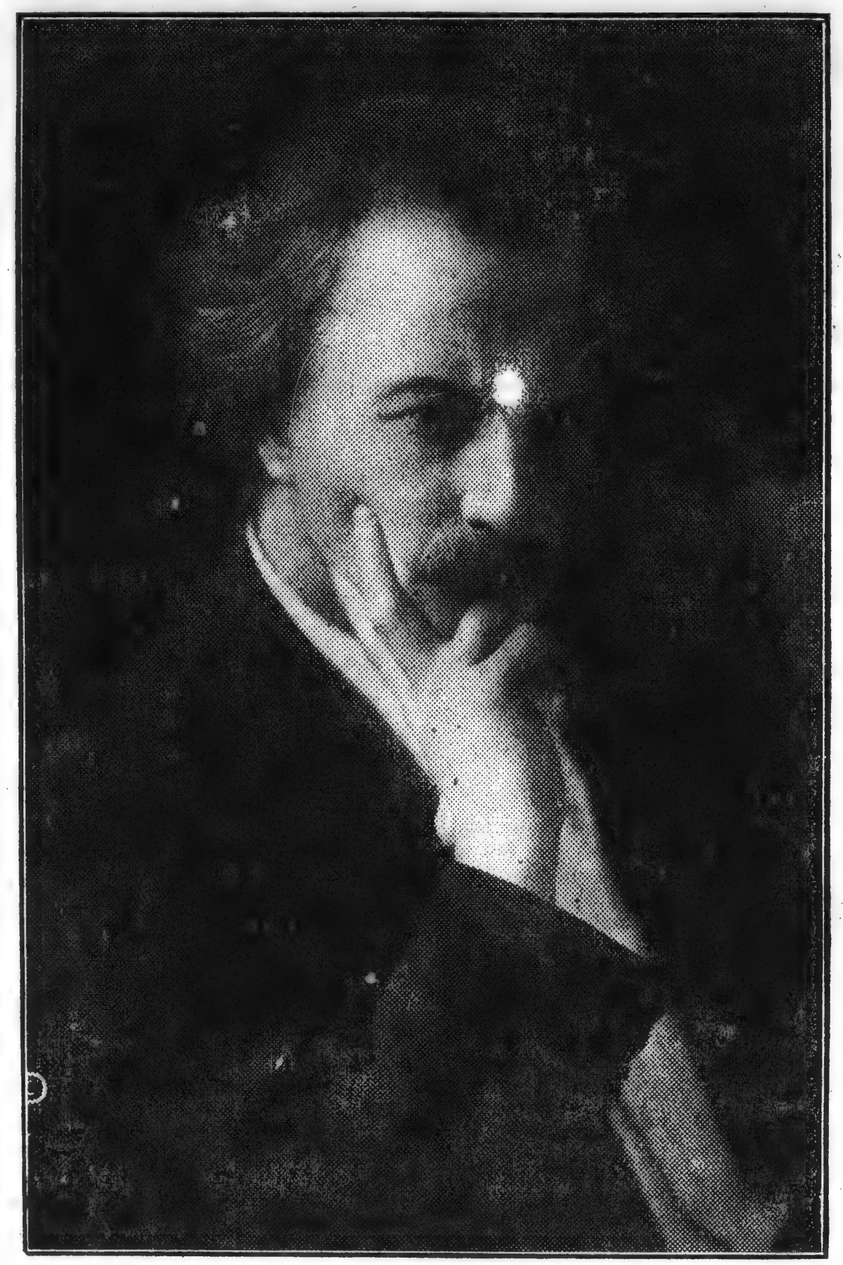
Lieder singer, Symphony soloist, who took musical America by storm

ARTHUR FRIEDBERG.
Noted pianist, one of the newcomers with the Boston orchestra.

(White Sudio.)
MELANIE KURT.
Soprano who made Boston debut last winter. She returns this winter.

FRITZ KREISLER.
Most popular violinist who visits Boston, music followers will tell you.

ALBERT SPALDING.
American violinist, who plays for the first time with the Symphony.



(Copyright Hartsook)
Prince of Pianists

Paderewski, the incomparable, who has been kept in this country by the war—lucky country.

ELENA GERHARDT.
Well known lieder singer, rival of popular Julia Culp.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.
One of the several pianists to appear with the Boston Symphony.

(Copyright Hill, N. Y. C.)
JOHN McCORMACK.
Irish singer to make Symphony debut in classical program.

ERNEST SCHELLING.
The noted composer now summering at Bar Harbor.

Mme. Johanna Gadski

For many years at the Metropolitan, to sing under Dr. Muck's baton.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SEPTEMBER 30, 1916

More Plans for Musical Season Out

Dr. Muck Enlarges on Symphony Prospectus; Opera, Concerts and Recitals.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

With approach of the opening of the new musical season come announcements from the various managers of their plans for Boston offerings. We have already had the Boston Symphony orchestra prospectus, Max Rabinoff's plans for a three weeks' season of grand opera at the Boston Opera House in January by the Boston-National Grand Opera Company, the Cecilia and the Aborn opera season at the Boston Opera House next month.

Now come further announcements regarding the Symphony season, word regarding the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, the annual series of concerts and recitals in Jordan Hall, additional details regarding the Rabinoff season and also the Aborn season.

Manager Midgett announces that the Sunday afternoon concerts for Symphony Hall will begin Oct. 22, and for the most part will have two or more artists for each concert, public taste having shown a preference for such arrangement. Thus the first concert will be given by Frances Alda and De Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Company, artists who need no introduction to Boston. They will be assisted by a band of Symphony players under Joseph Pasternack, the conductor who made such a favorable impression as leader at the fall Pops. Then will follow Fritz Kreisler on Oct. 29, Alma Gluck, with assisting artists for Nov. 5, Paderewski for Nov. 12 and the first of the Pension Fund concerts for Nov. 19. Other artists to appear at these concerts during the season include, Julia Culp, Jacques Thibaud, young Russian pianist, comes Thursday, Oct. 19, and Mme. Carreno, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 21. Hall

Other artists on the Jordan Hall schedule include: Harold Bauer, Zimbalist, Kitty Cheatham, Julia Culp, Albert Spalding, Percy Grainger, Marie Van Dresser, James Friskin, Joseph Malkin, Germaine Schnitzer, Alice Van Bartzen, Nicola Ouhlkanoff, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, the Witek-Malkin trio, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveur, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, Oliver Denton, Roderick White and Charles Cooper.

Dr. Muck's Plans.

Dr. Muck today announces four orchestral works to be given for the first time at the Symphony concerts for the coming season, as follows: The symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by Sibelius; the symphony "Vita," by Noren; Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for Strings," op. 133, and Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar." Among revivals planned are a symphony by Ernest Chausson, Cesar Franck's "Psyche," Tschaikowsky's "Tempest," and orchestral suite op. 43, Busoni's suite "Turandot," Hugo Wolf's Italian serenade and Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein." He also plans to produce Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's overture, Dvorak's "Nature," "Corsair" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade," Tschaikowsky's "Serenade for Strings," and George Schumann's "Variations" and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first novelty comes with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra.

Cambridge Concerts.

The annual series of eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, March 22 and April 26. The soloists will include Emmy Destinn, Susan Miller, a promising mezzo-soprano; Fritz Kreisler, Irma Seydel, Ernest Schelling, Claire Forbes, Nash, pianist, and Charles Francis Subscribers have until Oct. 9 to secure their seats. Those not taken will be put on public sale Oct. 14.

[12]

DAILY NEWS PICTORIAL

Boston Evening Record

TUESDAY
SEPTEMBER 26, 1916

Notable Boston Symphony Soloists for Coming Year—War Scenes of Europe and New York—Other Pictures of Interest

Lydia Culp

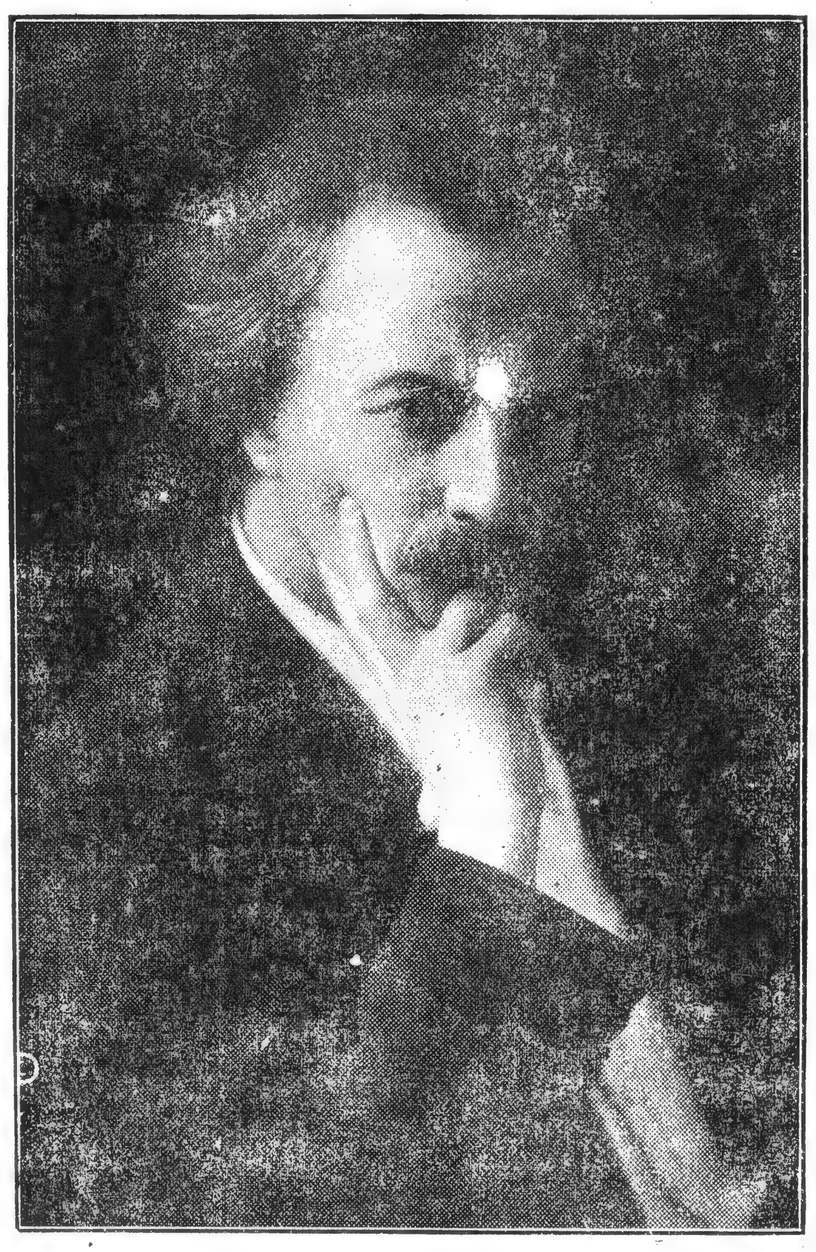
Lieder singer, Symphony soloist, who took musical America by storm

ARTHUR FRIEDBERG.
Noted pianist, one of the newcomers with the Boston orchestra.

(White Sudio.)
MELANIE KURT.
Soprano who made Boston debut last winter. She returns this winter.

FRITZ KREISLER.
Most popular violinist who visits Boston, music followers will tell you.

ALBERT SPALDING.
American violinist, who plays for the first time with the Symphony.



(Copyright Hartsook)
Prince of Pianists

Paderewski, the incomparable, who has been kept in this country by the war—lucky country.

ELENA GERHARDT.
Well known lieder singer, rival of popular Julia Culp.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.
One of the several pianists to appear with the Boston Symphony.

(Copyright Hill, N. Y. C.)
JOHN McCORMACK.
Irish singer to make Symphony debut in classical program.

ERNEST SCHELLING.
The noted composer now summering at Bar Harbor.

Mme. Johanna Gadski

For many years at the Metropolitan, to sing under Dr. Muck's baton.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 30, 1916

More Plans for Musical Season Out

Dr. Muck Enlarges on Symphony Prospectus; Opera, Concerts and Recitals.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

With approach of the opening of the next musical season come announcements from the various managers of their plans for listed offerings. We have already had the Boston Symphony orchestra prospectus, Max Rabinoff's plans for a three weeks' season of grand opera at the Boston Opera House in January by the Boston National Grand Opera Company, the Boston and the Wood opera season at the Boston Opera House next month.

Now comes a larger concrete concrete regarding the Symphony season, word regarding the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, the annual series of recitals and special concerts in Jordan Hall, and also the Arion season in Steinert Hall, and details regarding the Handel and Haydn season.

Manager Murdock announces that the symphony afternoon concerts for Symphony Hall will begin Oct. 22, and for the most part will have two or more artists for each concert. In the latter part of the season, however, he has arranged for the first concert will be given by Clarence Adler and the Lara of the Metropolitan Opera Company, artists who need no introduction to Boston. They will be assisted by a band of Symphony players under the baton of Joseph Pasternack, the conductor who made such a favorable impression as leader at the fall Pops. Mr. Paderewski with assisting artists for Nov. 19. Other artists to appear during the season include Mme. Johanna Gadski, [illegible] Powell, violinist; Harold Bauer, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Mme. Sembrich, Efrem Zimbalist and Helen Stanley, Mme. Gerhardt, Mme. Matzenauer, Julia Culp, Arthur Whitehouse, Louis Graveure, Mme. Louise Homer and Sturkow-Ryder, pianist; Elsa Stralia, soprano; Maria Gay, Spanish soprano; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Leo Ornstein, pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Frieda Hempel and John McCormack.

Jordan Hall Schedule.

The features of the season at Jordan Hall will be the recitals by the soloists of the Symphony orchestra, the first of which will be given by Mme. Lydia Lypkowska, pianist, on Nov. 10. Other artists to appear during the season include Vladimir Levitzki, pianist; Mischa Levitzki, pianist; Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano; Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano; Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, soprano; Mme. Marie Sundelius, soprano; Mme. Lucrezia Bori, soprano; Mme. Frances Alda, soprano; Mme. Florence Macbeth, soprano; Mme. Anna Case, soprano; Mme. Elsa Stralia, soprano; Maria Gay, Spanish soprano; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Leo Ornstein, pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Frieda Hempel and John McCormack.

Dr. Muck's Plans.

Dr. Muck's [illegible] four orchestral concerts for the first [illegible] Symphony concerts for the season will be given on the afternoons of Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3 and Jan. 7. The soloists will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, soprano; Mme. Lydia Lypkowska, pianist; Mme. Susan Metcalfe, soprano; Mme. Louise Homer, contralto; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Albert Spalding, violinist; Arthur Friedberg, pianist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Mme. Elsa Stralia, soprano; Maria Gay, Spanish soprano; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Leo Ornstein, pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Frieda Hempel and John McCormack.

Cambridge Concerts.

The [illegible] of [illegible] concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Dec. 14 and 21. The soloists will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Susan Metcalfe, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Albert Spalding, violinist; Arthur Friedberg, pianist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Mme. Elsa Stralia, soprano; Maria Gay, Spanish soprano; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Leo Ornstein, pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Frieda Hempel and John McCormack.

The first novelty will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston. The [illegible] will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston. The [illegible] will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston.

The [illegible] of [illegible] concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Dec. 14 and 21. The soloists will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Susan Metcalfe, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Albert Spalding, violinist; Arthur Friedberg, pianist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Mme. Elsa Stralia, soprano; Maria Gay, Spanish soprano; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Leo Ornstein, pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Frieda Hempel and John McCormack.

The first novelty will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston. The [illegible] will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston. The [illegible] will be given with the second concert, when Fritz Kreisler will play the Goldmark violin concerto for the first time in Boston.

Notes and Comment Upon Musical Matters

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

The final proof that summer and its holidays have gone for good is always the announcement by the management of the Symphony Orchestra of its plans for the annual series of symphony concerts which begin shortly after.

The announcement for 1916-17 seems very strange to the present generation of Symphony patrons because it has nothing to say about auction sales of seats, that picturesquely unique feature of Boston's concerts of the last 30 years.

The auction sales have served their purpose, outlived their usefulness and disappeared for good. In their place has come subscription at fixed prices, which promises to be a most popular and successful change in the method of disposing of the seats for the season.

Information comes from the management that the Friday afternoon concerts are already practically sold out for the season, that pleasing condition having existed since last spring. It is still possible to get desirable seats for the Saturday concerts at all prices, except the lowest, $15. But few of the 360 seats remain unsold.

New Plan Succeeds

The success of the new method is very gratifying to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who is responsible for it. There has been astonishingly little criticism of the plan itself, the prices, or the manner in which the prices are assigned to seats.

The new plan gives the Symphony public a certain proprietary interest in their seats, which seems to please them greatly. With the system of annual renewals, seats to all intents and purposes are owned by those who occupy them for as long a period of years as they wish and with no more reponsibility than the payment of the annual fee.

The outstanding feature of the Symphony prospectus is the large number of distinguished soloists engaged for the concerts, and particularly the large number of great singers. Altogether 19 soloists are announced for the 24 pairs of concerts. Seven of these are singers, six are pianists, four are violinists and two are violoncellists.

Roster of Soloists

The singers are Mesdames Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Melanie Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the two leading concert singers of our time; and John McCormack. Of these singers, two, Mme. Kurt and Mr. McCormack will be making their first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Destinn has appeared with the Orchestra but once, and that several years ago. The others have appeared often and always with great success.

All these six women are in the forefront of their art and those who have been particularly identified with opera are as distinguished in concert. Mme. Kurt is the least known of them. She will make her first appearances in Boston during last spring's visit of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She then showed herself an artist of most unusual quality and the possessor of a fine, robust soprano voice. A woman who can sing with success such different roles as Isolde and the Countess in "Der Rosenkavalier" is most unusual.

Louise Homer, contralto.

Irish Tenor to Sing

The engagement of John McCormack promises one of the most interesting events of the season. The most popular singer of his day he unquestionably is. Lilli Lehmann, a final authority on the subject, calls him the greatest living singer of Mozart. Doctor Muck will probably arrange a classical programme for this concert.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, whom the war still detains in this country. Included in it is a newcomer to Symphony Hall, Carl Friedberg, who has been heard here in recital; and an old friend, one of Boston's greatest talents, who has been absent for many years, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mrs. Beach will play her own new concerto. The others will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, and Heinrich Gebhard of this city.

Notable Violinists

Two of the violinists come from the orchestra: the concert master, Mr. Witek, and his assistant, Mr. Noack. The annual appearances of these two fine artists always bring much pleasure. Of the other two, one, it is hardly necessary to say, will be the inimitable Fritz Kreisler, who will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the second pair of concerts, Oct. 20-21. The other will be Albert Spalding. Mr. Spalding will be another of the newcomers among the soloists, although he has appeared here in recital.

Both the 'cellists on the list are members of the orchestra: Messrs. Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin.

Johanna Gadski, soprano.

Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

Madame Kurt, soprano.

Ernest Schelling, pianist.

Dr. Muck has been no further away than the coast of Maine during the summer and if the number of scores he has had with him, marked and returned to the copyist be a criterion, he has worked much more than he has idled. It is understood that he has planned thoroughly his scheme of programmes for the season, but true to his past custom, he will say little or nothing about them.

As last year, he promised few novelties. The problem of securing music from abroad is even more difficult than it was then. Yet, during last season he was able to present eleven works unknown to the symphony patrons, no less than seven of these being by American composers. Doubtless he will be able to do as well this year. It is known, however, that he has several important revivals in mind, works he has never done in Boston.

The orchestra itself shows fewer changes than it has at the beginning of any season since Mr. Gericke's time.

The entire Symphony season will run its usual length of 30 weeks, beginning Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and ending Saturday evening, May 5. In that time Boston will get its usual 24 pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Fridays and Saturdays omitted because of the orchestra's absence from town are Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1 and 2, Jan. 5 and 6 and 26 and 27, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17. A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged, 48 for Boston, 10 for New York, eight for Cambridge, six for Providence, five each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, three each for Hartford and Worcester, two each for Springfield and New Bedford, and single concerts various other New England and middle west cities.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SEPT. 24, 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Musical activities in Washington center about the five concerts given annually in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These will be given, as usual, Tuesday afternoons at half past four, and the dates are: October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. The orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

The three soloists have been announced for the season. These are Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, one of the great pianists of our time. Others will be announced shortly.

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

SEP 24 1916

Notes and Comment Upon Musical Matters

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

The final proof that summer and its holidays have gone for good is always the announcement by the management of the Symphony Orchestra of its plans for the annual series of symphony concerts which begin shortly after.

The announcement for 1916-17 seems very strange to the present generation of Symphony patrons because it has nothing to say about auction sales of seats, that picturesquely unique feature of Boston's concerts of the last 30 years.

The auction sales have served their purpose, outlived their usefulness and disappeared for good. In their place has come subscription at fixed prices, which promises to be a most popular and successful change in the method of disposing of the seats for the season.

Information comes from the management that the Friday afternoon concerts are already practically sold out for the season, that pleasing condition having existed since last spring. It is still possible to get desirable seats for the Saturday concerts at all prices, except the lowest, $15. But few of the $60 seats remain unsold.

New Plan Succeeds

The success of the new method is very gratifying to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who is responsible for it. There has been astonishingly little criticism of the plan itself, the prices, or the manner in which the prices are assigned to seats.

The new plan gives the Symphony public a certain proprietary interest in their seats, which seems to please them greatly. With the system of annual renewals, seats to all intents and purposes are owned by those who occupy them for as long a period of years as they wish and with no more reponsibility than the payment of the annual fee.

The outstanding feature of the Symphony prospectus is the large number of distinguished soloists engaged for the concerts, and particularly the large number of great singers. Altogether 19 soloists are announced for the 24 pairs of concerts. Seven of these are singers, six are pianists, four are violinists and two are violoncellists.

Roster of Soloists

The singers are Mesdames Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Melanie Kurt and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, the two leading concert singers of our time; and John McCormack. Of these singers, two, Mme. Kurt and Mr. McCormack will be making their first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra; Miss Destinn has appeared with the Orchestra but once, and that was several years ago. The others have appeared often and always with much success.

All these six women are in the forefront of their art and those who have been particularly identified with opera are as distinguished in concert. Mme. Kurt is the least known of them. She made her first appearances in Boston during last spring's visit of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She then showed herself an artist of most unusual quality and the possessor of a fine, robust soprano voice. A woman who can sing with success such different roles as Isolde and the Countess in "Der Rosenkavalier" is most unusual.

Louise Homer, contralto.

Johanna Gadski, soprano.

Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

Madame Kurt, soprano.

Irish Tenor to Sing

The engagement of John McCormack promises one of the most interesting events of the season. The most popular singer of his day he unquestionably is. Lilli Lehmann, a final authority on the subject, calls him the greatest living singer of Mozart. Doctor Muck will probably arrange a classical programme for this concert.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, whom the war still detains in this country. Included in it is a newcomer to Symphony Hall, Carl Friedberg, who has been heard here in recital; and an old friend, one of Boston's greatest talents, who has been absent for many years, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mrs. Beach will play her own new concerto. The others will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, and Heinrich Gebhard of this city.

Notable Violinists

Two of the violinists come from the orchestra: the concert master, Mr. Witek, and his assistant, Mr. Noack. The annual appearances of these two fine artists always bring much pleasure. Of the other two, one, it is hardly necessary to say, will be the inimitable Fritz Kreisler, who will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the second pair of concerts, Oct. 20-21. The other will be Albert Spalding. Mr. Spalding will be another of the newcomers among the soloists, although he has appeared here in recital.

Both the 'cellists on the list are members of the orchestra: Messrs. Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin.

Ernest Schelling, pianist.

Dr. Muck has been no further away than the coast of Maine during the summer and if the number of scores he has had with him, marked and returned to the copyist be a criterion, he has worked much more than he has idled. It is understood that he has planned thoroughly his scheme of programmes for the season, but true to his past custom, he will say little or nothing about them.

As last year, he promised few novelties. The problem of securing music from abroad is even more difficult than it was then. Yet, during last season, he was able to present eleven works unknown to the symphony patrons, no less than seven of these being by American composers. Doubtless he will be able to do as well this year. It is known, however, that he has several important revivals in mind, works he has never done in Boston.

The orchestra itself shows fewer changes than it has at the beginning of any season since Mr. Gericke's time.

The entire Symphony season will run its usual length of 30 weeks, beginning Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and ending Saturday evening, May 5. In that time Boston will get its usual 24 pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Fridays and Saturdays omitted because of the orchestra's absence from town are Nov. 3 and 4, Dec. 1 and 2, Jan. 5 and 6 and 26 and 27, Feb. 16 and 17 and March 16 and 17. A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged, 48 for Boston, 10 for New York, eight for Cambridge, six for Providence, five each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, three each for Hartford and Worcester, two each for Springfield and New Bedford, and single concerts in various other New England and middle west cities.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

SEPT. 24, 1916

HERALD

ess: Washington, D. C.

SEP 24 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Musical activities in Washington center about the five concerts given annually in the New National Theater

THE TURNUP KIN

And an All-Star Ca

JEAN B

From HERALD
Address: New York City
SEP 24 1916

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

This orchestra again has as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of living violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Russian pianist. Others will be added to the list later.

The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 24 1916

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music this season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets. Option on the seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made. The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year. There will be few seats left for single sale.

From Boston Transcript
Sept. 29,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Plans and Schedules for the Sunday Concerts—Singers and Virtuosi to Be Heard Elsewhere—The Symphony Concerts at Cambridge—The Detained Destinn

THREE weeks hence, on Oct. 22, the concerts of Sunday afternoons at Symphony Hall will begin anew. At the outset they won, and through three seasons they have held a public that seldom seeks the concert-hall in the working week, yet a public intelligent, discriminating, keen for its pleasure. The management, no less, has maintained steadfastly the standard it originally set for the concerts. They still assemble through twenty weeks of autumn, winter and spring, singers and virtuosi of high and established rank and along with them the new figures of promise and performance on the horizon of music. The programmes accord with the quality of the singers and the players and almost all of the series of the past have deserved to be considered as "serious concerts." None other in Boston have done so much to widen the intelligent public of concert-going. They have earned the right to be the institution that they are.

In the season to come the arrangements for the Sunday concerts follow the familiar lines of previous years. A few of the best-liked and manifold singers, pianists and violinists, like Mme. Sembrich, Mr. McCormack, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kriesler and Mr. Elman, will have one or more afternoons to themselves. Two others—one in November and one in March— are set aside for the concerts of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund. At the rest paired singers and virtuosi will appear, and already the list specifies among them Mmes. Culp, Gluck, Hempel, Gadski, Alda and Stanley for singers; Messrs Thibaud and Brown for violinists, and Mr. Bauer for a pianist—with numerous additions in prospect for each category. As for the calendar the first five concerts are scheduled as follows:

Sunday, Oct. 22—Mme. Alda and Mr. de Luca of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Mr. Pasternack with a band from the Symphony Orchestra.
Sunday, Oct. 29—Mr. Kreisler, the violinist.
Sunday, Nov. 5—Mme. Gluck, the singer.
Sunday, Nov. 12—Mr. Paderewski, the pianist.
Sunday, Nov. 19—Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra.

Jordan Hall Concerts

One of the most complete concert seasons since their inauguration at Jordan Hall, has been announced by L. H. Mudgett. The list includes that excellent body of musicians, the Flonzaley Quartet, and the following artists, many of whom are annual visitors to Boston's concert stage:—

Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Zimbalist, Kitty Cheatham, Julia Culp, Teresa Carreno, Spalding, Ethel Leginska, Mischa Levitzki, Grainger, Marie Van Dresser, James Friskin, Malkin, Germaine Schnitzer, Alice Van Barentzen, Nichola Oulukanoff, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, the Witek-Malkin Trio, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Anita Hartley, the Longy Club, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff and Oliver Denton.

From REPUBLICAN
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date OCT

ELLIS TICKETS GO WELL

First Concert, That by Farrar, to Be on October 11

The season tickets for the Ellis concert series, which will open in the Auditorium October 11 with a concert by Geraldine Farrar and assisting artists, went on sale at Otto Baab's music house on Elm street, Wednesday, and will continue for another week. Mr Ellis's enterprise in giving Springfield such a concert series, with two great artists and two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, has met with quick appreciation from the music lovers of Springfield, and sufficient advance subscriptions have already been received to insure the success of the series. There are, however, excellent seats remaining in all parts of the house.

The opening concert, with Geraldine Farrar and assisting artists, comes the night before the opening of the big dairy show. The second concert will be on November 6, with the Boston symphony orchestra and Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist; the third concert will be January 29, with Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, as soloist, and the final concert, February 20, will be a splendid Wagner program rendered by the Boston symphony orchestra and a soloist. The size of the Auditorium makes possible the popular scaling of prices.

Geraldine Farrar is to be the particular star of the Portland (Me.) festival, beginning Monday evening, October 9. It will be Portland's 20th festival, and elaborate plans have been made to celebrate the anniversary. Miss Farrar was chosen as the leading soloist nearly a year ago, and the program has been built up around her appearance. The music of "Carmen" will make up the last of the program of the opening concert, and Miss Farrar will appear in the familiar costume of Carmen, which has made her world famous.

SEPTEMBER 30,
DAILY ADVERTISER,

CONDUCTOR MUCK'S SYMPHONY PLANS

NOTED LEADER WILL INTRODUCE NOVELTIES

Is Preparing Four Orchestral Works Entirely New in Boston

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season, which begin Oct. 13. He has had with him a large number of scores of works he has never done in Boston, marking the scores so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in cver a year.

This compels him to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty.

At the same time, it may be pointed out that Dr. Muck prophesied no novelties at the beginning of last season, and yet produced no less than 11.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic Poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct., Festival a year ago last spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago.

These are only the two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem "Thamar," danced here by the Russians.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the beautiful symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts.

Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony"; Mozart's Symphony in D Major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" Overture; Dvorak's "Nature" Overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for Strings, and George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

Cambridge Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the winter. The concerts come on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22, April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., and Susan Miller, a newcomer and mezzo-soprano of whom great things are prophesied. Of violinists, there will be Frizt Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a newcomer, and Claire Forbes, a brilliant young pianist.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made hortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
SEP 24 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Five concerts will be given in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at 4:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoons, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. The three soloists announced for the season are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Greisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, one of the great pianists. Others are to be announced shortly.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene has the local management of the affairs of the orchestra. The sale of season tickets will open the middle of next month.

From EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

* * *

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16. The orchestra has again as its conductor that brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Three soloists are announced for the series—Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brilliant Russian pianist. The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 24 1916

Wie die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte uns mitteilt, haben alte Abonnenten das Recht, ihre Sitze für die kommende Saison bis zum 1. Oktober d. J. zu beziehen, bis dahin nicht abgeholte Sitze werden anderweitig verwendet. Da eine Schar von mehreren Hundert Reflektanten auf Sitze vorhanden ist, so ist die Nachfrage nach Sitzen eine ungemein rege. Selbstverständlich wird Carnegie Hall bei allen zehn Konzerten der Bostoner wieder ausverkauft sein. Die Konzerte finden an folgenden Tagen statt: 2., 4. und 30. November, 2. Dezember, 4. und 6. Januar, 15. und 17. Februar und 15. und 17. März. Es gibt wieder fünf Donnerstag-Abend- und fünf Samstag-Nachmittags-Konzerte. Dr. Muck steht wieder an der Spitze des berühmten Orchesters.

* * *

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 24 1916

Im Zeichen des Diamantjubiläums.

Das rühmlichst bekannte Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird auch in der kommenden Saison wie in den letzten Jahren fünf große Konzerte in Brooklyn unter der Leitung des genialen Dr. Karl Muck geben. Die Konzerte finden wieder unter den Auspizien des Brooklyn Institut für Künste und Wissenschaften im Opernsaale der Academy of Music statt und bisher sind für drei der Konzerte je ein Solist engagiert worden. Diese Stars sind Emmy Destinn vom Metropolitan Opernhause, der hervorragende Violinist Fritz Kreisler und der Pianist Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Die Daten sind: 3. November, 1. Dezember, 5. Januar, 16. Februar und 16. März.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date Sept 24, 1916

The Boston Symphony Concerts will be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoons, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The three soloists announced are Emmy Destinn, brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, for whose safe conduct from Vienna to the United States the Washington government is now making overtures to the dual monarchy; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, famous pianist.

From SUN
Address: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season's work with the first rehearsal called for Monday, October 9, and on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening it gives its first pair of concerts in Boston. The changes in the orchestra are very few. Mr. Kessler, who sat at the second desk of the first violins, left the orchestra last spring to become a member of the musical faculty of Oberlin College. Ten days ago the orchestra had the great misfortune to lose its first bassoonist, Peter Sadony, who died after a surgical operation. His place will be filled at once. These are the only changes in the personnel. Dr. Muck returned to Boston last week after his summer in Maine.

The subscription for the New York concerts of the orchestra is as large as ever and the waiting list of those who desire to become subscribers has increased materially since last spring. The first concerts will be given Thursday evening, November 2, and Saturday afternoon, November 4.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
SEP 24 1916

Music.

"The five concerts given annually in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, and the dates are: October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13, and March 13. The orchestra will, of course, be under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

The three soloists have been announced for the season. These are Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, one of the great pianists of our time. Others will be announced shortly.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts here this season as usual. They will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday nights, October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, are the only soloists announced.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
SEP 24 1916

Entire House Sold Out for Boston Symphony Series

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

The orchestra has again as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brilliant Russian pianist. Others will be added to the list shortly.

The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

[14]

From HERALD
Address: New York City
SEP 24 1916

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

This orchestra again has as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of living violinists, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Russian pianist. Others will be added to the list later.

The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 24 1916

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music this season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets. Option on the seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number, as usual, and will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made. The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year. There will be few seats left for single sale.

From Boston Transcript Sept. 29,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Plans and Schedules for the Sunday Concerts—Singers and Virtuosi to Be Heard Elsewhere—The Symphony Concerts at Cambridge—The Detained Destinn

THREE weeks hence, on Oct. 22, the concerts of Sunday afternoons at Symphony Hall will begin anew. At the outset they won, and through three seasons they have held a public that seldom seeks the concert-hall in the working week, yet a public intelligent, discriminating, keen for its pleasure. The management, no less, has maintained steadfastly the standard it originally set for the concerts. They still assemble through twenty weeks of autumn, winter and spring, singers and virtuosi of high and established rank and along with them the new figures of promise and performance on the horizon of music. The programmes accord with the quality of the singers and the players and almost all of the series of the past have deserved to be considered as "serious concerts." None other in Boston have done so much to widen the intelligent public of concert-going. They have earned the right to be the institution that they are.

In the season to come the arrangements for the Sunday concerts follow the familiar lines of previous years. A few of the best-known and manifold singers, pianists and violinists, like Mme. Sembrich, Mr. McCormack, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kriesler and Mr. Hofmann, will have one or more afternoons to themselves. Two others—one in October and one in March— are set aside for concerts of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund. At these paired singers and virtuosi will appear already the list specifies among others Mme. Culp, Gluck, Hempel, Gadski, Miss Stanley for singers; Messrs Thibaud, Brown for violinists, and Mr. Rosenthal, pianist—with numerous additions to expect for each category. As to the first five concerts are as follows:

Oct. 22—Mme. Alda and Mr. de Luca of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Mr. Kreisler with a band from the Symphony Orchestra.
Nov. 5—Mr. Kreisler, the violinist.
Nov. 19—Mme. Gluck, the singer.
Dec. 3—Mr. Paderewski, the pianist.
Dec. 17—Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra.

Jordan Hall Concerts

One of the most complete concert seasons since their inauguration at Jordan Hall, has been announced by L. H. Mudgett. The list includes that excellent body of musicians, the Flonzaley Quartet, and the following artists, many of whom are annual visitors to Boston's concert stage:—

Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Zimbalist, Kitty Cheatham, Julia Culp, Teresa Carreno, Spalding, Ethel Leginska, Mischa Levitzki, Grainger, Marie Van Dresser, James Friskin, Malkin, Germaine Schnitzer, Alice Van Barentzen, Nichola Oulukanoff, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, the Witek-Malkin Trio, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Anita Hartley, the Longy Club, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff and Oliver Denton.

From REPUBLICAN
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date SE

ELLIS TICKETS GO WELL

First Concert, That by Farrar, to Be on October 11

The season tickets for the Ellis concert series, which will open in the Auditorium October 11 with a concert by Geraldine Farrar and assisting artists, went on sale at Otto Baab's music house on Elm street, Wednesday, and will continue for another week. Mr Ellis's enterprise in giving Springfield such a concert series, with two great artists and two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, has met with quick appreciation from the music lovers of Springfield, and sufficient advance subscriptions have already been received to insure the success of the series. There are, however, excellent seats remaining in all parts of the house.

The opening concert, with Geraldine Farrar and assisting artists, comes the night before the opening of the big dairy show. The second concert will be on November 6, with the Boston symphony orchestra and Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist; the third concert will be January 29, with Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, as soloist, and the final concert, February 20, will be a splendid Wagner program rendered by the Boston symphony orchestra and a soloist. The size of the Auditorium makes possible the popular scaling of prices.

Geraldine Farrar is to be the particular star of the Portland (Me.) festival, beginning Monday evening, October 9. It will be Portland's 20th festival, and elaborate plans have been made to celebrate the anniversary. Miss Farrar was chosen as the leading soloist nearly a year ago, and the program has been built up around her appearance. The music of "Carmen" will make up the last of the program of the opening concert, and Miss Farrar will appear in the familiar costume of Carmen, which has made her world fam[illegible]

SEPTEMBER 30,
DAILY ADVERTISER,

CONDUCTOR MUCK'S SYMPHONY PLANS

NOTED LEADER WILL INTRODUCE NOVELTIES

Is Preparing Four Orchestral Works Entirely New in Boston

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season, which begin Oct. 13. He has had with him a large number of scores of works he has never done in Boston, marking the scores so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year.

This compels him to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty.

At the same time, it may be pointed out that Dr. Muck prophesied no novelties at the beginning of last season, and yet produced no less than 11.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic Poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct., Festival a year ago last spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago. These are only the two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem "Thamar," danced here by the Russians.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the beautiful symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts.

Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony"; Mozart's Symphony in D Major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" Overture; Dvorak's "Nature" Overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for Strings, and George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

Cambridge Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the winter. The concerts come on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22, April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., and Susan Miller, a newcomer and mezzo-soprano of whom great things are prophesied. Of violinists, there will be Fritz Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a newcomer, and Claire Forbes, a brilliant young pianist.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made hortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
SEP 24 1916

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Five concerts will be given in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at 4:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoons, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. The three soloists announced for the season are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Greisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, one of the great pianists. Others are to be announced shortly.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene has the local management of the affairs of the orchestra. The sale of season tickets will open the middle of next month.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

* * *

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season, have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12.

So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly.

The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

* * *

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16. The orchestra has again as its conductor that brilliant musician, Dr. Karl Muck. Three soloists are announced for the series—Emmy Destinn, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brilliant Russian pianist. The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 24 1916

Wie die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte uns mitteilt, haben alte Abonnenten das Recht, ihre Sitze für die kommende Saison bis zum 1. Oktober d. J. zu beziehen, bis dahin nicht abgeholte Sitze werden anderweitig verwendet. Da eine Schar von mehreren Hundert Reflektanten auf Sitze vorhanden ist, so ist die Nachfrage nach Sitzen eine ungemein rege. Selbstverständlich wird Carnegie Hall bei allen zehn Konzerten der Bostoner wieder ausverkauft sein. Die Konzerte finden an folgenden Tagen statt: 2., 4. und 30. November, 2. Dezember, 4. und 6. Januar, 15. und 17. Februar und 15. und 17. März. Es gibt wieder fünf Donnerstag-Abend- und fünf Samstag-Nachmittags-Konzerte. Dr. Muck steht wieder an der Spitze des berühmten Orchesters.

* * *

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 24 1916

Im Zeichen des Diamantjubiläums.

Das rühmlichst bekannte Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird auch in der kommenden Saison wie in den letzten Jahren fünf große Konzerte in Brooklyn unter der Leitung des genialen Dr. Karl Muck geben. Die Konzerte finden wieder unter den Auspizien des Brooklyn Institut für Künste und Wissenschaften im Opernsaale der Academy of Music statt und bisher sind für drei der Konzerte je ein Solist engagiert worden. Diese Stars sind Emmy Destinn vom Metropolitan Opernhause, der hervorragende Violinist Fritz Kreisler und der Pianist Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Die Daten sind: 3. November, 1. Dezember, 4. Januar, 16. Februar und 16. März.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date Sept 24, 1916

The Boston Symphony Concerts will be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoons, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The three soloists announced are Emmy Destinn, brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, for whose safe conduct from Vienna to the United States the Washington government is now making overtures to the dual monarchy; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, famous pianist.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

Subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming season have only this week in which to remit and secure their tickets, for their option on their seats closes Monday, October 2. The concerts will be five in number as usual, and given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings. The dates are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, have been announced as soloists. Further announcements of soloists will be made shortly. The management reports that the subscription to date is quite equal to that of last year, which was one of the largest in the history of the orchestra in Philadelphia. There will be very few seats left for single sale.

From SUN
Address: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season's work with the first rehearsal called for Monday, October 9, and on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening it gives its first pair of concerts in Boston. The changes in the orchestra are very few. Mr. Kessler, who sat at the second desk of the first violins, left the orchestra last spring to become a member of the musical faculty of Oberlin College. Ten days ago the orchestra had the great misfortune to lose its first bassoonist, Peter Sadony, who died after a surgical operation. His place will be filled at once. These are the only changes in the personnel. Dr. Muck returned to Boston last week after his summer in Maine.

The subscription for the New York concerts of the orchestra is as large as ever and the waiting list of those who desire to become subscribers has increased materially since last spring. The first concerts will be given Thursday evening, November 2, and Saturday afternoon, November 4.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
SEP 24 1916

Music.

"The five concerts given annually in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, and the dates are: October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13, and March 13. The orchestra will, of course, be under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

The three soloists have been announced for the season. These are Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Carl Friedberg, one of the great pianists of our time. Others will be announced shortly.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 24 1916

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts here this season as usual. They will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday nights, October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. So far, Emmy Destinn, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, are the only soloists announced.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
SEP 24 1916

Entire House Sold Out for Boston Symphony Series

The opening of the musical activities of the winter is close at hand. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 3, December 1, January 4, February 16 and March 16.

The orchestra has again as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck. Already three soloists have been announced for the series. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Fritz Kreisler and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the brilliant Russian pianist. Others will be added to the list shortly.

The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences as in the past. The subscription list is as large as it was last year, the entire house being sold out at each concert.

[14]

From the
Boston Globe
Oct.1,1916.

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week. He has a quiet, restful summer and is not only in good condition physically, but is in high spirits.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season, which begins Friday and Saturday, Oct. 13-14. He has had with him a number of scores, so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year. This compels Dr. Muck to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty. Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. First is the symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Conn., festival a year ago last spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago. The Symphony Orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of large dimensions.

Two other works, new to the Symphony programmes, are Beethoven's grand fugue for strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar." The Beethoven fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar," one of the most beautiful works of Russian composers, was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music and was played a number of times during the performances last winter of the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr. Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest," Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian serenade and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, Dvorak's "Nature" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings and George Schumann's variations and double fugue on a merry theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr. Muck this season as in the past, nor is it unlikely that before the winter is over he will come across other new and interesting works which will lend variety to the concerts.

THE SUNDAY CONCERTS

The concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcement of the plans made by Messrs. Ellis and Mudgett for a season are always awaited with eager interest. Taken as a whole, these concerts have maintained a standard of unusual merit, and when one considers the number of things which may occur to interfere during the winter with the fulfilment of a promise made in the early autumn, there have been in the past several years very few disappointments. These concerts have secured a nation wide reputation, and there is no artist so great and so popular that he does not make every effort to be engaged for at least one.

For the coming winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the great majority of the concerts will be given by two or more artists. There is a large public for recitals by certain of the greatest artists, but, generally speaking, the public which patronizes these concerts is fond of variety and prefers one of the many combinations that can be made of singers and instrumentalists. Next winter, as in the past, recitals will be given by Kreisler, Paderewski, Elman, McCormack and Sembrich. Most of the other concerts will be with a combination of artists. Two afternoons have been set aside for the usual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund.

The regular series of concerts will open Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22. At these will appear Frances Alda and Giuseppe De Luca, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of symphony players, with Joseph Pasternack as conductor.

De Luca is the new Italian baritone who made, during the Metropolitan engagement in Boston last spring, so favorable an impression on the Boston public. The success of Mr. Pasternack as a conductor of the recent series of operatic concerts in Symphony Hall is fresh in the memory of the musical public.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, Oct. 29, to be followed Nov. 5 by Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, Nov. 12, and on Nov. 19 comes the first Pension Fund concert.

Other artists who have been engaged to appear during the course of the season are Julia Culp, the mezzo-soprano; Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, who received leave of absence from the French army, where he has been serving since the beginning of the war, for the tour he is to make this winter in America; Mme. Gadski, soprano, who will appear with Eddy Brown, violinist. Mischa Elman will appear at one of these concerts; also Emmy Destinn. Concerts will be given by Harold Bauer and Helen Stanley. Miss Stanley is a young American soprano, a member of the Chicago Opera Company, who has been engaged by Mr. Ellis for the role of Micaela in "Carmen," which the Ellis Opera Company is to give on its tour this month. John McCormack will appear, and Mme. Sembrich, who has recovered her health, will give a recital later in the winter. Frieda Hempel will appear in concert.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the winter of 1916-1917. The concerts, as in the past, will come on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22, April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Susan Miller, a new-comer and mezzo-soprano of whom great things are prophesied. Of violinists, there will be Fritz Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a new-comer, and Claire Forbes, a young pianist, who has already played with the orchestra with much success.

MUDGETT CONCERTS

L. H. Mudgett of Symphony Hall announces the following artists as among those who will give concerts under his management this season in Boston, the following pianists, singers, 'cellists, ensemble organizations: Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Copeland, Carreno, Leginska, Grainger, Germaine Schnitzer, Lester Donahue, Claire Forbes, Olga Samaroff, Mischa Lvitzki, Julia Culp, Marie von Dresser, Nichola Oulukanoff, Elena Gerhardt, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Evan Williams, Zimbalist, Albert Spalding, Jacques Thibaud, Irma Seydel, Joseph Malkib, Kitty Cheatham, the Flonzaley Quartet, the Longy Club, the Witek-Malkin Trio, James Friskin, Louis Cornell, Arthur Alexander, Anita Hartley, Oliver Denton, Roderick White, Charles Cooper.

From the
BOSTON AMERICAN
Oct. 1,1916.

DR. KARL MUCK, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the Winter the middle of the coming week. He has had a quiet, restful Summer and is not only in good condition physically, but is in high spirits.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season which begin Friday and Saturday, October 13-14. He has had with him a large number of scores of works he has never done in Boston, marking the scores so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct., festival a year ago last Spring.

The second is the symphony, "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago. The Symphony Orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain.

These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Tharmar." The Beethoven Fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance.

"Thamar," one of the most beautiful works of Russian composers, was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music, and was played a number of times during the performances last Winter of the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the beautiful symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the Fall of 1905, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr. Gericke.

Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein."

From the
Boston American
Oct. 1, 1916.

Noted Artists On Symphony Lists

THE concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcement of the plans made by Messrs. Ellis and Mudgett for a season are always awaited with eager interest.

The coming Winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the great majority of the concerts be given by two or more artists. There is a large public for recitals by certain of the great artists, but, generally speaking, the public which patronizes these concerts is fond of variety and prefers one of the many combinations that can be made of singers and instrumentalists.

Next Winter, as in the past, recitals will be given by Kreisler, Paderewski, Elman, McCormack and Sembrich. Most of the other concerts will be with a combination of artists. Two afternoons have been set aside for the usual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund.

The regular series of concerts will open Sunday afternoon, October 22. At these will appear Frances Alda and Giuseppe de Luca, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players, with Mr. Joseph Pasternack as conductor. This should be a most attractive event.

Mme. Alda by her appearances here last Spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company showed that she had become a singer of very unusual skill and artistry.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, October 29, to be followed November 5 by that charming artist, Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, November 12, and November 19 comes the first pension fund concert.

From the
Boston Globe
Oct. 1, 1916.

Dr Muck's Symphony Plans

Dr Muck, summering at Blue Hill, Me, whence he returns to Boston this week, had something to say, in a day's trip recently to the city, about his season's Symphony programs, the first of which occurs Oct 12 and 14. The eminent doctor appears to be in excellent health and fine spirits, yet rest for him has included the study of a large number of scores of works he has not done in Boston, marking them so that the copyist may mark the individual parts.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the symphony audiences, Dr Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct, festival a year ago last Spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr Muck several years ago. The orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain.

These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar." The Beethoven Fugue has been announced several time in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar" has been heard at a concert at the Boston Opera House several seasons ago and during the recent performances by the Russian ballet.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr Muck may be mentioned the beautiful symphony by Chausson, which will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the Fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony"; Mozart's Symphony in D major, op 35; Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture; Dvorak's "Nature" Overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for Strings, and George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr Muck this season as in the past, and other less familiar works to be found on the shelves of the library which will serve a good purpose at a time when little music has come from German publishers within a year.

Mr Longy Makes Plans For a Busy Season

Mr Longy, aside from his duties as first oboeist of the Symphony Orchestra, will have a busy season as conductor, soloist and instructor. The Longy Club will give three concerts as usual. The orchestra of the MacDowell Club, an organization of greatly improved standards and efficiency under Mr Longy's direction, will give two concerts. Mr Longy projects two more concerts at his own initiative to make better known the music of Jean Hure, the Frenchman, and of our own Mr Loeffler. With all of this, Mr Longy, with the assistance of his daughter, Mlle Rene Longy, will be occupied with his school, modeled along Conservatory lines, which now announces a group of his symphony colleagues as instructors.

At the first concert of the Longy Club in November a novelty will be found in the sonata for flute, viola and harp by Debussy, one of the series of instrumental solo and small ensemble pieces some time ago undertaken by the French composer. The rhapsody for clarinet, played several seasons ago by Mr Grisez, and the sonata for cello introduced here last season by Mr Casals for the first time in this country were two of the group already heard. Other numbers of the program will be a divertissement by Roussel, a piano quartet by Scherber and a suite by d'Indy.

Later programs will represent these names: Beethoven, Wollett, Gouvy, Thuille, Enesco, Florent, Schmitt and Mr Strube.

For the December concert by the string orchestra of the MacDowell Club there will be a Handel concerto for two violins and 'cello obligato, an Aubade by Lalo and a chamber symphony by Kurt Striegler, who is a teacher at the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mme Longy will spend the Winter at their estate in France, in the Somme District, 10 miles from the front. Mr Longy says the house and property has been requisitioned by the British, and but little has been spared the rigors of war.

From the
Boston Globe
Oct. 1, 1916.

Announcement of Sunday Concerts in Symphony Hall

The concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcements of the plans made by Messrs Ellis and Mudgett are always awaited with eager interest. These concerts have maintained a standard of unusual merit, and when one considers the number of things which may occur to interfere during the Winter with the fulfillment of a promise made in the early Autumn, there have been in the past several years very few disappointments.

Naturally, there cannot be a series of 20-odd concerts during a series of years of vast amount of novelty as to artists who appear, and seekers after the new must gratify their wish in the programs and in the combinations of artists.

The coming Winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the majority of the concerts will be given by two or more artists. The regular series will open Sunday afternoon, Oct 22, with Frances Alda and Giuseppe De Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of symphony players, with Mr Joseph Pasternack as conductor.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, Oct 29, to be followed Nov 5 by Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, Nov 12, and Nov 19 comes the first Pension Fund Concert.

Other artists who have been engaged to appear are: Julia Culp, the eminent mezzo-soprano; Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who received leave of absence from the French Army, where he has been serving since the beginning of the war for the tour he is to make this Winter in America; Mme Gadski, the soprano, who will appear with Eddy Brown, the young American violinist.

Mischa Elman is scheduled to appear, likewise Emmy Destinn. Another of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer and Helen Stanley. Miss Stanley is a young American soprano, a member of the Chicago Opera Company, who has been engaged by Mr Ellis for the role of Micaela in "Carmen," which the Ellis Opera Company is to give on its tour this month.

Naturally, John McCormack is on the list, and Mme Sembrich, who has quite recovered her health, is scheduled for a recital later in the Winter. Frieda Hempel also will be heard in concert.

Notable Artists to Appear at Manager Mudgett's Concerts

The season's concerts in Jordan Hall under the management of Louis H. Mudgett will include a number of the favorite artists who visit Boston each year, as well as several names new to this city. The season opens Saturday afternoon, Oct 14 with Ethel Leginska, pianist, who appeared here several times last season. The second concert presents a new comer, Mischa Levitzki, a young Russian pianist, who will make his first appearance in this country in New York two days previous to his Boston recital.

The distinguished pianist, Mme Teresa Carreno, is announced for the third concert, Saturday afternoon, Oct 21. The Flonzaley Quartet will give four performances during the season, Kitty Cheatham will appear early in November, the Witek-Malkin Trio are scheduled for a mid-Winter concert, and the Longy Club will give their usual series of three concerts.

The following singers and instrumentalists complete the list, which will be added to at a later date: Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Efrem Zimbalist, Julia Culp, Teresa Carreno, Albert Spalding, Percy Grainger, Marie Van Dresser, James Friskin, Joseph Malkin, Germaine Schnitzer, Alice Van Barentzen, Nichola Oulukanoff, Ruth Deyo, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, the Witek-Malkin trio, Oliver Denton, Charles Cooper and Roderick White.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the Winter of 1916-1917. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, Oct 19, Nov 9, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 1, Feb 22, March 22 and April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Susan Millar, a newcomer and mezzo-soprano. Of violinists, there will be Fritz Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a newcomer, and Claire Forbes, a young pianist who has already played with the orchestra with much success.

Subscribers to last season's Cambridge concerts may secure their old seats by renewing their subscriptions before Monday, Oct 9. The general sale of unclaimed seats for the season will open Saturday morning, Oct 14. Address all communications to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard sq, Cambridge.

From the
Boston Globe
Oct.1,1916.

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week. He has a quiet, restful summer and is not only in good condition physically, but is in high spirits.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season, which begins Friday and Saturday, Oct. 13-14. He has had with him a number of scores, so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year. This compels Dr. Muck to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty. Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. First is the symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Conn., festival a year ago last spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago. The Symphony Orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of large dimensions.

Two other works, new to the Symphony programmes, are Beethoven's grand fugue for strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar." The Beethoven fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar," one of the most beautiful works of Russian composers, was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music and was played a number of times during the performances last winter of the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr. Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest," Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian serenade and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, Dvorak's "Nature" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings and George Schumann's variations and double fugue on a merry theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr. Muck this season as in the past, nor is it unlikely that before the winter is over he will come across other new and interesting works which will lend variety to the concerts.

THE SUNDAY CONCERTS

The concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcement of the plans made by Messrs. Ellis and Mudgett for a season are always awaited with eager interest. Taken as a whole, these concerts have maintained a standard of unusual merit, and when one considers the number of things which may occur to interfere during the winter with the fulfilment of a promise made in the early autumn, there have been in the past several years very few disappointments. These concerts have secured a nation wide reputation, and there is no artist so great and so popular that he does not make every effort to be engaged for at least one.

For the coming winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the great majority of the concerts will be given by two or more artists. There is a large public for recitals by certain of the greatest artists, but, generally speaking, the public which patronizes these concerts is fond of variety and prefers one of the many combinations that can be made of singers and instrumentalists. Next winter, as in the past, recitals will be given by Kreisler, Paderewski, Elman, McCormack and Sembrich. Most of the other concerts will be with a combination of artists. Two afternoons have been set aside for the usual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund.

The regular series of concerts will open Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22. At these will appear Frances Alda and Giuseppe De Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of symphony players, with Joseph Pasternack as conductor.

De Luca is the new Italian baritone who made, during the Metropolitan engagement in Boston last spring, so favorable an impression on the Boston public. The success of Mr. Pasternack as a conductor of the recent series of operatic concerts in Symphony Hall is fresh in the memory of the musical public.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, Oct. 29, to be followed Nov. 5 by Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, Nov. 12, and on Nov. 19 comes the first Pension Fund concert.

Other artists who have been engaged to appear during the course of the season are Julia Culp, the mezzo-soprano; Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, who received leave of absence from the French army, where he has been serving since the beginning of the war, for the tour he is to make this winter in America; Mme. Gadski, soprano, who will appear with Eddy Brown, violinist. Mischa Elman will appear at one of these concerts; also Emmy Destinn. Concerts will be given by Harold Bauer and Helen Stanley. Miss Stanley is a young American soprano, a member of the Chicago Opera Company, who has been engaged by Mr. Ellis for the role of Micaela in "Carmen," which the Ellis Opera Company is to give on its tour this month. John McCormack will appear, and Mme. Sembrich, who has recovered her health, will give a recital later in the winter. Frieda Hempel will appear in concert.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the winter of 1916-1917. The concerts, as in the past, will come on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22, April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Susan Miller, a new-comer and mezzo-soprano of whom great things are prophesied. Of violinists, there will be Fritz Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a new-comer, and Claire Forbes, a young pianist, who has already played with the orchestra with much success.

MUDGETT CONCERTS

L. H. Mudgett of Symphony Hall announces the following artists as among those who will give concerts under his management this season in Boston, the following pianists, singers, 'cellists, ensemble organizations: Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Copeland, Carreno, Leginska, Grainger, Germaine Schnitzer, Lester Donahue, Claire Forbes, Olga Samaroff, Mischa Lvitzki, Julia Culp, Marie von Dresser, Nichola Oulukanoff, Elena Gerhardt, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Evan Williams, Zimbalist, Albert Spalding, Jacques Thibaud, Irma Seydel, Joseph Malkib, Kitty Cheatham, the Flonzaley Quartet, the Longy Club, the Witek-Malkin Trio, James Friskin, Louis Cornell, Arthur Alexander, Anita Hartley, Oliver Denton, Roderick White, Charles Cooper.

From the
BOSTON AMERICAN
Oct. 1, 1916.

DR. KARL MUCK, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the Winter the middle of the coming week. He has had a quiet, restful Summer and is not only in good condition physically, but is in high spirits.

Although he has been nominally resting, he has found time to do a large amount of work in preparation for the concerts of the coming season which begin Friday and Saturday, October 13-14. He has had with him a large number of scores of works he has never done in Boston, marking the scores so that the copyist might mark the individual parts.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct., festival a year ago last Spring.

The second is the symphony, "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr. Muck several years ago. The Symphony Orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain.

These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Tharmar." The Beethoven Fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance.

"Thamar," one of the most beautiful works of Russian composers, was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music, and was played a number of times during the performances last Winter of the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr. Muck may be mentioned particularly the beautiful symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Ernest Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the Fall of 1905, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr. Gericke.

Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein."

From the
Boston American
Oct. 1, 1916.

Noted Artists On Symphony Lists

THE concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcement of the plans made by Messrs. Ellis and Mudgett for a season are always awaited with eager interest.

The coming Winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the great majority of the concerts be given by two or more artists. There is a large public for recitals by certain of the great artists, but, generally speaking, the public which patronizes these concerts is fond of variety and prefers one of the many combinations that can be made of singers and instrumentalists.

Next Winter, as in the past, recitals will be given by Kreisler, Paderewski, Elman, McCormack and Sembrich. Most of the other concerts will be with a combination of artists. Two afternoons have been set aside for the usual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund.

The regular series of concerts will open Sunday afternoon, October 22. At these will appear Frances Alda and Giuseppe de Luca, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players, with Mr. Joseph Pasternack as conductor. This should be a most attractive event.

Mme. Alda by her appearances here last Spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company showed that she had become a singer of very unusual skill and artistry.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, October 29, to be followed November 5 by that charming artist, Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, November 12, and November 19 comes the first pension fund concert.

From the
Boston Globe
Oct. 1, 1916.

Dr Muck's Symphony Plans

Dr Muck, summering at Blue Hill, Me, whence he returns to Boston this week, had something to say, in a day's trip recently to the city, about his season's Symphony programs, the first of which occurs Oct 13 and 14. The eminent doctor appears to be in excellent health and fine spirits, yet rest for him has included the study of a large number of scores of works he has not done in Boston, marking them so that the copyist may mark the individual parts.

Of orchestral works entirely new to the symphony audiences, Dr Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic poem, "The Okeanides," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk, Ct, festival a year ago last Spring. The second is the symphony "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played in Boston by Dr Muck several years ago. The orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain.

These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar." The Beethoven Fugue has been announced several time in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar" has been heard at a concert at the Boston Opera House several seasons ago and during the recent performances by the Russian ballet.

Among the interesting revivals planned by Dr Muck may be mentioned the beautiful symphony by Chausson, which will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the Fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later had a second performance during the same season under Mr Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one which ends with the grand polonaise); Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony"; Mozart's Symphony in D major, op 35; Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture; Dvorak's "Nature" Overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for Strings, and George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr Kreisler is most enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr Muck this season as in the past, and other less familiar works to be found on the shelves of the library which will serve a good purpose at a time when little music has come from German publishers within a year.

Mr Longy Makes Plans For a Busy Season

Mr Longy, aside from his duties as first oboeist of the Symphony Orchestra, will have a busy season as conductor, soloist and instructor. The Longy Club will give three concerts as usual. The orchestra of the MacDowell Club, an organization of greatly improved standards and efficiency under Mr Longy's direction, will give two concerts. Mr Longy projects two more concerts at his own initiative to make better known the music of Jean Hure, the Frenchman, and of our own Mr Loeffler. With all of this, Mr Longy, with the assistance of his daughter, Mlle Rene Longy, will be occupied with his school, modeled along Conservatory lines, which now announces a group of his symphony colleagues as instructors.

At the first concert of the Longy Club in November a novelty will be found in the sonata for flute, viola and harp by Debussy, one of the series of instrumental solo and small ensemble pieces some time ago undertaken by the French composer. The rhapsody for clarinet, played several seasons ago by Mr Grisez, and the sonata for cello introduced here last season by Mr Casals for the first time in this country were two of the group already heard. Other numbers of the program will be a divertissement by Roussel, a piano quartet by Scherber and a suite by d'Indy.

Later programs will represent these names: Beethoven, Wollett, Gouvy, Thuille, Enesco, Florent, Schmitt and Mr Strube.

For the December concert by the string orchestra of the MacDowell Club there will be a Handel concerto for two violins and 'cello obligato, an Aubade by Lalo and a chamber symphony by Kurt Striegler, who is a teacher at the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mme Longy will spend the Winter at their estate in France, in the Somme District, 10 miles from the front. Mr Longy says the house and property has been requisitioned by the British, and but little has been spared the rigors of war.

From the
Boston Globe
Oct. 1, 1916.

Announcement of Sunday Concerts in Symphony Hall

The concerts given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons during the season have come to play so important a part in the musical life of this city that the announcements of the plans made by Messrs Ellis and Mudgett are always awaited with eager interest. These concerts have maintained a standard of unusual merit, and when one considers the number of things which may occur to interfere during the Winter with the fulfillment of a promise made in the early Autumn, there have been in the past several years very few disappointments.

Naturally, there cannot be a series of 20-odd concerts during a series of years of vast amount of novelty as to artists who appear, and seekers after the new must gratify their wish in the programs and in the combinations of artists.

The coming Winter, as in past seasons, the management has provided that the majority of the concerts will be given by two or more artists. The regular series will open Sunday afternoon, Oct 22, with Frances Alda and Giuseppe De Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Company, assisted by an orchestra of symphony players, with Mr Joseph Pasternack as conductor.

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Symphony Hall the following Sunday, Oct 29, to be followed Nov 5 by Alma Gluck, with assisting artists. Paderewski's first recital is scheduled for Sunday, Nov 12, and Nov 19 comes the first Pension Fund Concert.

Other artists who have been engaged to appear are: Julia Culp, the eminent mezzo-soprano; Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who received leave of absence from the French Army, where he has been serving since the beginning of the war for the tour he is to make this Winter in America; Mme Gadski, the soprano, who will appear with Eddy Brown, the young American violinist.

Mischa Elman is scheduled to appear, likewise Emmy Destinn. Another of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer and Helen Stanley. Miss Stanley is a young American soprano, a member of the Chicago Opera Company, who has been engaged by Mr Ellis for the role of Micaela in "Carmen," which the Ellis Opera Company is to give on its tour this month.

Naturally, John McCormack is on the list, and Mme Sembrich, who has quite recovered her health, is scheduled for a recital later in the Winter. Frieda Hempel also will be heard in concert.

Notable Artists to Appear at Manager Mudgett's Concerts

The season's concerts in Jordan Hall under the management of Louis H. Mudgett will include a number of the favorite artists who visit Boston each year, as well as several names new to this city. The season opens Saturday afternoon, Oct 14 with Ethel Leginska, pianist, who appeared here several times last season. The second concert presents a new comer, Mischa Levitzki, a young Russian pianist, who will make his first appearance in this country in New York two days previous to his Boston recital.

The distinguished pianist, Mme Teresa Carreno, is announced for the third concert, Saturday afternoon, Oct 21. The Flonzaley Quartet will give four performances during the season, Kitty Cheatham will appear early in November, the Witek-Malkin Trio are scheduled for a mid-Winter concert, and the Longy Club will give their usual series of three concerts.

The following singers and instrumentalists complete the list, which will be added to at a later date: Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Efrem Zimbalist, Julia Culp, Teresa Carreno, Albert Spalding, Percy Grainger, Marie Van Dresser, James Friskin, Joseph Malkin, Germaine Schnitzer, Alice Van Barentzen, Nichola Oulukanoff, Ruth Deyo, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, the Witek-Malkin trio, Oliver Denton, Charles Cooper and Roderick White.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the Winter of 1916-1917. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, Oct 19, Nov 9, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 1, Feb 22, March 22 and April 26.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged. Of singers, there will be Emmy Destinn, the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Susan Millar, a newcomer and mezzo-soprano. Of violinists, there will be Fritz Kreisler and Irma Seydel. The pianists will be Ernest Schelling, Frances Nash, a newcomer, and Claire Forbes, a young pianist who has already played with the orchestra with much success.

Subscribers to last season's Cambridge concerts may secure their old seats by renewing their subscriptions before Monday, Oct 9. The general sale of unclaimed seats for the season will open Saturday morning, Oct 14. Address all communications to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard sq, Cambridge.

From the
Boston Herald
Oct. 1, 1916.

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week. He has had a quiet, restful summer, and is in good condition physically, and in high spirits.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year. This compels him to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty. At the same time it may be pointed out that Dr. Muck prophesied no novelties at the beginning of last season, and yet produced no less than 11. Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic Poem, "The Okeanides," by Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk (Ct.) Festival. The second is the Symphony, "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played here several years ago. The Symphony orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain. These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar." Beethoven's Fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar" was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music. It was also performed as a gorgeous ballet last season by the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals may be mentioned particularly the symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later during the same season under Mr. Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one with the grand polonaise); Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture; Dvorak's "Nature" overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Georg Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr. Muck this season as in the past, nor is it unlikely that before the winter is over he will come across other new and interesting works which will lend variety to the concerts.

MR. MUDGETT'S CONCERT

In addition to the regular Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, Mr. L. H. Mudgett announces the following concerts at Jordan Hall for the season 1916-17, with the dates: Ethel Leginska, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 14; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, Thursday afternoon, Oct. 19; Teresa Carreno, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 21; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28; Percy Grainger, pianist, Friday afternoon, Nov. 3; Albert Spalding, violinist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4; Marie Van Dresser, soprano, Monday afternoon, Nov. 6; Harold Bauer, pianist, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 8; James Friskin, pianist, Friday evening, Nov. 10; Kitty Cheatham, interpreter of songs and Negro melodies, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11; Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, Wednesday evening, Nov. 15; Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 18; Olive Van Barentzen, soprano, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 22; Nichola Oulukanoff, baritone, Wednesday evening, Nov. 22; Flonzaley quartet, chamber music, Thursday evening, Nov. 30, the first of their series of three concerts. Other artists to appear later in the season are: The Longy Club, in their regular series of three concerts; Efrem Zimbalist, Julia Culp, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, the Witek-Malkin trio, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, Oliver Denton, Charles Cooper and Roderick White. Additional concerts of interest will be announced later.

om Wheeling, W. Va.
ddress:
SEP 24 1916

Kossuth Portrait of Dr. Muck Attracts Bostonians

At the exhibition of pictures held last week in Copley Hall, Boston, by the photographers of New England a great deal of attention was directed to the portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which was made by George J. Kossuth of this city. The portrait is one of the collection of pictures made for the University club of the famous artists who have appeared here under their auspices. Bostonians were particularly impressed with the remarkable resemblance this picture bears to Richard Wagner one of the greatest figures in modern musical history. To emphasize this resemblance Wilfred A. French, a Boston art editor, placed immediately above it a picture of Wagner made by Dr. Angerer of Munich in the early eighties. The Friday evening edition of the Boston Transcript devotes a quarter page to a reproduction of the two pictures with the following comment:

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era, and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

Sugar is extracted from 16 varieties of palms which grow in Ceylon.

From the
Boston American
Oct. 8, 1916.

36th Symphony Season Opens Oct. 13

THE thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts Friday afternoon, October 13, and Saturday evening, October 14. The first full rehearsal of the Orchestra is to be held tomorrow morning at half-past ten, and the out-of-town concerts begin the following week at Providence, October 17. Dr. Muck returned to town the middle of the week and is settled for the Winter in his house on the Fenway.

The program that he has made for the first concerts contains no new music—in fact, all four numbers are quite familiar. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, which has its biennial performances at the Symphony concerts.

The second part of the program comprises Berlitz' Overture to "The Corsair;" Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2:30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. The subscription for both the Friday and Saturday series is thoroughly satisfactory, but persons so desiring may be able to get desirable tickets at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts. They will be on sale at Symphony Hall through this week.

RECORD
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, No. 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season has promise of being brilliant. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

* * *

From the
Boston Journal.
October 7th

SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck Chooses Classic Works for Initial Program.

The thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts next Friday afternoon, and Saturday evening.

The program Dr. Muck has made for the first concerts contains four familiar numbers. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The second part of the program comprises Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. Some desirable seats are available at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT SANDERS THEATRE

The Symphony Orchestra is to give its usual series of eight concerts the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The season tickets not taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at Kent's, Harvard square, next Saturday. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 26.

Seven soloists are scheduled: Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist, and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn has been detained abroad by the military authorities, but she may reach Boston before the winter is over.

n TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
T 1 - 19

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening, Oct. 17, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner program was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

STA n
ress: BALTIMORE, MD.
SEP 30 1916

Boston Symphony.

Subscription books for the Boston Sympony concerts of the season will open to the public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The subscription already is large and the season should be equal to last year. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

Fined for Speeding.

om News
ddress: Springfield, Mass.
e nd will have classes ... in Hartford, Ct.

SUCCESSFUL SERIES ASSURED

Brisk Demand for Season Tickets for Ellis Concerts

Springfield's music-loving people have responded so handsomely to the announcement of the Ellis concerts that not only is the success of the forthcoming series assured, but a continuation of these concerts another season. Thus, Springfield is assured of at least two visits each year by the Boston symphony orchestra, something that all lovers of the great orchestra have long been hoping would be made possible. The local management announces that 725 season tickets have already been sold. The season tickets will remain on sale at Otto Baab's music house until Saturday night, the 30th, and this number will undoubtedly be materially increased by that time. Single tickets for the Farrar concert go on sale October 4.

The season will open with the big concert by the beautiful Geraldine Farrar, Wednesday, October 11, the night before the opening of the National dairy show. With the town crowded with visitors and this most popular artist on the concert stage to-day, the Auditorium will be none too spacious to accommodate all who wish to go. Miss Farrar will have the assistance of Arthur Hackett, the well-known tenor, and Josef Maklin, a brilliant 'cellist. Richard Epstein will act as accompanist for the artists.

The other concerts will be November 6 by the Boston symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr Karl Muck, with Laeta Hartley, pianist, as the soloist; January 29, Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and February 20, when the series closes with a great Wagner concert by the orchestra.

n PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which has not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, a week from to-morrow morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last Spring is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano

* * *

Theodore Cella, the young Philadelphian harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent last week in Philadelphia after fifty weeks of continuous playing with the celebrated Boston orchestra. Mr. Cella will return to Boston again this week to prepare for the opening of the coming season. During the past season Mr. Cella has appeared several times as soloist and several of his compositions have been played by the orchestra.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R
OCT 1 -

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The plans for the six Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now complete. The past week, the extension to the stage in Infantry Hall was built, so that beginning with this season the entire personnel of one hundred musicians will appear when the music demands so many players. In other words, Providence for the first time is getting the same orchestra that appears in Boston and New York.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has, in the past fortnight, received many letters from subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, expressing their gratification over the change; all the more so, since the change makes no material difference in the seating arrangements of the hall.

For the six concerts, six soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, the eminent soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, the remarkable pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano of whom great things are promised; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

A discussion of the principles of the "Community Chorus" will be held at the Providence Art Club on Wednesday night. Mr. Arthur Farwell, President of the New York Community Chorus, Mr. W. K. Brice, its Treasurer, and Mr. Harry Barnhart, conductor of the New York and Rochester community choruses, will speak.

om SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 1 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts will be opened Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

om ENQUIRER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
e OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

om AMERICAN
dress: Baltimore, Md.
te OCT 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming season will be opened to the general public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

m JOURNAL
dress: Providence, R. I.
SEP 30 1916

Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Plans for the six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been completed and the stage at Infantry Hall has been extended so that the entire group of 100 musicians can be cared for when the music demands that number. For the first time this season the entire Boston and New York personnel will appear in this city. The soloists for the concerts will be Emmy Destinn, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

[16]

Fom the Boston Herald
Oct. 1,1916.

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week. He has had a quiet, restful summer, and is in good condition physically, and in high spirits.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year. This compels him to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty. At the same time it may be pointed out that Dr. Muck prophesied no novelties at the beginning of last season, and yet produced no less than 11. Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic Poem, "The Okeanides," by Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk (Ct.) Festival. The second is the Symphony, "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played here several years ago. The Symphony orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain. These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar." Beethoven's Fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar" was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music. It was also performed as a gorgeous ballet last season by the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals may be mentioned particularly the symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later during the same season under Mr. Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are Cesar Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one with the grand polonaise); Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture; Dvorak's "Nature" overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Georg Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr. Muck this season as in the past, nor is it unlikely that before the winter is over he will come across other new and interesting works which will lend variety to the concerts.

MR. MUDGETT'S CONCERT

In addition to the regular Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, Mr. L. H. Mudgett announces the following concerts at Jordan Hall for the season 1916-17, with the dates: Ethel Leginska, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 14; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, Thursday afternoon, Oct. 19; Teresa Carreno, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 21; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28; Percy Grainger, pianist, Friday afternoon, Nov. 3; Albert Spalding, violinist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4; Marie Van Dresser, soprano, Monday afternoon, Nov. 6; Harold Bauer, pianist, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 8; James Friskin, pianist, Friday evening, Nov. 10; Kitty Cheatham, interpreter of songs and Negro melodies, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11; Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, Wednesday evening, Nov. 15; Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 18; Olive Van Barentzen, soprano, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 22; Nichola Oulukanoff, baritone, Wednesday evening, Nov. 22; Flonzaley quartet, chamber music, Thursday evening, Nov. 30, the first of their series of three concerts. Other artists to appear later in the season are: The Longy Club, in their regular series of three concerts; Efrem Zimbalist, Julia Culp, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, the Witek-Malkin trio, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, Oliver Denton, Charles Cooper and Roderick White. Additional concerts of interest will be announced later.

---

om News
Wheeling, W. Va.
ddress:
SEP 24 1916
e

Kossuth Portrait of Dr. Muck Attracts Bostonians

At the exhibition of pictures held last week in Copley Hall, Boston, by the photographers of New England a great deal of attention was directed to the portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which was made by George J. Kossuth of this city. The portrait is one of the collection of pictures made for the University club of the famous artists who have appeared here under their auspices. Bostonians were particularly impressed with the remarkable resemblance this picture bears to Richard Wagner, one of the greatest figures in modern musical history. To emphasize this resemblance Wilfred A. French, a Boston art editor, placed immediately above it a picture of Wagner made by Dr. Angerer of Munich in the early eighties. The Friday evening edition of the Boston Transcript devotes a quarter page to a reproduction of the two pictures with the following comment:

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era, and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

Sugar is extracted from 16 varieties of palms which grow in Ceylon.

From the
Boston American
Oct. 8, 1916.

36th Symphony Season Opens Oct. 13

THE thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts Friday afternoon, October 13, and Saturday evening, October 14. The first full rehearsal of the Orchestra is to be held tomorrow morning at half-past ten, and the out-of-town concerts begin the following week at Providence, October 17. Dr. Muck returned to town the middle of the week and is settled for the Winter in his house on the Fenway.

The program that he has made for the first concerts contains no new music—in fact, all four numbers are quite familiar. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, which has its biennial performances at the Symphony concerts.

The second part of the program comprises Berlitz' Overture to "The Corsair;" Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2:30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. The subscription for both the Friday and Saturday series is thoroughly satisfactory, but persons so desiring may be able to get desirable tickets at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts. They will be on sale at Symphony Hall through this week.

RECORD
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, No. 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season has promise of being brilliant. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

* * *

From the
Boston Journal.
October 7th

SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck Chooses Classic Works for Initial Program.

The thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts next Friday afternoon, and Saturday evening.

The program Dr. Muck has made for the first concerts contains four familiar numbers. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The second part of the program comprises Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. Some desirable seats are available at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT SANDERS THEATRE

The Symphony Orchestra is to give its usual series of eight concerts the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The season tickets not taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at Kent's, Harvard square, next Saturday. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 26.

Seven soloists are scheduled: Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist, and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn has been detained abroad by the military authorities, but she may reach Boston before the winter is over.

---

n TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
1 -

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening, Oct. 17, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner program was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

---

n STA
ress: BALTIMORE, MD.
SEP 30 1916

Boston Symphony.

Subscription books for the Boston Sympony concerts of the season will open to the public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The subscription already is large and the season should be equal to last year. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

Fined for Speeding.

---

m News
Springfield, Mass.
ddress:
e

SUCCESSFUL SERIES ASSURED

Brisk Demand for Season Tickets for Ellis Concerts

Springfield's music-loving people have responded so handsomely to the announcement of the Ellis concerts that not only is the success of the forthcoming series assured, but a continuation of these concerts another season. Thus, Springfield is assured of at least two visits each year by the Boston symphony orchestra, something that all lovers of the great orchestra have long been hoping would be made possible. The local management announces that 725 season tickets have already been sold. The season tickets will remain on sale at Otto Baab's music house until Saturday night, the 30th, and this number will undoubtedly be materially increased by that time. Single tickets for the Farrar concert go on sale October 4.

The season will open with the big concert by the beautiful Geraldine Farrar, Wednesday, October 11, the night before the opening of the National dairy show. With the town crowded with visitors and this most popular artist on the concert stage to-day, the Auditorium will be none too spacious to accommodate all who wish to go. Miss Farrar will have the assistance of Arthur Hackett, the well-known tenor, and Josef Maklin, a brilliant 'cellist. Richard Epstein will act as accompanist for the artists.

The other concerts will be November 6 by the Boston symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr Karl Muck, with Laeta Hartley, pianist, as the soloist; January 29, Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and February 20, when the series closes with a great Wagner concert by the orchestra.

---

n PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which has not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, a week from to-morrow morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last Spring is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano

* * *

Theodore Cella, the young Philadelphian harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent last week in Philadelphia after fifty weeks of continuous playing with the celebrated Boston orchestra. Mr. Cella will return to Boston again this week to prepare for the opening of the coming season. During the past season Mr. Cella has appeared several times as soloist and several of his compositions have been played by the orchestra.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R
OCT 1 -

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The plans for the six Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now complete. The past week, the extension to the stage in Infantry Hall was built, so that beginning with this season the entire personnel of one hundred musicians will appear when the music demands so many players. In other words, Providence for the first time is getting the same orchestra that appears in Boston and New York.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has, in the past fortnight, received many letters from subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, expressing their gratification over the change; all the more so, since the change makes no material difference in the seating arrangements of the hall.

For the six concerts, six soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, the eminent soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, the remarkable pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano of whom great things are promised; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

A discussion of the principles of the "Community Chorus" will be held at the Providence Art Club on Wednesday night. Mr. Arthur Farwell, President of the New York Community Chorus, Mr. W. K. Brice, its Treasurer, and Mr. Harry Barnhart, conductor of the New York and Rochester community choruses, will speak.

---

m SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts will be opened Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

---

om ENQUIRER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
e OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

---

om AMERICAN
dress: Baltimore, Md.
te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming season will be opened to the general public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

---

m JOURNAL
dress: Providence, R. I.
OCT 30 1916

Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Plans for the six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been completed and the stage at Infantry Hall has been extended so that the entire group of 100 musicians can be cared for when the music demands that number. For the first time this season the entire Boston and New York personnel will appear in this city. The soloists for the concerts will be Emmy Destinn, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

[16]

Tom the Boston Herald
Oct. 1, 1916.

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, spent last Wednesday in town, arriving in the morning and returning to Maine in the evening. He expects to return with Mrs. Muck and settle for the winter the middle of the coming week. He has had a quiet, restful summer, and is in good condition physically, and in high spirits.

It is to be expected that he has few novelties to announce. Conditions are such today that it is next to impossible to secure new music. Matters have come to such a pass that it is impossible in this country even to secure the orchestral parts of some of the standard symphonies, for practically no music has come out of Germany, where most music is printed, in over a year. This compels him to fall back on works that have been performed here, but so seldom that for a considerable part of the audience they will come as a novelty. At the same time it may be pointed out that Dr. Muck prophesied no novelties at the beginning of last season, and yet produced no less than 11. Of orchestral works entirely new to the Symphony audiences, Dr. Muck is preparing four. These are the Symphonic Poem, "The Okeanides," by Sibelius, which was first played at the Norfolk (Ct.) Festival. The second is the Symphony, "Vita," by Noren, whose "kaleidoscope" variations were played here several years ago. The Symphony orchestra has had this work on its shelves for three years, but it has not yet reached performance. It is a work of modern spirit and of the large dimensions such works attain. These are the only two strikingly novel works. The other two, new to the Symphony programs, are Beethoven's Grand Fugue for Strings, op. 133, and Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar." Beethoven's Fugue has been announced several times in past years, but never reached performance. "Thamar" was heard in the Boston Opera House several years ago at a special concert of Russian music. It was also performed as a gorgeous ballet last season by the Ballet Russe.

Among the interesting revivals may be mentioned particularly the symphony by the ill-fated Frenchman, Chausson. This will be played at one of the early concerts. It was first performed in Boston in the fall of 1905 under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, and later during the same season under Mr. Gericke. Other interesting works that will be heard are César Franck's "Psyche," which has not been heard here in many years; Tschaikowsky's "The Tempest"; Busoni's suite, "Turandot"; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, op. 43 (the one with the grand polonaise); Wolf's Italian Serenade, and Smetana's "Wallenstein."

Other works which Dr. Muck has especially prepared for the season (works that he has never conducted here) are Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; Mozart's symphony in D major, op. 35; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture; Dvorák's "Nature" overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade"; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Georg Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.

The first real novelty of the season will be a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler will play at the second concert. Mr. Kreisler is enthusiastic over the work and expects to use it at nearly all his orchestral appearances the coming season.

For the rest, the standard classics will be drawn on by Dr. Muck this season as in the past, nor is it unlikely that before the winter is over he will come across other new and interesting works which will lend variety to the concerts.

MR. MUDGETT'S CONCERT

In addition to the regular Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, Mr. L. H. Mudgett announces the following concerts at Jordan Hall for the season 1916-17, with the dates: Ethel Leginska, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 14; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, Thursday afternoon, Oct. 19; Teresa Carreno, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 21; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28; Percy Grainger, pianist, Friday afternoon, Nov. 3; Albert Spalding, violinist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4; Marie Van Dresser, soprano, Monday afternoon, Nov. 6; Harold Bauer, pianist, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 8; James Friskin, pianist, Friday evening, Nov. 10; Kitty Cheatham, interpreter of songs and Negro melodies, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11; Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, Wednesday evening, Nov. 15; Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 18; Olive Van Barentzen, soprano, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 22; Nichola Oulukanoff, baritone, Wednesday evening, Nov. 22; Flonzaley quartet, chamber music, Thursday evening, Nov. 30, the first of their series of three concerts. Other artists to appear later in the season are: The Longy Club, in their regular series of three concerts; Efrem Zimbalist, Julia Culp, Louis Cornell, George Copeland, Jacques Thibaud, Lester Donahue, Elena Gerhardt, Claire Forbes, Arthur Alexander, Oscar Seagle, Louis Graveure, the Witek-Malkin trio, Anita Hartley, Irma Seydel, Evan Williams, Olga Samaroff, Oliver Denton, Charles Cooper and Roderick White. Additional concerts of interest will be announced later.

om News
ddress: Wheeling, W. Va.
SEP 24 1916

Kossuth Portrait of Dr. Muck Attracts Bostonians

At the exhibition of pictures held last week in Copley Hall, Boston, by the photographers of New England a great deal of attention was directed to the portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which was made by George J. Kossuth of this city. The portrait is one of the collection of pictures made for the University club of the famous artists who have appeared here under their auspices. Bostonians were particularly impressed with the remarkable resemblance this picture bears to Richard Wagner one of the greatest figures in modern musical history. To emphasize this resemblance Wilfred A. French, a Boston art editor, placed immediately above it a picture of Wagner made by Dr. Angerer of Munich in the early eighties. The Friday evening edition of the Boston Transcript devotes a quarter page to a reproduction of the two pictures with the following comment:

At the exhibition of the Photographers' Association of New England, this week at Copley Hall, there hung one above the other a notable portrait of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the symphony, taken by George J. Kossuth of Wheeling and lent by The Photo-Era, and the life-like photograph of Wagner taken in his final years at Munich and lent by Wilfred French, by whose courtesy both appear here. So set, the much-mooted likeness of the conductor to the composer speaks for itself.

Sugar is extracted from 16 varieties of palms which grow in Seylon.

From the
Boston American
Oct. 8, 1916.

36th Symphony Season Opens Oct. 13

THE thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts Friday afternoon, October 13, and Saturday evening, October 14. The first full rehearsal of the Orchestra is to be held tomorrow morning at half-past ten, and the out-of-town concerts begin the following week at Providence, October 17. Dr. Muck has returned to town the middle of the week and is settled for the winter in his house on the Fenway.

The program that he has made for the first concerts contains four numbers—in fact, all four numbers are quite familiar. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, which has its first performances at the Symphony concerts.

The second part of the program comprises Berlitz' Overture to "The Corsair;" Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. The subscription for both of the Friday and Saturday series is nearly satisfactory, but persons desiring may be able to get single tickets at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts. They will go on sale at Symphony Hall this week.

RECORD
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, No. 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season has promise of being brilliant. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

From the
Boston Journal.
October 7th

SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck Chooses Classic Works for Initial Program.

The thirty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts next Friday afternoon, and Saturday evening.

The program Dr. Muck has made for the first concerts contains four familiar numbers. This is in line with Dr. Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The second part of the program comprises Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in past years, the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. Some desirable seats are available at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT SANDERS THEATRE

The Symphony Orchestra is to give its usual series of eight concerts the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The season tickets not taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at Kent's, Harvard square, next Saturday. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 26.

Seven soloists are scheduled: Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist, and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn has been detained abroad by the military authorities, but she may reach Boston before the winter is over.

n TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
CT 1 - 19

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening, Oct. 17, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner program was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

n STA
ress: BALTIMORE, MD.
SEP 30 1916

Boston Symphony.

Subscription books for the Boston Sympony concerts of the season will open to the public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The subscription already is large and the season should be equal to last year. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

Fined for Speeding.

m ress: Springfield, Mass.
[illegible] 1916

nd will have [illegible]
n Hartford, Ct.

SUCCESSFUL SERIES ASSURED

Brisk Demand for Season Tickets for Ellis Concerts

Springfield's music-loving people have responded so handsomely to the announcement of the Ellis concerts that not only is the success of the forthcoming series assured, but a continuation of these concerts another season. Thus, Springfield is assured of at least two visits each year by the Boston symphony orchestra, something that all lovers of the great orchestra have long been hoping would be made possible. The local management announces that 725 season tickets have already been sold. The season tickets will remain on sale at Otto Baab's music house until Saturday night, the 30th, and this number will undoubtedly be materially increased by that time. Single tickets for the Farrar concert go on sale October 4.

The season will open with the big concert by the beautiful Geraldine Farrar, Wednesday, October 11, the night before the opening of the National dairy show. With the town crowded with visitors and this most popular artist on the concert stage to-day, the Auditorium will be none too spacious to accommodate all who wish to go. Miss Farrar will have the assistance of Arthur Hackett, the well-known tenor, and Josef Maklin, a brilliant 'cellist. Richard Epstein will act as accompanist for the artists.

The other concerts will be November 6 by the Boston symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr Karl Muck, with Laeta Hartley, pianist, as the soloist; January 29, Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and February 20, when the series closes with a great Wagner concert by the orchestra.

n PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which has not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, a week from to-morrow morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last Spring is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano

* * *

Theodore Cella, the young Philadelphian harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent last week in Philadelphia after fifty weeks of continuous playing with the celebrated Boston orchestra. Mr. Cella will return to Boston again this week to prepare for the opening of the coming season. During the past season Mr. Cella has appeared several times as soloist and several of his compositions have been played by the orchestra.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
OCT 1 - 191

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The plans for the six Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now complete. The past week, the extension to the stage in Infantry Hall was built, so that beginning with this season the entire personnel of one hundred musicians will appear when the music demands so many players. In other words, Providence for the first time is getting the same orchestra that appears in Boston and New York.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has, in the past fortnight, received many letters from subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, expressing their gratification over the change; all the more so, since the change makes no material difference in the seating arrangements of the hall.

For the six concerts, six soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, the eminent soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, the remarkable pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano of whom great things are promised; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

A discussion of the principles of the "Community Chorus" will be held at the Providence Art Club on Wednesday night. Mr. Arthur Farwell, President of the New York Community Chorus, Mr. W. K. Brice, its Treasurer, and Mr. Harry Barnhart, conductor of the New York and Rochester community choruses, will speak.

SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 1 - 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts will be opened Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

om ENQUIRER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1 - 1916

The general sale of season tickets which have not been taken up already by subscription for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will open at the Academy of Music ticket office, 1119 Chestnut street, a week from tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 9. The subscription, which has been in progress in Boston since last spring, is of very gratifying size, and the Philadelphia season of the famous organization has promise of being as brilliant as last year. Five soloists are announced for the concerts. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

om AMERICAN
dress: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 1

te
BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming season will be opened to the general public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano.

m JOURNAL
dress: Providence, R. I.
SEP 30 1916

[illegible] concerts. [illegible] be given [illegible] Symphony [illegible] Wednesday evenings, [illegible] 29, January 3, February [illegible] March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

stablished: London,

[illegible] cream [illegible] eggs [illegible] butter [illegible] with [illegible] whipped whites [illegible] pan broiled steaks [illegible] delicious [illegible] but [illegible] wise housekeeper [illegible] now [illegible] delightful [illegible] perfect [illegible] Irving Pan [illegible] with [illegible] sensibly [illegible] she [illegible] does not despair [illegible] people calls [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] uses [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

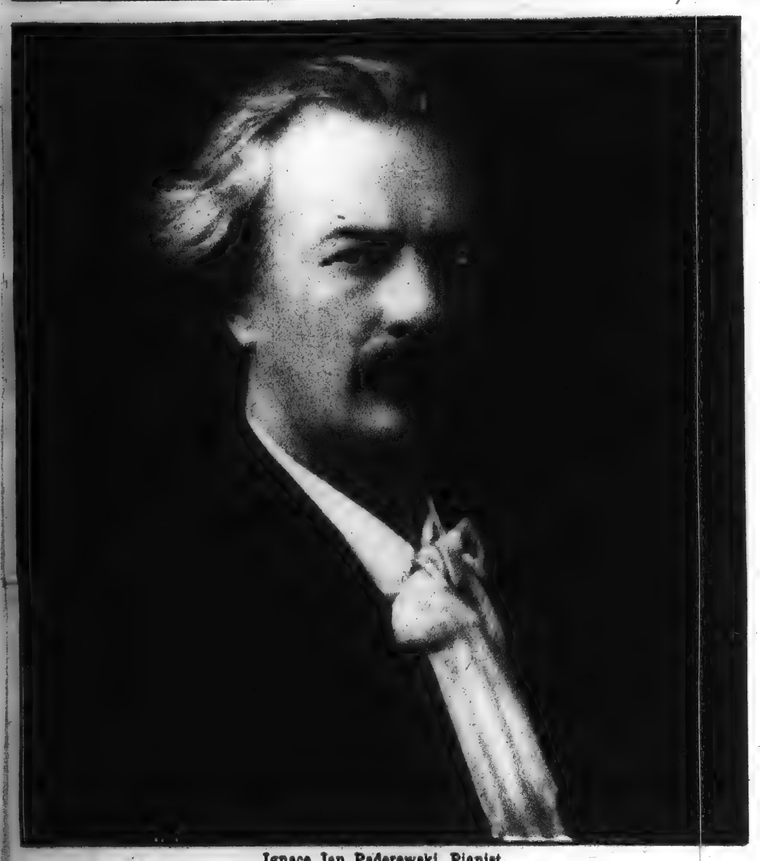
3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

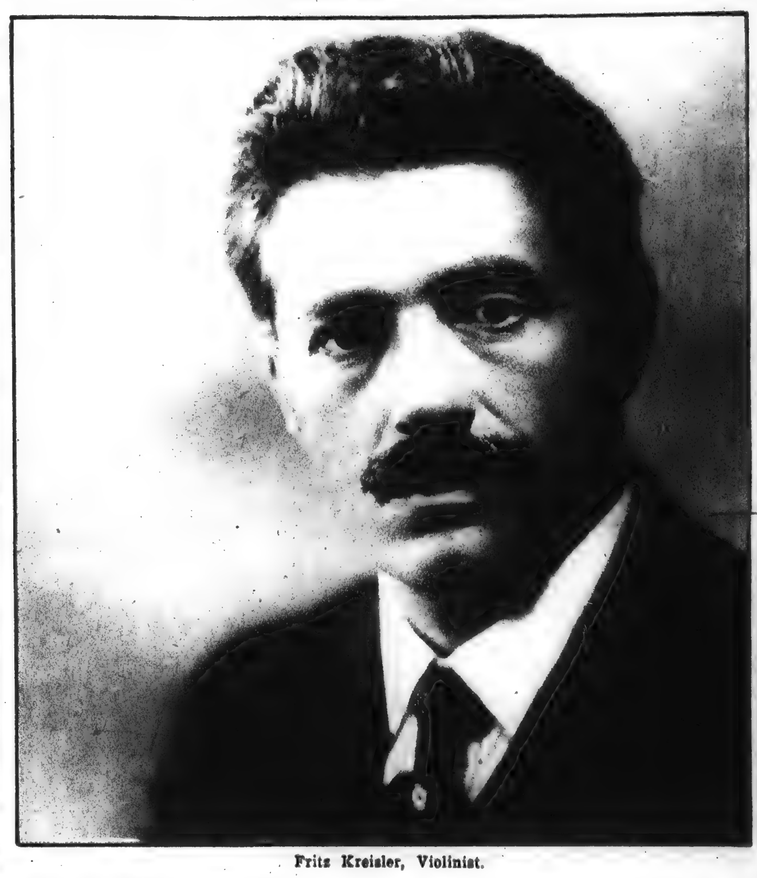
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SOLOISTS OF THE COMING SEASON FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS



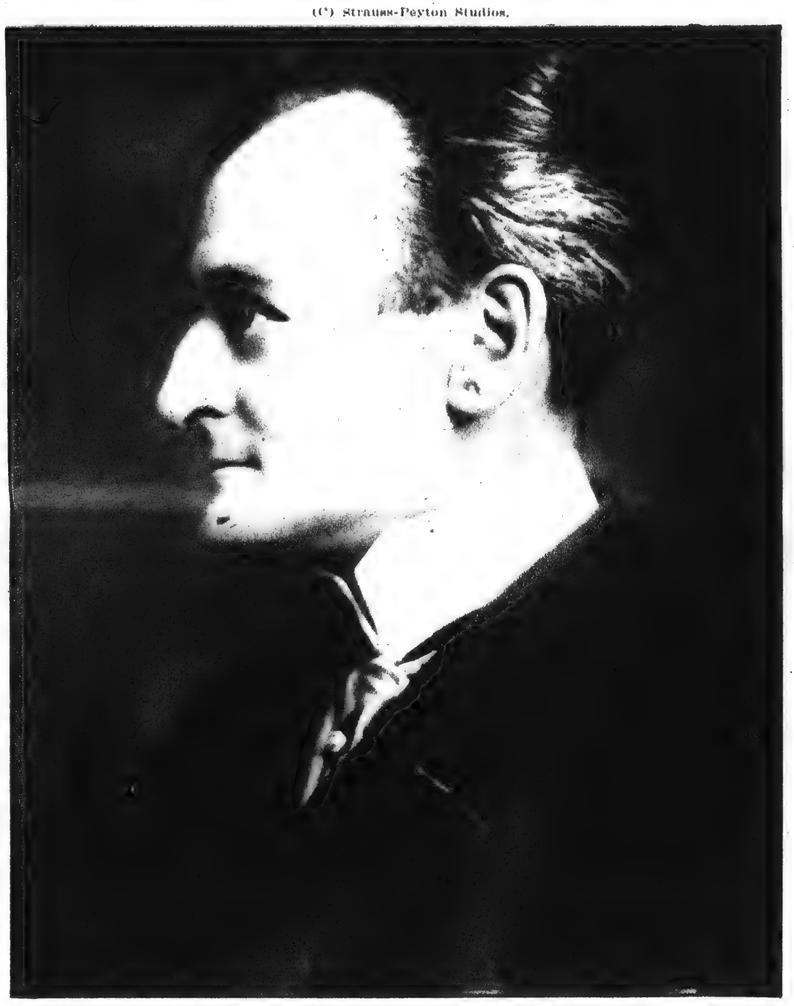
Ignace Jan Paderewski, Pianist.
(C) Hartsook.

Louise Homer, Contralto.
(C) Strauss-Peyton Studios.



Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.
(C) Underwood & Underwood.

Emmy Destinn, Soprano.



Dr. Karl Muck, Boston's Famous Conductor.

Julia Culp, Mezzo-Soprano.
(C) Ira L. Hill's Studio.

Elena Gerhardt, Soprano.

Melanie Kurt, Soprano.

Johanna Gadski, Soprano.

SOLOISTS OF THE COMING SEASON FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ignace Jan Paderewski, Pianist.

(C) Hartsook.

Louise Homer, Contralto.

(C) Strauss-Peyton Studios.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.

(C) Underwood & Underwood.

Emmy Destinn, Soprano.

Dr. Karl Muck, Boston's Famous Conductor.

Julia Culp, Mezzo-Soprano.

(C) Ira L. Hill's Studio.

Elena Gerhardt, Soprano.

Melanie Kurt, Soprano.

Johanna Gadski, Soprano.

REDUCTION

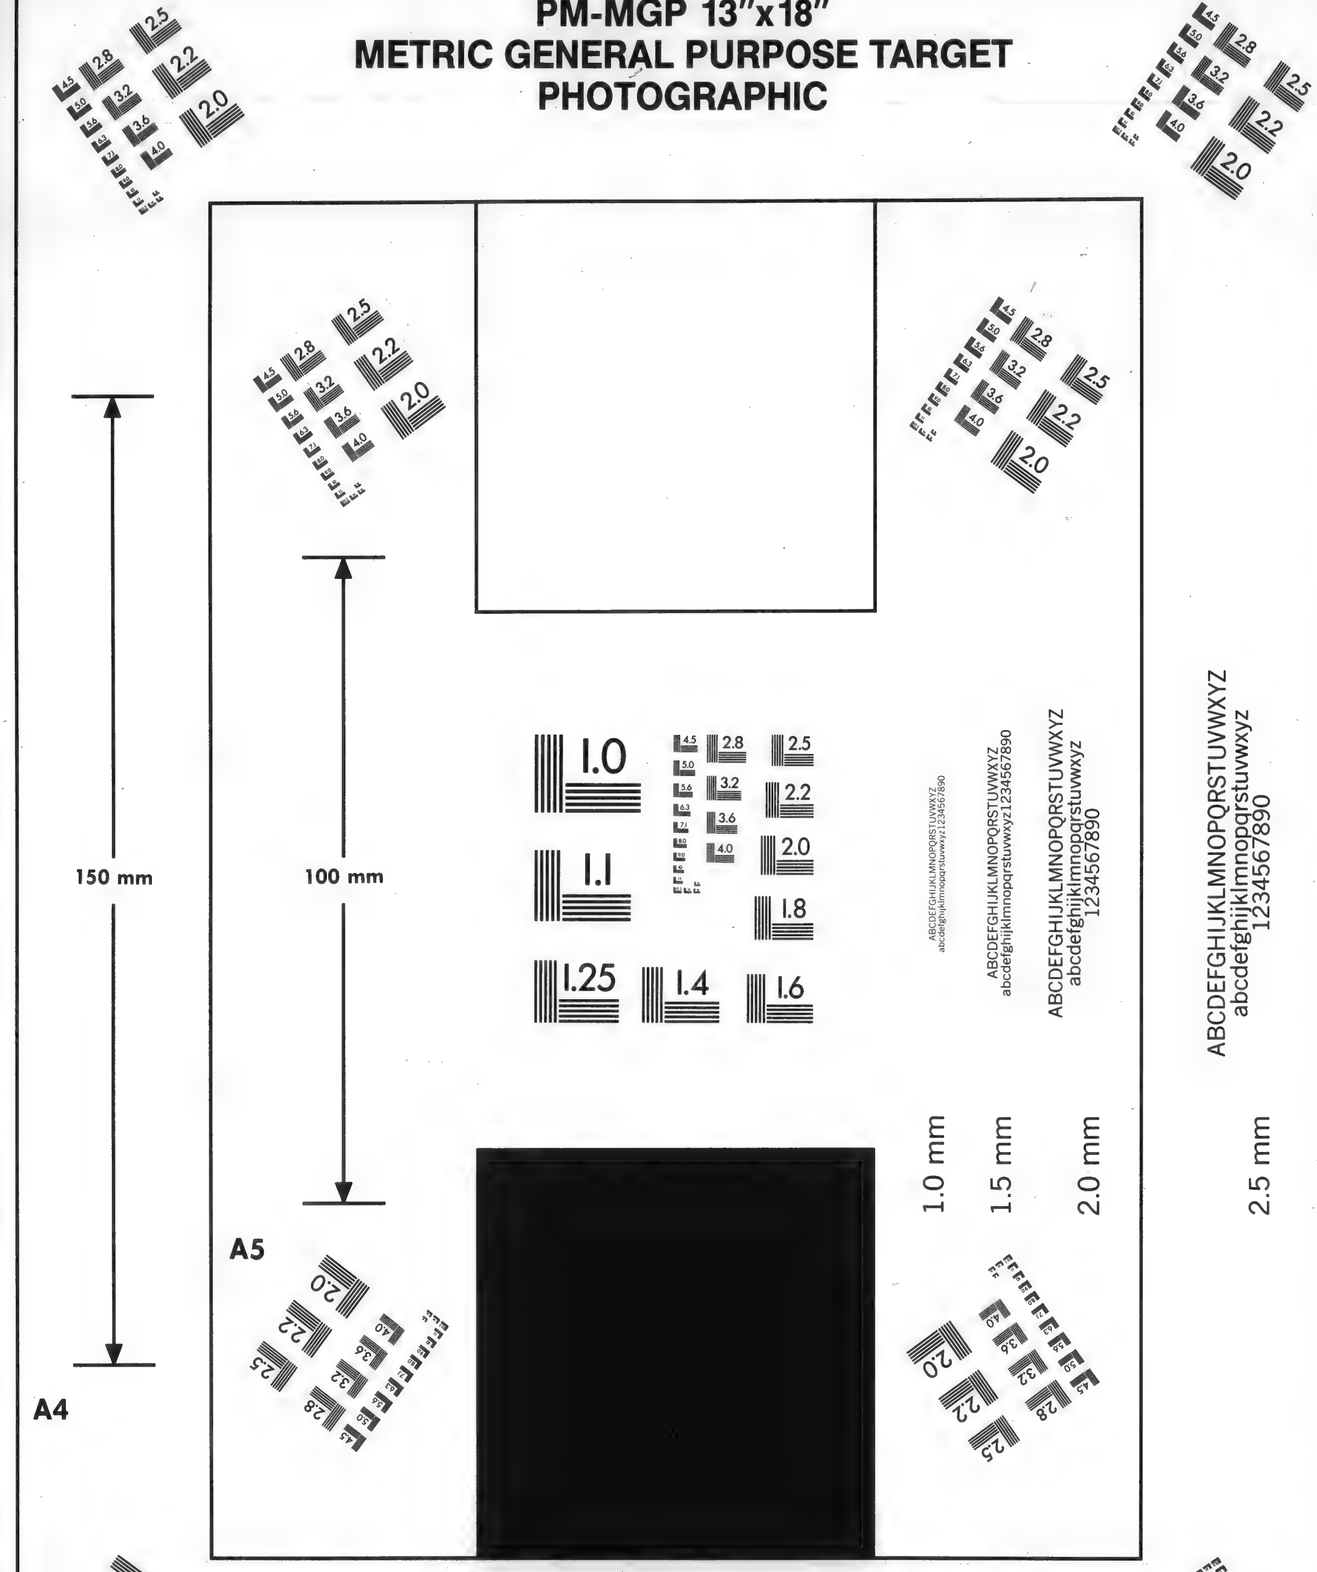
RATIO

12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

From the

Transcript

Oct. 4 1916.

NEWS OF MUSIC

CHORAL MUSIC AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Pressing Need of Its Own Choir—Plans for the Visit of the Russian Ballet—A Prospectus from the Metropolitan—Nikisch on Music and the War — As Concerts Go in London—Items, Information, Opinions

WORD comes from Philadelphia that the symphony orchestra there is to retain as a permanent addition to its forces a considerable part of the chorus assembled and trained last winter for the performance of Mahler's eighth symphony. Thus Mr. Stokowski will be able at will to undertake symphonic pieces requiring voices as well as an orchestra and to diversify his programmes with an occasional choral piece. Word comes from Manchester in England that, even in war-time, Sir T. Beecham is organizing an expert professional chorus to assist the orchestra of the Hallé Concerts whenever the chosen music requires it. Rumor runs here in Boston that the Symphony Orchestra will borrow the chorus of The Cecilia so that Dr. Muck may include Brahms's "Song of Destiny" in one of the concerts for the Pension Fund. Gossip also alleges that Mr. Loeffler's new symphony is not as yet included in the announced pieces for the new series of Symphony Concerts because a male choir for the hymn at the end is lacking.

These conditions—the chance record of a passing week—speak for themselves. The Boston Symphony Orchestra much needs a chorus of its own if it is to be able to include in its active repertory not a few pieces, classic and contemporary, that ask voices as well as instruments. It needs such a choir if it is to be able also to diversify its regular concerts or its concerts for the Pension Fund with the occasional performance of choral music, pure, if not simple. At present it can attempt either only at long intervals and by makeshift and often unsatisfactory borrowings. For six years Dr. Muck has conducted at the Symphony Concerts, but we have yet to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony from his hand, nor shall we hear it until he has a numerous and expert chorus at his disposal. Mr. Loeffler's symphony, Delius's "Appalachia," this and that symphonic piece, ancient or modern, may not be heard in Boston because the music demands an assisting choir. We may barely know Dr. Muck's powers and possibilities as a choral conductor by the episodic finales of the two symphonies of Liszt. And so it goes. Without a chorus of its own the Symphony Orchestra lacks a useful, interesting, valuable and even necessary accessory; while Dr. Muck rightly insists that such a chorus, if it is ever to be added to his forces, must be a continuing and a semi-professional body of singers. Only such a choir could he bring to his standards. The "founder and sustainer" and the active management of the Symphony Orchestra are wise and resourceful. They ought to find a way to provide it with such a chorus as obvious need suggests and as Dr. Muck, with just ambition desires. From what he has made of the Symphony Orchestra, it is easy to infer what he would make of a Symphony Chorus.

CONT FROM

Charles River are thoroughly satisfactory and the scale of prices is considerably lower than that which prevails in Boston. As much care is taken in providing the programmes for Cambridge as for any of the other cities the orchestra visits, and it is the effort of the management to supply interesting and capable soloists. Seven soloists are scheduled for the coming year.

These are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist; and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn was engaged for a series of performances with the orchestra in Boston and various cities, these appearances coming in March. There is now considerable doubt about the possibility of her coming to America at all, but her manager still hopes that she may reach here before the winter is over. Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Irma Seydel need no introduction to the Cambridge audiences. Frances Nash is a pianist from the West, who has played with several of the principal orchestras of this country, including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with much success. Claire Forbes, another pianist, is a native of New Bedford, and is regarded as of unusual talent. A few years ago, she played with the orchestra in New Bedford with success.

Much interest is attached to the appearance of Susan Millar who, at the Cambridge concert, for which she is scheduled, will make her debut as a public singer. Miss Miller is a native of Virginia, and has worked at music all her life. She has studied singing seriously for the past six years. Her first three years were with Mme. Pappenheim. Then she was taken by Mme. Sembrich, whose pupil she has been since. Mr. Ellis heard her sing in New York last spring and, as a result, Miss Millar, a debutante, has been engaged for concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 8 - 1

SOLOISTS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to play a most important function in the musical and social life of Baltimore. It is 30 years since the orchestra first appeared here, and Baltimore has always given it loyal and enduring support.

The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Wednesday evenings. The dates are: November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. Five soloists are announced. On November 1 the assisting artist will be Fritz Kreisler; November 29, Miss Susan Millar; January 3, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; February 14, Carl Friedberg, and March 14. Emmy Destinn. Thus there are two singers, two pianists and one violinist. Three of these artists have long been favorites in Baltimore. Fritz Kreisler is one of the most popular musicians in the world today, and Emmy Destinn has long been admired for her beautful voice and beautiful singing. Ossip Gabrilowitsch has grown mightily in the last few years, and now must be ranked among the very greatest pianists of our time.

The other two artists are less well known. Carl Friedberg is a pianist comparatively new in this country. He is regarded as one of the great men in his branch of the art, possessing all the mechanical requirements of modern piano-playing and having on top of this excellent musicianship and fine taste.

From the

BOSTON SUNDAY POST

OCT.8, 1916.

The Opening Season

Symphony Concerts of Week to Open Boston's Musical Season of 1916-17—The Alleged Difficulty of Securing Music From Abroad—Concerts to Come

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The Symphony Orchestra is to give its usual series of eight concerts the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The season tickets which have not been taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at George H. Kent's University Book Store, Harvard square, Cambridge, next Saturday morning, Oct. 14. The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 26.

These concerts in Cambridge form an important adjunct to the work the orchestra does in Boston. In his original plans for the orchestra Mr. Higginson provided that Harvard University should have the benefit of it to as large an extent as possible, and from the very beginning concerts have been given in Cambridge. Sanders Theatre is acoustically one of the best auditoriums in the United States, and although its size limits not only the number of the audience, but the number of musicians used in the concerts, in every respect the performances across the

CONCERTS

Boston Symphony

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of exceptional interest: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; Berlioz's overture, "Le Corsair"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The programme is a happy augury of the future of the Symphony programmes of the winter. Dr. Muck opened the first season of his second Boston engagement with the Eroica Symphony, which ranks as one of his greatest interpretations. He has proven himself equally happy in the interpretation of Liszt's rhetorical music inspired by Byron's "Mazeppa." The overture of Berlioz is so little known that it will have the flavor of novelty. The tone poem of Strauss has few rivals in modern orchestral literature.

First Sunday Concert

It is not possible yet to announce the programme for the first Sunday afternoon concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall two weeks from today, Oct. 22, when the artists will be Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe De Luca, baritone of the

From The

Boston Globe

Oct. 8,1916.

Boston Symphony Season Begins This Week

The 36th season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first full rehearsal of the orchestra is to be held tomorrow morning, and the out-of-town concerts begin the following week with Providence, Oct 17. Dr Muck returned to town the middle of the week and is settled for the Winter in his house on the Fenway.

The selections for the first concerts here are quite familiar. This is in line with Dr Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, which has its biennial performances at the Symphony concerts.

The second part of the program comprises Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in the past years the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2:30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. The subscription for both the Friday and Saturday series is thoroughly satisfactory, but persons so desiring may still be able to get tickets at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts. They will be on sale at Symphony Hall all through this week.

Joint Recital Today By Zimbalist and Gogorza

A joint recital will be given in Symphony Hall at 3:30 this afternoon by the young Russian violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, and the favorite baritone, Emiliode Gogorza.

Zimbalist, who has not been heard in public for more than a year, during which period he has been resting, studying and composing, is to play Paganini's concerts in D major, Ernst's "The Last Rose of Summer" and a group of shorter compositions. Mr de Gogorza will sing an air from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide," one also from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," a group of the Spanish songs in which his audiences delight, and modern lyrics in English.

Miss Helen Winslow and Mr Samuel Chotzinoff will play the piano accompaniments.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Eight Concerts at Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of eight concerts this Winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The dates will be Oct 17, Nov 9, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 1 and 22, March 22 and April 26. The following seven soloists are announced: Fritz Kreisler, Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Sydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist, and, problematically, Miss Destinn, who was engaged for concerts here in March, but who may not come to America at all this season.

Of the two young pianists, Frances Nash is from the West. She has played with the Chicago Symphony and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. Miss Forbes of Boston was born in New Bedford, where she has played successfully with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Millar, a native of Virginia, was a pupil in Mme Sembrich's studio when heard by Mr Ellis and engaged for concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The season tickets which have not been taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at George H. Kent's University Book Store, Harvard sq, Cambridge, next Saturday morning, Oct 14.

Copley Theatre Concerts

The first of a series of concerts at the Copley Theatre will occur tonight, to be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra with Mme Cara Sapin, formerly of the Boston Opera Company, Harold Tripp the tenor, widely know through his appearances with the Meistersingers, and Louis Besserer, the violinist. The tickets are at the low price of 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Ethel Leginska, Pianist

The first concert of the season of the well-established series at Jordan Hall will be next Saturday afternoon, when Ethel Leginska, the brilliant young pianist, will give the following program: "Italian Concerto," Bach; Sixteen Valses, op. 39, Brahms; "Ecossaises," in E flat, Beethoven; "Pathetique" sonata, op. 13, Beethoven; variations on a theme by Paganini, op. 35, Brahms.

Jordan Hall Recitals

The young Russian pianist, Mischa Levitzki, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Thursday afternoon, Oct 19, following his New York debut, which will take place two days previous to his Boston appearance. His selections will be from Schumann, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Liszt and Mozart.

Mme Teresa Carreno will give her only piano recital in Boston this season in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon, Oct 21, at 3 o'clock. Her program will include Bach's "Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue;" Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1; Schumann's C major Fantasie, McDowell's "Keltie" Sonata, and pieces by Liszt and Schubert-Tausig.

From EVENING STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new National Theater Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Four soloists are announced at this time. These are Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York; Carl Friedberg, a remarkable pianist, and Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano whose singing is promised to be one of the sensations of the season.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, manager of the concerts in Washington, has announced that subscribers to the 1916-17 series may secure tickets at Droop's music store Thursday, October 12, and until Tuesday, October 17, when all tickets not claimed will be placed on public sale. The subscription is said to be quite up to the level of last year.

[19]

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date Sept 30th S

Boston Symphony

The subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming season will be opened to the general public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The subscription already is large and the season should be equal to last year. The concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

Five distinguished soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianists; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano.

From HERALD

Address: New York City BROOKLYN

OCT 8

Date

The time is close at hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The concerts as usual will come on Friday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

It is a matter of gratification to friends of the orchestra that the last several years have brought it such prosperity in this city. For many years it has had uniformly large audiences, but for the last two or three years the house has been entirely sold out by subscription.

The arrangements for the Brooklyn concerts call for the appearance of five soloists. These are:—Fritz Kreisler at the first, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth, and Emmy Destinn at the fifth and last. There seems to be some doubt about Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but great influences are at work to obtain a passport for her from the Austrian government, and the chances are that she will be safely landed in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March.

Fritz Kreisler is always welcome, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch has long since taken his place among the foremost pianists of our time. Carl Friedberg the last two years has made a profound impression in this country as a pianist, and must be rated among the greatest of contemporary artists.

Miss Millar to all intents and purposes is a debutante, for her first serious venture in public work as a singer will be in six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; these six including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich is launching on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers already known in public, notably Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is the first pupil she has trained from the beginning.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from an operation. His place will be filled from abroad.

Dr. Muck, who passed the entire summer on the Maine coast, has done much work in preparation for the coming season and an interesting series of programmes may be looked for.

AMERICAN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

OCT 8 — 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

With its annual announcement of its five concerts in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings the realization to Baltimoreans that the serious artistic work of the winter is near at hand.

The concerts will be given this year, as in the past, at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings and the dates are November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The singers are Emmy Destinn and Susan Millar; the pianists, Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and it is almost needless to say the violinist will be that supreme master of the instrument, Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert, Miss Millar at the second, Mr. Gabrilowitsch at the third, Mr. Friedberg at the fourth and Miss Destinn at the last.

The orchestra will return to Baltimore with its personnel practically the same as last year. It had the misfortune last month to lose by death Mr. Peter Sadony, who for the past 10 years had held the post of first bassoonist. His place will be filled from abroad.

PULASKI GARRISON MUSTER.

...in the history

From the

Transcript

Oct. 4 1916.

NEWS OF MUSIC

CHORAL MUSIC AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Pressing Need of Its Own Choir—Plans for the Visit of the Russian Ballet—A Prospectus from the Metropolitan—Nikisch on Music and the War — As Concerts Go in London—Items, Information, Opinions

WORD comes from Philadelphia that the symphony orchestra there is to retain as a permanent addition to its forces a considerable part of the chorus assembled and trained last winter for the performance of Mahler's eighth symphony. Thus Mr. Stokowski will be able at will to undertake symphonic pieces requiring voices as well as an orchestra and to diversify his programmes with an occasional choral piece. Word comes from Manchester in England that, even in war-time, Sir T. Beecham is organizing an expert professional chorus to assist the orchestra of the Hallé Concerts whenever the chosen music requires it. Rumor runs here in Boston that the Symphony Orchestra will borrow the chorus of The Cecilia so that Dr. Muck may include Brahms's "Song of Destiny" in one of the concerts for the Pension Fund. Gossip also alleges that Mr. Loeffler's new symphony is not as yet included in the announced pieces for the new series of Symphony Concerts because a male choir for the hymn at the end is lacking.

These conditions—the chance record of a passing week—speak for themselves. The Boston Symphony Orchestra much needs a chorus of its own if it is to be able to include in its active repertory not a few pieces, classic and contemporary, that ask voices as well as instruments. It needs such a choir if it is to be able also to diversify its regular concerts or its concerts for the Pension Fund with the occasional performance of choral music, pure, if not simple. At present it can attempt either only at long intervals and by makeshift and often unsatisfactory borrowings. For six years Dr. Muck has conducted at the Symphony Concerts, but we have yet to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony from his hand, nor shall we hear it until he has a numerous and expert chorus at his disposal. Mr. Loeffler's symphony, Delius's "Appalachia," this and that symphonic piece, ancient or modern, may not be heard in Boston because the music demands an assisting choir. We may barely know Dr. Muck's powers and possibilities as a choral conductor by the episodic finales of the two symphonies of Liszt. And so it goes. Without a chorus of its own the Symphony Orchestra lacks a useful, interesting, valuable and even necessary accessory; while Dr. Muck rightly insists that such a chorus, if it is ever to be added to his forces, must be a continuing and a semi-professional body of singers. Only such a choir could he bring to his standards. The "founder and sustainer" and the active management of the Symphony Orchestra are wise and resourceful. They ought to find a way to provide it with such a chorus as obvious need suggests and as Dr. Muck, with just ambition desires. From what he has made of the Symphony Orchestra, it is easy to infer what he would make of a Symphony Chorus.

CONT FROM

Charles River are thoroughly satisfactory and the scale of prices is considerably lower than that which prevails in Boston. As much care is taken in providing the programmes for Cambridge as for any of the other cities the orchestra visits, and it is the effort of the management to supply interesting and capable soloists. Seven soloists are scheduled for the coming year.

These are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist; and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn was engaged for a series of performances with the orchestra in Boston and various cities, these appearances coming in March. There is now considerable doubt about the possibility of her coming to America at all, but her manager still hopes that she may reach here before the winter is over. Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Irma Seydel need no introduction to the Cambridge audiences. Frances Nash is a pianist from the West, who has played with several of the principal orchestras of this country, including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with much success. Claire Forbes, another pianist, is a native of New Bedford, and is regarded as of unusual talent. A few years ago, she played with the orchestra in New Bedford with success.

Much interest is attached to the appearance of Susan Millar who, at the Cambridge concert, for which she is scheduled, will make her debut as a public singer. Miss Miller is a native of Virginia, and has worked at music all her life. She has studied singing seriously for the past six years. Her first three years were with Mme. Pappenheim. Then she was taken by Mme. Sembrich, whose pupil she has been since. Mr. Ellis heard her sing in New York last spring and, as a result, Miss Millar, a debutante, has been engaged for concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 8 -

SOLOISTS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to play a most important function in the musical and social life of Baltimore. It is 30 years since the orchestra first appeared here, and Baltimore has always given it loyal and enduring support.

The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Wednesday evenings. The dates are: November 1, November 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. Five soloists are announced. On November 1 the assisting artist will be Fritz Kreisler; November 29, Miss Susan Millar; January 3, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; February 14, Carl Friedberg, and March 14, Emmy Destinn. Thus there are two singers, two pianists and one violinist. Three of these artists have long been favorites in Baltimore. Fritz Kreisler is one of the most popular musicians in the world today, and Emmy Destinn has long been admired for her beautful voice and beautiful singing. Ossip Gabrilowitsch has grown mightily in the last few years, and now must be ranked among the very greatest pianists of our time.

The other two artists are less well known. Carl Friedberg is a pianist comparatively new in this country. He is regarded as one of the great men in his branch of the art, possessing all the mechanical requirements of modern piano-playing and having on top of this excellent musicianship and fine taste.

From The Boston Globe Oct. 8,1916.

Boston Symphony Season Begins This Week

The 36th season of the Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first full rehearsal of the orchestra is to be held tomorrow morning, and the out-of-town concerts begin the following week with Providence, Oct 17. Dr Muck returned to town the middle of the week and is settled for the Winter in his house on the Fenway.

The selections for the first concerts here are quite familiar. This is in line with Dr Muck's policy in past years. The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, which has its biennial performances at the Symphony concerts.

The second part of the program comprises Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

As in the past years the Friday afternoon concerts will begin at 2:30 and the Saturday evening concerts at 8. The subscription for both the Friday and Saturday series is thoroughly satisfactory, but persons so desiring may still be able to get tickets at nearly all prices for the Saturday concerts. They will be on sale at Symphony Hall all through this week.

Joint Recital Today By Zimbalist and Gogorza

A joint recital will be given in Symphony Hall at 3:30 this afternoon by the young Russian violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, and the favorite baritone, Emiliode Gogorza.

Zimbalist, who has not been heard in public for more than a year, during which period he has been resting, studying and composing, is to play Paganini's concerts in D major, Ernst's "The Last Rose of Summer" and a group of shorter compositions. Mr de Gogorza will sing an air from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide," one also from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," a group of the Spanish songs in which his audiences delight, and modern lyrics in English.

Miss Helen Winslow and Mr Samuel Chotzinoff will play the piano accompaniments.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Eight Concerts at Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of eight concerts this Winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The dates will be Oct 17, Nov 9, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 1 and 22, March 22 and April 26. The following seven soloists are announced: Fritz Kreisler, Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Sydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist, and, problematically, Miss Destinn, who was engaged for concerts here in March, but who may not come to America at all this season.

Of the two young pianists, Frances Nash is from the West. She has played with the Chicago Symphony and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. Miss Forbes of Boston was born in New Bedford, where she has played successfully with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Millar, a native of Virginia, was a pupil in Mme Sembrich's studio when heard by Mr Ellis and engaged for concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The season tickets which have not been taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at George H. Kent's University Book Store, Harvard sq, Cambridge, next Saturday morning, Oct 14.

Copley Theatre Concerts

The first of a series of concerts at the Copley Theatre will occur tonight, to be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra with Mme Cara Sapin, formerly of the Boston Opera Company, Harold Tripp the tenor, widely know through his appearances with the Meistersingers, and Louis Besserer, the violinist. The tickets are at the low price of 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Ethel Leginska, Pianist

The first concert of the season of the well-established series at Jordan Hall will be next Saturday afternoon, when Ethel Leginska, the brilliant young pianist, will give the following program: "Italian Concerto," Bach; Sixteen Valses, op. 39, Brahms; "Ecossaises," in E flat, Beethoven; "Pathetique" sonata, op. 13, Beethoven; variations on a theme by Paganini, op. 35, Brahms.

Jordan Hall Recitals

The young Russian pianist, Mischa Levitzki, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Thursday afternoon, Oct 19, following his New York debut, which will take place two days previous to his Boston appearance. His selections will be from Schumann, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Liszt and Mozart.

Mme Teresa Carreno will give her only piano recital in Boston this season in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon, Oct 21, at 3 o'clock. Her program will include Bach's "Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue;" Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1; Schumann's C major Fantasie, MacDowell's "Keltie" Sonata, and pieces by Liszt and Schubert-Tausig.

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date Sept 30th S

Boston Symphony

The subscription books for the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming season will be opened to the general public at Albaugh's ticket office Monday morning, October 9, and all seats which have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be available for prospective patrons of the concerts. The subscription already is large and the season should equal to last year. The concerts are to be given in the Lyric Theater on Friday evenings, November 1, January 3, February 14 and distinguished soloists are announced. These are: Emmy Destinn, of the Metropolitan Opera Carl Friedberg and Ossip pianists; Fritz Kreisler and Susan Millar, piano.

From HERALD

Address: New York City BROOKLYN

Date OCT 8

The time is close at hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The concerts as usual will come on Friday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

It is a matter of gratification to friends of the orchestra that the last several years have brought it such prosperity in this city. For many years it has had uniformly large audiences, but for the last two or three years the house has been entirely sold out by subscription.

The arrangements for the Brooklyn concerts call for the appearance of five soloists. These are:—Fritz Kreisler at the first, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth, and Emmy Destinn at the fifth and last. There seems to be some doubt about Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but great influences are at work to obtain a passport for her from the Austrian government, and the chances are that she will be safely landed in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March.

Fritz Kreisler is always welcome, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch has long since taken his place among the foremost pianists of our time. Carl Friedberg the last two years has made a profound impression in this country as a pianist, and must be rated among the greatest of contemporary artists.

Miss Millar to all intents and purposes is a debutante, for her first serious venture in public work as a singer will be in six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; these six including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich is launching on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers already known in public, notably Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is the first pupil she has trained from the beginning.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from an operation. His place will be filled from abroad.

Dr. Muck, who passed the entire summer on the Maine coast, has done much work in preparation for the coming season and an interesting series of programmes may be looked for.

AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

OCT 8 - 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

With its annual announcement of its five concerts in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings the realization to Baltimoreans that the serious artistic work of the winter is near at hand.

The concerts will be given this year, as in the past, at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings and the dates are November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The singers are Emmy Destinn and Susan Millar; the pianists, Carl Friedberg and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and it is almost needless to say the violinist will be that supreme master of the instrument, Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert, Miss Millar at the second, Mr. Gabrilowitsch at the third, Mr. Friedberg at the fourth and Miss Destinn at the last.

The orchestra will return to Baltimore with its personnel practically the same as last year. It had the misfortune last month to lose by death Mr. Peter Sadony, who for the past 10 years had held the post of first bassoonist. His place will be filled from abroad.

PULASKI GARRISON MUSTER.

From the

BOSTON SUNDAY POST

OCT.8, 1916.

The Opening Season

Symphony Concerts of Week to Open Boston's Musical Season of 1916-17—The Alleged Difficulty of Securing Music From Abroad—Concerts to Come

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The Symphony Orchestra is to give its usual series of eight concerts the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The season tickets which have not been taken up by subscription will be placed on sale at George H. Kent's University Book Store, Harvard square, Cambridge, next Saturday morning, Oct. 14. The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 26.

These concerts in Cambridge form an important adjunct to the work the orchestra does in Boston. In his original plans for the orchestra Mr. Higginson provided that Harvard University should have the benefit of it to as large an extent as possible, and from the very beginning concerts have been given in Cambridge. Sanders Theatre is acoustically one of the best auditoriums in the United States, and although its size limits not only the number of the audience, but the number of musicians used in the concerts, in every respect the performances across the Charles River are thoroughly satisfactory and the scale of prices is considerably lower than that which prevails in Boston. As much care is taken in providing the programmes for Cambridge as for any of the other cities the orchestra visits, and it is the effort of the management to supply interesting and capable soloists. Seven soloists are scheduled for the coming year.

These are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frances Nash, pianist; Irma Seydel, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Claire Forbes, pianist; and, problematically, Emmy Destinn. Miss Destinn was engaged for a series of performances with the orchestra in Boston and various cities, these appearances coming in March. There is now considerable doubt about the possibility of her coming to America at all, but her manager still hopes that she may reach here before the winter is over. Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Irma Seydel need no introduction to the Cambridge audiences. Frances Nash is a pianist from the West, who has played with several of the principal orchestras of this country, including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with much success. Claire Forbes, another pianist, is a native of New Bedford, and is regarded as of unusual talent. A few years ago, she played with the orchestra in New Bedford with success.

Much interest is attached to the appearance of Susan Millar who, at the Cambridge concert, for which she is scheduled, will make her debut as a public singer. Miss Miller is a native of Virginia, and has worked at music all her life. She has studied singing seriously for the past six years. Her first three years were with Mme. Pappenheim. Then she was taken by Mme. Sembrich, whose pupil she has been since. Mr. Ellis heard her sing in New York last spring and, as a result, Miss Millar, a debutante, has been engaged for concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

CONCERTS

Boston Symphony

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of exceptional interest: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; Berlioz's overture, "Le Corsair"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The programme is a happy augury of the future of the Symphony programmes of the winter. Dr. Muck opened the first season of his second Boston engagement with the Eroica Symphony, which ranks as one of his greatest interpretations. He has proven himself equally happy in the interpretation of Liszt's rhetorical music inspired by Byron's "Mazeppa." The overture of Berlioz is so little known that it will have the flavor of novelty. The tone poem of Strauss has few rivals in modern orchestral literature.

First Sunday Concert

It is not possible yet to announce the programme for the first Sunday afternoon concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall two weeks from today, Oct. 22, when the artists will be Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe De Luca, baritone of the

From EVENING STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new National Theater Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Four soloists are announced at this time. These are Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York; Carl Friedberg, a remarkable pianist, and Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano whose singing is promised to be one of the sensations of the season.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, manager of the concerts in Washington, has announced that subscribers to the 1916-17 series may secure tickets at Droop's music store Thursday, October 12, and until Tuesday, October 17, when all tickets not claimed will be placed on public sale. The subscription is said to be quite up to the level of last year.

[19]

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 8 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO APPEAR WITH EMINENT SOLOISTS

Five Concerts to be Given in Brooklyn on Friday Evenings—Recitals Announced by Harold Bauer and Eddy Brown—Two Organ Recitals To-day in the High Schools.

The time is close at hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn under the asupices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The concerts will, as usual, occur on Friday evenings, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 16 and March 16.

It is a matter of gratification to all friends of the orchestra that the past several years have brought it such prosperity in this city. For many years it has had uniformly large audiences, but for the last two or three years the house has been entirely sold out by subscription. To be sure, Brooklyn in this respect differs in no wise from the neighboring borough of Manhattan, where the ten concerts are sold out by subscription, or from the neighboring cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where the same condition prevails. In fact, there are a few more difficult tasks confronting the music-lover than to hear this greatest orchestra of America without the possession of a season ticket to some of the series of concerts it gives in the East.

The arrangements for the Brooklyn concerts call for the appearance of five soloists. These are: Fritz Kreisler at the first, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth, and Emmy Destinn at the fifth and last. These seems to be at present some doubt about Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian government, and the chances are that she will be safely landed in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March. Therefore the management deems it best to continue in its announcement of her appearance as a soloist.

Fritz Kreisler is always a very welcome visitor and Ossip Gabrilowitsch has long since taken his place among the foremost pianists of our time. The other two artists are less known. Carl Frielberg, the past two years, has made a profound impression in this country as a pianist and undoubtedly must be rated among the greatest of contemporary artists.

The announcement of Susan Millar is intreesting from several points of view. Miss Millar is, to all intents and purposes, a debutante, for her first serious venture in the public work as a singer will be in six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these six including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme Marcella Sembrich is launching on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers already known in public, Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is her first pupil that she has trained from the beginning.

The young lady was given a hearing last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who thought so warmly of her that these engagements are the result. She is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual beauty, and, as to her art, it is only necessary to say that a great authority like Mme. Sembrich guarantees that she is "ready." Mr. Ellis firmly believes that Miss Millar is going to be one of the sensations of the year.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from the result of an operation. His place will be filled from abroad.

Dr. Muck, who spent the entire summer on the Maine coast, has done much work in preparation for the coming season and an interesting series of programmes may be looked for.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 8 1916

Boston Symphony Plans for Academy Concerts.

Arrangements for the Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music call for the appearance of five soloists. The dates follow for the concerts: Friday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. Fritz Kreisler is to play the violin at the first concert and, in regular order, will come: Susan Millar, a new mezzo-soprano, from whom much is expected; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Carl Friedberg, pianist, and Emmy Destinn, soprano. Doubt is expressed as to the possibility of Miss Destinn's ability to reach America, says C. E. Ellis, Boston press representative of the Boston Symphony, but he declares that "great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian Government and the chances are that she will be in America before her services are needed in March by the organization." The orchestra returns with few changes in the personnel. Peter Sadony, first bassoon player, died last month from the result of an operation. Dr. Muck has spent the summer in Maine, and an interesting series of programs may be looked for.

EVG. SUN
Baltimore Md.
OCT 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS

Two Singers, Two Pianists And A Violinist Engaged As Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in announcing its plans for the forthcoming season, the thirtieth consecutive one in which the famous organization has played in Baltimore, gives the dates of the five concerts at the Lyric as November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. There is already a large subscription made up of renewals of those who subscribed for the concerts last year and the tickets that have not been taken will be placed on sale on Monday.

Very few changes have been made in the personnel of the big band of musicians, although last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who was for the last 10 years the first bassoon player. His place will be filled from abroad.

Notable Works On Program.

Dr. Karl Muck, who spent the summer on the coast of Maine, has prepared many notable works for the forthcoming concerts, at each of which there will be an eminent soloist. The list includes two singers, two pianist and a violinist—Emmy Destinn, Susan Millar, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert, Miss Millar at the second, Mr. Gabrilowitsch at the third, Mr. Friedberg at the fourth and Miss Destinn at the last.

Carl Friedberg, who has been in this country since the war began, is making his first appearances with the Boston Orchestra this season. He is a talented musician and, in the opinion of Kreisler, has no superior.

Miss Millar Young Artist.

The appearance of Miss Millar will be, from more than one point of view, an interesting event. Her full name is Susan Randolph Millar, and comes from Front Royal, Va. When she appears in Baltimore she will be practically a debutante. She was brought to the notice of Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last spring by Mme. Marcella Sembrich, whose pupil she has been for the last several years. Mme. Sembrich told Mr. Ellis she regarded Miss Millar as the most promising vocalist that she had ever heard in America, and a hearing convinced Mr. Ellis that Miss Millar was an artist to be taken very seriously.

She has a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual warmth and beauty and she has been engaged as a debutante to appear at no less than six of the important concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING Bulletin
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
SEP 30 1916

Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Plans for the six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been completed and the stage at Infantry Hall has been extended so that the entire group of 100 musicians can be cared for when the music demands that number. For the first time this season the entire Boston and New York personnel will appear in this city. The soloists for the concerts will be Emmy Destinn, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

SYMPHONY SEASON OF '16-'17 OPEN

Masterly Performance Displays Genius of Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the first concert of its season of 1916-17 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This is the concert which formally opens the musical season in Boston.

Yesterday it was a brilliant occasion, first, because of the uncommonly attractive programme and the exceedingly brilliant performances; secondly, because of the pleasurable reunions which these occasions always bring.

AUDIENCES ALWAYS SAME

The audiences at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony are audiences which have an intimate flavor that would hardly be possible in any other big American city.

Even before the abolishing of the fall auctions, which took effect this year, a majority of the Friday afternoon subscribers, at least, were neighbors of many seasons. It was to these people no new thing to find beside them the same person or persons whom they had sat beside so long, but it was a new and not an unpleasant sensation to realize that the selected seats could and doubtless would be retained by the same persons for many years to come, without the possibility of an unkind bidder scattering them to some other part of the auditorium, unknown and undesired.

Greeting to Dr. Muck

Then there was the greeting extended Dr. Muck when he appeared. The warmth of this greeting, in a community not unaffected by strong sympathies with one or the other side now at war in Europe, speaks especially well for his hold on his public. His audiences rightly anticipated a brilliant concert, and in advance they tendered their appreciation and esteem. Dr. Muck has been criticised, and not without justice, in the past, for the character of some of his programmes. The programme of yesterday was excellently balanced and contrasted: the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the little known overture of Berlioz to "The Corsair"; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; Richard Strauss' orchestral rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel."

If there were the inevitable thoughts of the great war, there could have been no more fitting epitome of the ideals and the heroism of men than of Beethoven's symphony, a symphony written to the momory of a hero. This symphony is a colossus in orchestral literature. It remains, in spirit and dimensions, a conception of well-nigh incredible vastness. No modern tone-poem is more ambitious in its structure and outlines. No modern orchestra speaks with more prophetic power.

Masterly Interpretation

The interpretation of this work, even for such a conductor as Dr. Muck, was of exceptional eloquence. The reading of the funeral march will long be remembered. Seldom has this movement had such nobility and tenderness, and such an epic quality. How marvellously each instrument told its tale, how subtly the finest nuances were observed and yet the simple grandeur of the whole kept ever before the hearer, could be told in many sentences. But how Dr. Muck made felt a spirit behind the music, a spirit that seemed to brood over the place, is not so easily told. One could define his rhythmical feeling, his control of the wonderful inner pulsations of the orchestra, the heart-beats, as it were, of great music, felt as a continuous undertone; one could dilate on this and that ingenious feat of tone-coloring. But that would not be telling the secret. Everyone was moved by this supreme lamentation, by these solemn thoughts of the glory and the majesty of death. The variations which make the finale movement had seldom been so clearly and significantly presented, but one wished that there had been fewer horns in the trio of the scherzo, where the effect should be more poetic and refined than it was yesterday.

Berlioz's Little Known Overture

Berlioz's overture is very little known. It was performed in Boston in 1896 by the Boston Symphony under Paur. It is worth performing.

It is possessed with the youthful madness of the romantic period. It has a brilliancy almost febrile, yet a brilliance which seems to be transmitted in some mysterious way over a century of time to Richard Strauss, who writes in Till Eulenpsigel with a nervousness and mordancy not commonly associated with artists of his race. The themes of the overture to "The Corsair" are not important, but the fire and impetuousness of the work, and its bold coloring—all these things mark the composition of a great master in the making.

Glorified Vulgarity

Similarly with Liszt's work. All the flaunting glory and all the picturesque posing of the romantic period are here encountered. The piece has a lordly vulgarity and elan. The opening pages are good, but the themes of Mazeppa are exceedingly commonplace. The glorification of Mazeppa, at the end, is effective, though pompous and noisy. How admirably Dr. Muck understood this work and the work preceding! How superbly he flaunted his canvas that crackled with colors of the most blinding hues.

And then there was the superb reading of the satirical work of Strauss. No such mordant and penetrating commentory on life has come from any other German, and few composers of any period or nationality have approached Strauss in this particular vein. And if Strauss' satire were only malicious or bitter, he would, however clever or inspired a musician, fail to strike the fundamental note that he strikes in this composition.

FROM THE
BOSTON POST
OCT 14,1916.

From the
BOSTON JOURNAL
October 14,,1916.

36TH SYMPHONY INTRODUCED IN SUPERB MANNER

Dr. Muck and Orchestra in Fine Fettle—Program Very Attractive.

FRITZ KREISLER IS NEXT WEEK'S SOLOIST

Celebrated Symphony by Chausson to Be Revived.

Brilliant in the extreme was the opening yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 36th season. Program, performance, an audience that completely filled Symphony Hall and ardent enthusiasm on the part of musicians and auditors combined to make the occasion memorable.

Dr. Muck was most cordially welcomed by the always warm-hearted matinee audience. He looked refreshed after his long vacation and he conducted with the authority and the artistry that go so far to make the Symphony Orchestra envied and admired throughout the whole western world. It was the quintessence of pleasure to sit through so superb a performance as this unostentatious music-master directed yesterday.

The orchestra—a magnificent instrument to play upon, to be sure—responded splendidly, as is its wont, to Dr. Muck's suave, but imperious leadership. After the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, the applause lasted until the men stood up and made their acknowledgements; but similar ovations, as a matter of fact, were deserved after the performance of every one of the four numbers on the program. The classic beauty and dignity of the symphony found a match in the vivid tone pictures that followed—in Berlioz' "Corsair" overture, in Liszt's "Mazeppa" and in Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The performance of the Strauss rondo was indeed a dazzling feat of virtuosity on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

The same program will be performed at tonight's concert.

The Friday matinees are sold out for the season, but there are some seats left for the Saturday night concerts.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at next week's concerts. The nonpareil violinist will play a new concerto by Ernest Schelling. Dr. Muck will revive the celebrated symphony by Chausson, which has not been played here since 1906, and Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture will complete the program.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
SEP 23 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening—Oct. 17—the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week, a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner programme was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

The subscription for the season, which has been going on since the close of last season, has reached gratifying dimensions and the patronage of the orchestra in Providence will be at least up to the high average of the past several years.

From the
BOSTON - ‡ - POST
October 15th

Giuseppe di Luca, baritone, Symphony Hall, Sunday, Oct. 22. (C) Mishkin, New York.)

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the season in Boston at the Symphony concerts. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto in one movement for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished American composer and pianist.

This concerto is to have its first public hearing in Providence, and it will be played again next Thursday evening at the first Symphony concert in Cambridge. It had its first rehearsal last Tuesday morning. Mr. Schelling sketched the concerto last July and then finished its orchestration in three weeks. It is in one movement and lasts 19 minutes.

From the
BOSTON * POST
October 15,1916.

Dr. Muck is reviving the Symphony in B-flat by Ernest Chausson. The symphony had its first performance in this country in Philadelphia in the fall of 1905, when the Boston Symphony played it there under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. Later in the season it was played here in Boston by Mr. Gericke. Curiously enough, it has remained on the shelves since. It may be added that the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns the original manuscript parts of the symphony brought to this country by Mr. d'Indy.

The other numbers of the programme are Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture. The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Symphony in B flat, op. 20 ..... Chausson
"A Faust Overture" ..... Wagner
Concerto for violin and orchestra ..... Schelling
Overture, "Academic Festival," op. 80, Brahms
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

On Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Boston. He has two works of considerable importance on his programme. First of these is Bach's concerto in A minor, and the second a concerto in E minor by Conus. These will be followed by groups of small pieces.

[20]

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO APPEAR WITH EMINENT SOLOISTS

Five Concerts to be Given in Brooklyn on Friday Evenings—Recitals Announced by Harold Bauer and Eddy Brown—Two Organ Recitals To-day in the High Schools.

The time is close at hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn under the asupices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The concerts will, as usual, occur on Friday evenings, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 16 and March 16.

It is a matter of gratification to all friends of the orchestra that the past several years have brought it such prosperity in this city. For many years it has had uniformly large audiences, but for the last two or three years the house has been entirely sold out by subscription. To be sure, Brooklyn in this respect differs in no wise from the neighboring borough of Manhattan, where the ten concerts are sold out by subscription, or from the neighboring cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where the same condition prevails. In fact, there are a few more difficult tasks confronting the music-lover than to hear this greatest orchestra of America without the possession of a season ticket to some of the series of concerts it gives in the East.

The arrangements for the Brooklyn concerts call for the appearance of five soloists. These are: Fritz Kreisler at the first, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth, and Emmy Destinn at the fifth and last. These seems to be at present some doubt about Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian government, and the chances are that she will be safely landed in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March. Therefore the management deems it best to continue in its announcement of her appearance as a soloist.

Fritz Kreisler is always a very welcome visitor and Ossip Gabrilowitsch has long since taken his place among the foremost pianists of our time. The other two artists are less known. Carl Frielberg, the past two years, has made a profound impression in this country as a pianist and undoubtedly must be rated among the greatest of contemporary artists.

The announcement of Susan Millar is intreesting from several points of view. Miss Millar is, to all intents and purposes, a debutante, for her first serious venture in the public work as a singer will be in six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these six including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme Marcella Sembrich is launching on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers already known in public, Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is her first pupil that she has trained from the beginning.

The young lady was given a hearing last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who thought so warmly of her that these engagements are the result. She is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual beauty, and, as to her art, it is only necessary to say that a great authority like Mme. Sembrich guarantees that she is "ready." Mr. Ellis firmly believes that Miss Millar is going to be one of the sensations of the year.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from the result of an operation. His place will be filled from abroad.

Dr. Muck, who spent the entire summer on the Maine coast, has done much work in preparation for the coming season and an interesting series of programmes may be looked for.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony Plans for Academy Concerts.

Arrangements for the Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music call for the appearance of five soloists. The dates follow for the concerts: Friday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. Fritz Kreisler is to play the violin at the first concert and, in regular order, will come: Susan Millar, a new mezzo-soprano, from whom much is expected; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Carl Friedberg, pianist, and Emmy Destinn, soprano. Doubt is expressed as to the possibility of Miss Destinn's ability to reach America, says C. E. Ellis, Boston press representative of the Boston Symphony, but he declares that "great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian Government and the chances are that she will be in America before her services are needed in March by the organization." The orchestra returns with few changes in the personnel. Peter Sadony, first bassoon player, died last month from the result of an operation. Dr. Muck has spent the summer in Maine, and an interesting series of programs may be looked for.

EVG. SUN
ess: Baltimore Md.
OCT 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS

Two Singers, Two Pianists And A Violinist Engaged As Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in announcing its plans for the forthcoming season, the thirtieth consecutive one in which the famous organization has played in Baltimore, gives the dates of the five concerts at the Lyric as November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. There is already a large subscription made up of renewals of those who subscribed for the concerts last year and the tickets that have not been taken will be placed on sale on Monday.

Very few changes have been made in the personnel of the big band of musicians, although last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who was for the last 10 years the first bassoon player. His place will be filled from abroad.

Notable Works On Program.

Dr. Karl Muck, who spent the summer on the coast of Maine, has prepared many notable works for the forthcoming concerts, at each of which there will be an eminent soloist. The list includes two singers, two pianist and a violinist—Emmy Destinn, Susan Millar, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert, Miss Millar at the second, Mr. Gabrilowitsch at the third, Mr. Friedberg at the fourth and Miss Destinn at the last.

Carl Friedberg, who has been in this country since the war began, is making his first appearances with the Boston Orchestra this season. He is a talented musician and, in the opinion of Kreisler, has no superior.

Miss Millar Young Artist.

The appearance of Miss Millar will be, from more than one point of view, an interesting event. Her full name is Susan Randolph Millar, and comes from Front Royal, Va. When she appears in Baltimore she will be practically a debutante. She was brought to the notice of Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last spring by Mme. Marcella Sembrich, whose pupil she has been for the last several years. Mme. Sembrich told Mr. Ellis she regarded Miss Millar as the most promising vocalist that she had ever heard in America, and a hearing convinced Mr. Ellis that Miss Millar was an artist to be taken very seriously.

She has a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual warmth and beauty and she has been engaged as a debutante to appear at no less than six of the important concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

e First Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
0 1916

Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Plans for the six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been completed and the stage at Infantry Hall has been extended so that the entire group of 100 musicians can be cared for when the music demands that number. For the first time this season the entire Boston and New York personnel will appear in this city. The soloists for the concerts will be Emmy Destinn, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

SYMPHONY SEASON OF '16-'17 OPEN

Masterly Performance Displays Genius of Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the first concert of its season of 1916-17 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This is the concert which formally opens the musical season in Boston.

Yesterday it was a brilliant occasion, first, because of the uncommonly attractive programme and the exceedingly brilliant performances; secondly, because of the pleasurable reunions which these occasions always bring.

AUDIENCES ALWAYS SAME

The audiences at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony are audiences which have an intimate flavor that would hardly be possible in any other big American city.

Even before the abolishing of the fall auctions, which took effect this year, a majority of the Friday afternoon subscribers, at least, were neighbors of many seasons. It was to these people no new thing to find beside them the same person or persons whom they had at beside so long, but it was a new and not an unpleasant sensation to realize that the selected seats could and doubtless would be retained by the same persons for many years to come, without the possibility of an unkind bidder scattering them to some other part of the auditorium, unknown and undesired.

Greeting to Dr. Muck

Then there was the greeting extended Dr. Muck when he appeared. The warmth of this greeting, in a community not unaffected by strong sympathies with one or the other side now at war in Europe, speaks especially well for his hold on his public. His audiences rightly anticipated a brilliant concert, and in advance they tendered their appreciation and esteem. Dr. Muck has been criticised, and not without justice, in the past, for the character of some of his programmes. The programme of yesterday was excellently balanced and contrasted: the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the little known overture of Berlioz to "The Corsair"; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; Richard Strauss' orchestral rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel."

If there were the inevitable thoughts of the great war, there could have been no more fitting epitome of the ideals and the heroism of men than of Beethoven's symphony, a symphony written to the momory of a hero. This symphony is a colossus in orchestral literature. It remains, in spirit and dimensions, a conception of well-nigh incredible vastness. No modern tone-poem is more ambitious in its structure and outlines. No modern orchestra speaks with more prophetic power.

Masterly Interpretation

The interpretation of this work, even for such a conductor as Dr. Muck, was of exceptional eloquence. The reading of the funeral march will long be remembered. Seldom has this movement had such nobility and tenderness, and such an epic quality. How marvellously each instrument told its tale, how subtly the finest nuances were observed and yet the simple grandeur of the whole kept ever before the hearer, could be told in many sentences. But how Dr. Muck made felt a spirit behind the music, a spirit that seemed to brood over the place, is not so easily told. One could define his rhythmical feeling, his control of the wonderful inner pulsations of the orchestra, the heart-beats, as it were, of great music, felt as a continuous undertone; one could dilate on this and that ingenious feat of tone-coloring. But that would not be telling the secret. Everyone was moved by this supreme lamentation, by these solemn thoughts of the glory and the majesty of death. The variations which make the finale movement had seldom been so clearly and significantly presented, but one wished that there had been fewer horns in the trio of the scherzo, where the effect should be more poetic and refined than it was yesterday.

Berlioz's Little Known Overture

Berlioz's overture is very little known. It was performed in Boston in 1896 by the Boston Symphony under Paur. It is worth performing.

It is possessed with the youthful madness of the romantic period. It has a brilliancy almost febrile, yet a brilliance which seems to be transmitted in some mysterious way over a century of time to Richard Strauss, who writes in Till Eulenpsigel with a nervousness and mordancy not commonly associated with artists of his race. The themes of the overture to "The Corsair" are not important, but the fire and impetuousness of the work, and its bold coloring—all these things mark the composition of a great master in the making.

Glorified Vulgarity

Similarly with Liszt's work. All the flaunting glory and all the picturesque posing of the romantic period are here encountered. The piece has a lordly vulgarity and elan. The opening pages are good, but the themes of Mazeppa are exceedingly commonplace. The glorification of Mazeppa, at the end, is effective, though pompous and noisy. How admirably Dr. Muck understood this work and the work preceding! How superbly he flaunted his canvas that crackled with colors of the most blinding hues.

And then there was the superb reading of the satirical work of Strauss. No such mordant and penetrating commentory on life has come from any other German, and few composers of any period or nationality have approached Strauss in this particular vein. And if Strauss' satire were only malicious or bitter, he would, however clever or inspired a musician, fail to strike the fundamental note that he strikes in this composition.

FROM THE
BOSTON POST
OCT 14,1916.

From the
BOSTON JOURNAL
October 14,,1916.

36TH SYMPHONY INTRODUCED IN SUPERB MANNER

Dr. Muck and Orchestra in Fine Fettle—Program Very Attractive.

FRITZ KREISLER IS NEXT WEEK'S SOLOIST

Celebrated Symphony by Chausson to Be Revived.

Brilliant in the extreme was the opening yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 36th season. Program, performance, an audience that completely filled Symphony Hall and ardent enthusiasm on the part of musicians and auditors combined to make the occasion memorable.

Dr. Muck was most cordially welcomed by the always warm-hearted matinee audience. He looked refreshed after his long vacation and he conducted with the authority and the artistry that go so far to make the Symphony Orchestra envied and admired throughout the whole western world. It was the quintessence of pleasure to sit through so superb a performance as this unostentatious music-master directed yesterday.

The orchestra—a magnificent instrument to play upon, to be sure—responded splendidly, as is its wont, to Dr. Muck's suave, but imperious leadership. After the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, the applause lasted until the men stood up and made their acknowledgements; but similar ovations, as a matter of fact, were deserved after the performance of every one of the four numbers on the program. The classic beauty and dignity of the symphony found a match in the vivid tone pictures that followed—in Berlioz' "Corsair" overture, in Liszt's "Mazeppa" and in Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The performance of the Strauss rondo was indeed a dazzling feat of virtuosity on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

The same program will be performed at tonight's concert.

The Friday matinees are sold out for the season, but there are some seats left for the Saturday night concerts.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at next week's concerts. The nonpareil violinist will play a new concerto by Ernest Schelling. Dr. Muck will revive the celebrated symphony by Chausson, which has not been played here since 1906, and Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture will complete the program.

SEP 23 1916
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening—Oct. 17—the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week, a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner programme was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

The subscription for the season, which has been going on since the close of last season, has reached gratifying dimensions and the patronage of the orchestra in Providence will be at least up to the high average of the past several years.

From the
BOSTON - ‡ - POST
October 15th

Giuseppe di Luca, baritone, Symphony Hall, Sunday, Oct. 22. (C) Mishkin, New York.)

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the season in Boston at the Symphony concerts. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto in one movement for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished American composer and pianist.

This concerto is to have its first public hearing in Providence, and it will be played again next Thursday evening at the first Symphony concert in Cambridge. It had its first rehearsal last Tuesday morning. Mr. Schelling sketched the concerto last July and then finished its orchestration in three weeks. It is in one movement and lasts 19 minutes.

From the
BOSTON * POST
October 15,1916.

Dr. Muck is reviving the Symphony in B-flat by Ernest Chausson. The symphony had its first performance in this country in Philadelphia in the fall of 1905, when the Boston Symphony played it there under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. Later in the season it was played here in Boston by Mr. Gericke. Curiously enough, it has remained on the shelves since. It may be added that the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns the original manuscript parts of the symphony brought to this country by Mr. d'Indy.

The other numbers of the programme are Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture. The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Symphony in B flat, op. 20.....Chausson
"A Faust Overture".....Wagner
Concerto for violin and orchestra...Schelling
Overture, "Academic Festival," op. 80, Brahms
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

On Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Boston. He has two works of considerable importance on his programme. First of these is Bach's concerto in A minor, and the second a concerto in E minor by Julen Conus. These will be followed by two groups of small pieces.

[20]

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO APPEAR WITH EMINENT SOLOISTS

Five Concerts to be Given in Brooklyn on Friday Evenings—Recitals Announced by Harold Bauer and Eddy Brown—Two Organ Recitals To-day in the High Schools.

The time is close at hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn under the asupices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The concerts will, as usual, occur on Friday evenings, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 16 and March 16.

It is a matter of gratification to all friends of the orchestra that the past several years have brought it such prosperity in this city. For many years it has had uniformly large audiences, but for the last two or three years the house has been entirely sold out by subscription. To be sure, Brooklyn in this respect differs in no wise from the neighboring borough of Manhattan, where the ten concerts are sold out by subscription, or from the neighboring cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where the same condition prevails. In fact, there are a few more difficult tasks confronting the music-lover than to hear this greatest orchestra of America without the possession of a season ticket to some of the series of concerts it gives in the East.

The arrangements for the Brooklyn concerts call for the appearance of five soloists. These are: Fritz Kreisler at the first, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth, and Emmy Destinn at the fifth and last. These seems to be at present some doubt about Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian government, and the chances are that she will be safely landed in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March. Therefore the management deems it best to continue in its announcement of her appearance as a soloist.

Fritz Kreisler is always a very welcome visitor and Ossip Gabrilowitsch has long since taken his place among the foremost pianists of our time. The other two artists are less known. Carl Frielberg, the past two years, has made a profound impression in this country as a pianist and undoubtedly must be rated among the greatest of contemporary artists.

The announcement of Susan Millar is intreesting from several points of view. Miss Millar is, to all intents and purposes, a debutante, for her first serious venture in the public work as a singer will be in six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these six including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme Marcella Sembrich is launching on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers already known in public, Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is her first pupil that she has trained from the beginning.

The young lady was given a hearing last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who thought so warmly of her that these engagements are the result. She is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual beauty, and, as to her art, it is only necessary to say that a great authority like Mme. Sembrich guarantees that she is "ready." Mr. Ellis firmly believes that Miss Millar is going to be one of the sensations of the year.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from the result of an operation. His place will be filled from abroad.

Dr. Muck, who spent the entire summer on the Maine coast, has done much work in preparation for the coming season and an interesting series of programmes may be looked for.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony Plans for Academy Concerts.

Arrangements for the Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music call for the appearance of five soloists. The dates follow for the concerts: Friday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. Fritz Kreisler is to play the violin at the first concert and, in regular order, will come: Susan Millar, a new mezzo-soprano, from whom much is expected; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Carl Friedberg, pianist, and Emmy Destinn, soprano. Doubt is expressed as to the possibility of Miss Destinn's ability to reach America, says C. E. Ellis, Boston press representative of the Boston Symphony, but he declares that "great influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian Government and the chances are that she will be in America before her services are needed in March by the organization." The orchestra returns with few changes in the personnel. Peter Sadony, first bassoon player, died last month from the result of an operation. Dr. Muck has spent the summer in Maine, and an interesting series of programs may be looked for.

EVG. SUN
ess: Baltimore Md.
OCT 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS

Two Singers, Two Pianists And A Violinist Engaged As Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, i announcing its plans for the forthcom ing season, the thirtieth consecutive on in which the famous organization has played in Baltimore, gives the dates of the five concerts at the Lyric as Novem ber 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14. There is already a larg subscription made up of renewals of those who subscribed for the concerts last year and the tickets that have been taken will be placed on sale on day.

Very few changes have been ma the personnel of the big ban musicians, although last month th chestra had the misfortune to lo death Peter Sadony, who was for th 10 years the first bassoon player. place will be filled from abroad.

Notable Works On Progra

Dr. Karl Muck, who spent the mer on the coast of Maine, has pr many notable works for the fo ing concerts, at each of which the be an eminent soloist. The list i two singers, two pianist and a ist—Emmy Destinn, Susan Milla Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsc Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler wil soloist at the first concert, Miss M the second, Mr. Gabrilowitsch third, Mr. Friedberg at the fou Miss Destinn at the last.

Carl Friedberg, who has been country since the war began, is his first appearances with the Orchestra this season. He is a musician and, in the opinion of has no superior.

Miss Millar Young Arti

The appearance of Miss Mil be, from more than one point an interesting event. Her full Susan Randolph Millar, and co Front Royal, Va. When she ap Baltimore she will be practi debutante. She was brought to tice of Mr. Ellis, manager of t ton Symphony Orchestra, last s Mme. Marcella Sembrich, whos she has been for the last severa Mme. Sembrich told Mr. Ellis garded Miss Millar as the most ing vocalist that she had ever h America, and a hearing convin Ellis that Miss Millar was an a be taken very seriously.

She has a mezzo-soprano voic usual warmth and beauty and been engaged as a debutante to at no less than six of the import certs of the Boston Symphony tra, including Philadelphia, Ba and Washington.

e First Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SEP 30 1916

Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Plans for the six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been completed and the stage at Infantry Hall has been extended so that the entire group of 100 musicians can be cared for when the music demands that number. For the first time this season the entire Boston and New York personnel will appear in this city. The soloists for the concerts will be Emmy Destinn, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Susan Millar, a mezzo-soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

SYMPHONY SEASON OF '16-'17 OPEN

Masterly Performance Displays Genius of Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the first concert of its season of 1916-17 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This is the concert which formally opens the musical season in Boston.

Yesterday it was a brilliant occasion, first, because of the uncommonly attractive programme and the exceedingly brilliant performances; secondly, because of the pleasurable reunions which these occasions always bring.

AUDIENCES ALWAYS SAME

The audiences at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony are audiences which have an intimate flavor that would hardly be possible in any other big American city.

Even before the abolishing of the fall auctions, which took effect this year, a majority of the Friday afternoon subscribers, at least, were neighbors of many seasons. It was to these people no new thing to find beside them the same person or persons whom they had sat beside so long, but it was a new and not an unpleasant sensation to realize that the selected seats could and doubtless would be retained by the same persons for many years to come, without the possibility of an unkind bidder scattering them to some other part of the auditorium, unknown and undesired.

Greeting to Dr. Muck

Then there was the greeting extended Dr. Muck when he appeared. The warmth of this greeting, in a community not unaffected by strong sympathies with one or the other side now at war in Europe, speaks especially well for his hold on his public. His audiences rightly anticipated a brilliant concert, and in advance they tendered their appreciation and esteem. Dr. Muck has been criticised, and not without justice, in the past, for the character of some of his programmes. The programme of yesterday was excellently balanced and contrasted: the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the little known overture of Berlioz to "The Corsair"; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; Richard Strauss' orchestral rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel."

If there were the inevitable thoughts of the great war, there could have been no more fitting epitome of the ideals and the heroism of men than of Beethoven's symphony, a symphony written to the momory of a hero. This symphony is a colossus in orchestral literature. It remains, in spirit and dimensions, a conception of well-nigh incredible vastness. No modern tone-poem is more ambitious in its structure and outlines. No modern orchestra speaks with more prophetic power.

Masterly Interpretation

The interpretation of this work, even for such a conductor as Dr. Muck, was of exceptional eloquence. The reading of the funeral march will long be remembered. Seldom has this movement had such nobility and tenderness, and such an epic quality. How marvellously each instrument told its tale, how subtly the finest nuances were observed and yet the simple grandeur of the whole kept ever before the hearer, could be told in many sentences. But how Dr. Muck made felt a spirit behind the music, a spirit that seemed to brood over the place, is not so easily told. One could define his rhythmical feeling, his control of the wonderful inner pulsations of the orchestra, the heart-beats, as it were, of great music, felt as a continuous undertone; one could dilate on this and that ingenious feat of tone-coloring. But that would not be telling the secret. Everyone was moved by this supreme lamentation, by these solemn thoughts of the glory and the majesty of death. The variations which make the finale movement had seldom been so clearly and significantly presented, but one wished that there had been fewer horns in the trio of the scherzo, where the effect should be more poetic and refined than it was yesterday.

Berlioz's Little Known Overture

Berlioz's overture is very little known. It was performed in Boston in 1896 by the Boston Symphony under Paur. It is worth performing.

It is possessed with the youthful madness of the romantic period. It has a brilliancy almost febrile, yet a brilliance which seems to be transmitted in some mysterious way over a century of time to Richard Strauss, who writes in Till Eulenpsigel with a nervousness and mordancy not commonly associated with artists of his race. The themes of the overture to "The Corsair" are not important, but the fire and impetuousness of the work, and its bold coloring—all these things mark the composition of a great master in the making.

Glorified Vulgarity

Similarly with Liszt's work. All the flaunting glory and all the picturesque posing of the romantic period are here encountered. The piece has a lordly vulgarity and elan. The opening pages are good, but the themes of Mazeppa are exceedingly commonplace. The glorification of Mazeppa, at the end, is effective, though pompous and noisy. How admirably Dr. Muck understood this work and the work preceding! How superbly he flaunted his canvas that crackled with colors of the most blinding hues.

And then there was the superb reading of the satirical work of Strauss. No such mordant and penetrating commentory on life has come from any other German, and few composers of any period or nationality have approached Strauss in this particular vein. And if Strauss' satire were only malicious or bitter, he would, however clever or inspired a musician, fail to strike the fundamental note that he strikes in this composition.

FROM THE
BOSTON POST
OCT 14,1916.

From the
BOSTON JOURNAL
October 14,,1916.

36TH SYMPHONY INTRODUCED IN SUPERB MANNER

Dr. Muck and Orchestra in Fine Fettle—Program Very Attractive.

FRITZ KREISLER IS NEXT WEEK'S SOLOIST

Celebrated Symphony by Chausson to Be Revived.

Brilliant in the extreme was the opening yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 36th season. Program, performance, an audience that completely filled Symphony Hall and ardent enthusiasm on the part of musicians and auditors combined to make the occasion memorable.

Dr. Muck was most cordially welcomed by the always warm-hearted matinee audience. He looked refreshed after his long vacation and he conducted with the authority and the artistry that go so far to make the Symphony Orchestra envied and admired throughout the whole western world. It was the quintessence of pleasure to sit through so superb a performance as this unostentatious music-master directed yesterday.

The orchestra—a magnificent instrument to play upon, to be sure—responded splendidly, as is its wont, to Dr. Muck's suave, but imperious leadership. After the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, the applause lasted until the men stood up and made their acknowledgements; but similar ovations, as a matter of fact, were deserved after the performance of every one of the four numbers on the program. The classic beauty and dignity of the symphony found a match in the vivid tone pictures that followed—in Berlioz' "Corsair" overture, in Liszt's "Mazeppa" and in Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The performance of the Strauss rondo was indeed a dazzling feat of virtuosity on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

The same program will be performed at tonight's concert.

The Friday matinees are sold out for the season, but there are some seats left for the Saturday night concerts.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at next week's concerts. The nonpareil violinist will play a new concerto by Ernest Schelling. Dr. Muck will revive the celebrated symphony by Chausson, which has not been played here since 1906, and Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture will complete the program.

SEP 22 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The opening of the musical season is nearer at hand than most people realize. Three weeks from next Tuesday evening—Oct. 17—the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of six concerts here, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. For the first time since the orchestra began to come here, 35 years ago, it will be able to use the same orchestra in Providence that it uses in Boston, New York and other large cities. In the past, owing to the small size of the stage in Infantry Hall, it has been necessary radically to reduce the number of string instruments and, correspondingly, of wind instruments. But this week, a special extension to the stage is being built, one which may be put up just before the concert and removed immediately after, and when Dr. Muck wishes to play a work which takes the entire personnel of 100 men, he will be able to do so. This is most important, for in the past Providence has had to do without some of the most interesting modern works that require a very large orchestra, and even last April, when a Wagner programme was given here, it was necessary to take off one of the numbers originally chosen by Dr. Muck and substitute another because of the impossibility of putting enough musicians on the stage. The new extension will be built at the sacrifice of only one of the rear rows.

The subscription for the season, which has been going on since the close of last season, has reached gratifying dimensions and the patronage of the orchestra in Providence will be at least up to the high average of the past several years.

From the
BOSTON - ‡ - POST
October 15th

Giuseppe di Luca, baritone, Symphony Hall, Sunday, Oct. 22. (C) Mishkin, New York.)

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the season in Boston at the Symphony concerts. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto in one movement for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished American composer and pianist.

This concerto is to have its first public hearing in Providence, and it will be played again next Thursday evening at the first Symphony concert in Cambridge. It had its first rehearsal last Tuesday morning. Mr. Schelling sketched the concerto last July and then finished its orchestration in three weeks. It is in one movement and lasts 19 minutes.

From the
BOSTON * POST
October 15,1916.

Dr. Muck is reviving the Symphony in B-flat by Ernest Chausson. The symphony had its first performance in this country in Philadelphia in the fall of 1905, when the Boston Symphony played it there under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. Later in the season it was played here in Boston by Mr. Gericke. Curiously enough, it has remained on the shelves since. It may be added that the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns the original manuscript parts of the symphony brought to this country by Mr. d'Indy.

The other numbers of the programme are Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture. The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Symphony in B flat, op. 20.....Chausson
"A Faust Overture".....Wagner
Concerto for violin and orchestra.....Schelling
Overture, "Academic Festival," op. 80, Brahms
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

On Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, in Symphony Hall, Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital of the season in Boston. He has two works of considerable importance on his programme. First of these is Bach's concerto in A minor, and the second a concerto in E minor by Jules Conus. These will be followed by two groups of small pieces.

[20]

From The
BOSTON HERALD
Oct.14,1916.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA -OPENS SEASON

Audience Fills the Hall at Start of 36th Concert Year—Dr. Muck Is Heartily Greeted as Conductor — Berlioz's Overture "The Corsair" Is Played.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK IS ANNOUNCED

By PHILIP HALE.

The 36th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows. Bethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Berlioz, Overture, "The Corsair"; Liszt, Symphonic poem "Mazeppa"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's."

The overture of Berlioz was played in Boston for the first time 20 years ago last January, when Mr. Paur conducted the orchestra. This overture has exercised the ingenuity of commentators. It has been stated boldly that Berlioz composed it in 1831, shortly after he had contemplated suicide, having learned that his dear Camilla Moke, the pianist, had married Pleyel, a manufacturer of pianos. The economic advantage in this match did not appeal to Berlioz's sense of humor. Wandering about Nice, he found a ruined tower that suited his melancholy mood. On a rock near the base of this tower he sat and saw the sea. Since this overture is known as "The Corsair," and as Berlioz had described his emotions on reading Byron's poem in a confessional in St. Peter's at Rome, the music has been regarded as a musical expression of the Corsair's character and adventures.

But the overture when it was first played in Paris, in 1845, was entitled "The Tower of Nice." The autograph manuscript in the library of the Paris Conservatory shows that this title was erased; that "The Red Corsair" was substituted, and then the word "red" erased. When the overture, greatly revised, was performed in 1855 it was called "The Corsair."

It may be that the overture has no more to do with Byron's misanthrope than it has with "Le Corsaire," a periodical to which Berlioz contributed in his younger days. Is the overture Byronic? Surely the tower of Nice did not resemble the tower of Nesle, the scene of Margaret of Burgundy's orgies with the corpse of the lover floating in the Seine the next morning.

When Berlioz revisited Nice in 1844 he lodged "in a tower adjoining the Ponchettes cliff." "I enjoyed there the admirable view of the Mediterranean and a restfulness the value of which I more than ever appreciated." He did not mention any overture with which he was then busied. Maurice Bourges, however, in the review of Berlioz's concert in 1845, stated that "The Tower of Nice" was composed during Berlioz's last sojourn in the Midi. Did Berlioz so inform him? Berlioz was given to romantic tales—witness his memoirs, which, as a record of facts in his musical life, are often untrustworthy.

What, pray, has the Tower of Nice, as lodgings in 1844, to do with this overture? In his account of that sojourn, Berlioz states that he wrote the "Lear" overture when he was in Nice years before. If he had composed "The Corsair" in 1844 would he not have said so? He speaks of the quiet that was grateful to him. In 1831 he was sorely perturbed. The overture to "The Corsair" is by no means in contemplative mood. And why did he change the title at first to "The Red Corsair"? Had he "The Red Rover" in mind? We know that he was reading Byron's "Corsair" in 1831.

All this interests the biographer and the antiquarian rather than the hearer. The hearer may try to find the Byronic spirit in "The Corsair" or fancy some old tale about the tower of Nice: it matters not, the overture is not among the best or the second best works of Berlioz; the ideas are not striking, and neither the development of them nor the orchestration commands the attention. Buelow had an inexplicable fondness for the overture. Perhaps a certain virtuoso dash, the florid passages for the strings fascinated him.

An audience that filled the hall greeted Dr. Muck heartily. The performance of the "Eroica" Symphony was most impressive, in fact we do not remember any other so euphonious, so eloquent, so noble. Beethoven had Napoleon in his mind when he wrote the music, but the funeral march is for all heroes, triumphant or overcome. The brilliance of the orchestra was fully displayed in the pieces by Liszt and Strauss, but a greater contrast in the second part of the program would have been welcome. If "Mazeppa" and Strauss's rondo had been separated by something short and suave or light and gay, they would have been still more effective. "Bring forth the horse!" Liszt rode him cavorting and wildly galloping long after Mazeppa had been unbound; he rode him bravely at the head of the procession of the futurists of his time to the music of a rather ordinary march with a pleasing trio in the Hungarian manner. This may be said: Liszt's music is as romantically descriptive, pompous and, at last bombastic as Victor Hugo's poem that suggested it.

Would that Strauss had always been so constantly fortunate in his later works as he was in "Till Eulenspiegel"! Here is an exhibition of fancy, realism, humor, and a touch of the macabre that is always musical; that is without too evident straining after effect; that does not attempt to serve as a commentary on Nietzsche or picture the intimate life of the Strauss family. That Strauss can be charming and simple is shown by the prologue and epilogue of "Till"; "once upon a time there was——"

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Chausson, Symphony in B flat major; Wagner, a Faust overture; Schelling, concerto for violin (first time here; Mr. Kreisler, violinist); Brahms, "Academic Festival" overture.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
OCT 8

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Susan Millar, Pupil of Sembrich, Will Be Among the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first of its five concerts in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 16 and March 16. There will be five soloists—Fritz Kreisler at the first concert, Susan Millar at the second, Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the third, Carl Friedberg at the fourth and Emmy Destinn at the fifth. There seems to be doubt as to Miss Destinn's ability to reach America from her native Bohemia, whither she went last spring, but influences are at work to secure a passport for her from the Austrian Government, and the chances are that she will be in America long before her services will be needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March.

Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, a native of Virginia, and the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich has launched on a career. Mme. Sembrich has taught and coached other singers, notably Alma Gluck, but Miss Millar is the first pupil she has trained from the beginning. Miss Millar was heard last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who thought so well of her that these symphony engagements are the result. Mr. Ellis firmly believes Miss Millar will be one of the sensations of the year.

The orchestra returns to Brooklyn with few changes in its personnel. It had the misfortune to lose last month Peter Sadony, its first bassoonist, who died from the effects of an operation.

From the
BOSTON GLOBE
Oct. 14,1916.

SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS BRILLIANTLY

Dr Muck and Orchestra in Fine Spirits

Scintillating "Till Eulenspiegel"

"Eroica" Nobly Played

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 36th season yesterday with the first Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall. The audience was a large one, few seats being empty. The welcome given Dr Muck was cordial and prolonged, and there was the usual warm recognition of the orchestra. The principals of the various choirs were in their places, save in the first chair of the bassoons, where Mr Mosbach has been advanced to succeed the late Mr Sadony.

It is not easy to recall a more brilliant orchestral performance than that of Strauss' rollicking rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." There were the dash, abandon and surety which might be associated only with weeks of routine. There were the trenchant brilliance, the ironical humor, the fleetness, variety and precision with which one episode led to the next, mixing sentiment with raillery. The tonal quality of the orchestra never seemed more sonorous, euphonious, golden. Nor has Dr Muck at any time seemed more sure, in his attitudes and pantomime of quiet, magnetic authority, of the instant understanding of his interpretative intent and of its fulfillment.

Beethoven's third symphony which began the program was played as a great epic. It was cast in heroic mold, typical and appropriately expressive of a time when men fearlessly face death or give up their lives, expressive above all in the gravity and majesty of the slow movement, a song of sorrow, played yesterday with reverence and unspeakable beauty. The scherzo is of another and a distinctive mood. The whispering voices of forest leaves in the first theme, the breezy hunting horns in the trio, recall nature and relieve the serious vein of what precedes. The song of triumph of the last movement was inspiriting.

Berlioz' "Corsair," with its headlong rushing flights, the romantic song and the arresting modulation of the close sounding fresh today, is strangely prophetic music for 70 years ago. The turmoil and passion of Byron's burning poem still flames from it. without the exaggeration into which Berlioz at times fell.

Liszt's "Mazeppa," originating 20 years before in a piano study to Hugo's poem, is mannered and theatrical in comparison, stereotyped in sequential treatment of ideas that are not Liszt at his best. Dr Muck did all possible for the Cossack chief and his galloping steed. Liszt has written elsewhere, as in the "Faust" symphony or the most difficult "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," first played by the orchestra last year, which shows more fairly the significant contribution by the great Hungarian to the development of program music of pictorial or delineative nature, a type set forth by the three numbers of the second half of the program—Berlioz, Liszt, Strauss.

The program for next week, which will bring Mr Kreisler in a novelty, is as follows: Chausson, symphony in B flat; Wagner, "A Faust overture"; Schelling, concerts for violin and orchestra; Brahms, overture, "Academic Festival."

From the Christian Monitor.
Oct.14th,/16.

CONCERTS OPEN WITH BEETHOVEN THIRD SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony orchestra—First concert, Karl Muck conducting; afternoon of Oct. 13. The program; Beethoven, third symphony, in E flat major, "Eroica" Berlioz, "Corsair" overture; Liszt, "Mazeppa," symphonic poem; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel" tone poem.

After the Beethoven symphony was dutifully disposed of, and every fiddler had made sure that his strings were tight, and every piper that his valves were in order, the concert may be said to have begun. For no performance by this orchestra of modern tone resource and modern executive equipment can be regarded as set going on music of such delicacy and light framework as Beethoven's third symphony. An epic a century ago, the work is an idyl today; and neither its pompous title nor all the dissertations that have been written on it can make it seem anything else to a world trained to the clash and din of Berlioz, Liszt and Strauss. A conductor may bear hard on the accents of the funeral march to his heart's content, he only dispels the illusion of the heroic the more certainly. The way for him to rehabilitate the music in its former grandeur is to make it less grand, to keep away from it all that has been composed since 1825, and to present it with an orchestra of moderate size. The "Eroica" will be big again when it is made properly small.

A more compendious and impressive group of short pieces to illustrate the descriptive style which has prevailed since Beethoven's time could not easily be chosen than the "Corsair" overture, the "Mazeppa" poem and the "Eulenspiegel" rondo. Nor could a group easily be chosen that would better display the viewpoints and the particular talents of the three orchestral masters represented. And as for the fitness of the works to the powers of the Symphony men, conductor and players alike, that was all that could be asked. Then, furthermore, as for the appropriateness of the selections to the likings of the Symphony public—everybody knows that if music is such as to make people think, such as to give them a vision and such, finally, as to make them merry, it has a good welcome in Boston, Mass., on Friday afternoons in winter.

Where can an overture be found which in all points of technique and expression excels that of "The Corsair," by Berlioz? There is a design which is broadly conceived and economically carried out. There is melodic stride and harmonic glow. There is instrumentation which is irreproachably clear and perfectly balanced and blended. There are contrasts of orchestra color which are so subtle as to seem only half meant. There is movement, there is suspense, there is warm and human utterance which never says a word too much.

"Mazeppa" is a veritable summary of the orchestral Liszt, exemplifying all the impatience of the composer to show life in a large view and all his ability to make an effect by line when he could not by color, all his genius for thematic strategy.

"Eulenspiegel" is one of the masterworks of tone satire, and as such, one of the most characteristic efforts of its writer. It tells its story with just the amount of verisimilitude that is appropriate to program music and it follows the academic rondo pattern with just enough consistency to hold the listener's purely musical attention. Inconsequent fun and mock pathos were never expressed, outside the pictorial and dramatic arts, more tellingly than they are in the Strauss instrumentation here.

VIOLIN CONCERTO OF SCHELLING IN SYMPHONIC STYLE

Ernest Schelling's violin concerto, which was written the past summer, will be produced at Providence, R. I., on the evening of Tuesday, Oct. 17, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The work is described by the composer as more in the style of a symphony than of a traditional concerto, since there is no regular alternation of passages for full orchestra and accompanied solo violin. And yet it is molded on the customary three-movement plan, the first division containing a double-theme exposition and development, the second being a romantic song and the last being a lively rondo. Performance of the piece is without break, for the movements are joined together by passages of recitative for violin and harp. Two short cadenzas occur in the course of the work.

Two ideas are taken from the composer's "Artist's Life" variations for piano and orchestra, which were produced in Boston last season. Especially important is material from variation No. 16, for viola solo and piano, inscribed to "Fr. Kr.," which has been introduced into the slow movement, with the violin playing the music assigned to the viola in the original. Something also has been taken from the variation No. 14, which describes the scenery on a lagoon of North Carolina. In the last movement is an interlude in Spanish manner, with queer rhythms; and in this movement, too, is music in the manner of a Scotch reel.

The concerto was written at Bar Harbor, Me., and the score, which is in manuscript, bears date as having been begun July 18, and completed Aug. 26, 1916. A first draft for violin and piano was made in 10 days and Mr. Kreisler immediately began practising it with the composer at the piano. The composition calls for a large orchestra, demanding especially full equipment in the wood wind section.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 8 1916

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given here during the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Academy of Music ticket office to-morrow morning. A very considerable part of the house is already taken for the season, for few subscribers of last year have neglected to renew for this.

The plans for the season call for the usual concerts on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music and the dates are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12. Five soloists are announced. In October, the assisting artist will be Fritz Kreisler; in November, Susan Millar; in January, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; in February, Carl Friedberg, and in March, Emmy Destinn. Thus there are two singers, two pianists and one violinist. Three of these artists have long been favorites in Philadelphia. Fritz Kreisler is one of the most popular musicians in the world to-day and Emmy Destinn has long been admired for her beautiful voice and beautiful singing. Ossip Gabrilowitsch has grown mightily in the last few years, and now must be ranked among the very greatest pianists of our time.

The other two artists are less well known. Carl Friedberg is a pianist comparatively new in this country. He is regarded as one of the great men in his branch of the art, possessing all the mechanical requirements of modern piano playing and having on top of this excellent musicianship and fine taste.

The appearance of Miss Susan Millar should be one of the interesting incidents of the musical season. Miss Millar, when she sings here with the orchestra, will be, to all intents and purposes, a debutante. She is a Virginian by birth and her voice is mezzo-soprano. Last Spring Mme. Marcella Sembrich sent word to Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that she had a pupil who was "ready" in every sense of the word, and asked him to give her a hearing. This was brought about in a few weeks and Mr. Ellis, after listening to Miss Millar sing an hour or more in Aeolian Hall, New York, made up his mind that here was a young woman who had a very great future before her. As a result of this hearing, Miss Millar has been engaged for six concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

SUSAN MILLAR

From the
Christian Monitor

Photographed for The Christian Science Monitor

Bust of Henry L. Higginson by Bela Pratt, which stands in front corridor of Symphony hall, Bos

[21]

From the Moniter Oct 14 1916

PHILADELPHIA NOTES

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — The first operatic visitor of the season is the Boston National opera company, under Max Rabinoff's management, which will come to the Metropolitan opera house for a fortnight, beginning Nov. 13. For the first night "Andrea Chenier," by Giordano, will be revived, with Giovanni Zenatello in the title role. The opera has not been heard here for some years. In this production the Ballet Russe will appear. Mascagni's "Iris" will be given with the Japanese prima donna, Tamaki Miura. Maggie Teyte will be heard as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust," with Riccardo Martin in the name-part. George Baklanoff will assume the threefold baritone role in Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." A newcomer is Vicente Ballester, a Spanish baritone.

The local executive committee for the Metropolitan opera company comprises Thomas DeWitt Cuyler, Alfred C. Harrison, John Frederick Lewis, Henry Pratt McKean, Clement B. Newbold, Edward T. Stotesbury, Charlton Yarnall, Charles F. Schibener (secretary). From this list several sustainers in the event of a serious fiscal situation might provide assistance. Usually in the past the first appeal has been made to Mr. Stotesbury. He is now said to be inclined to let other men do their share, and the opera with a season of but 16 performances will probably almost break even, for last season each of the 12 offerings had a crowded house. The Metropolitan season begins Tuesday evening, Nov. 21, and continues on Tuesday evenings, with few omissions, until April 17. Reginald de Koven is popular here, and the musical community will be disappointed if it does not hear his "Canterbury Pilgrims." To the familiar classified and modern repertory there are added, besides de Koven's work, Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris," Zandonai's "Francesca da Rimini," Bizet's "Les Pêcheurs de Perles," Massenet's "Thais," Delibes' "Lakmé," Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" and Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro." The new singers are Alice Eversman, Odette Le Fontenay, Marie Sundelius, Kathleen Howard and Paul Bender. Gennaro Papi, formerly of Naples, and Paul Eisler, from Vienna, are added to the staff of conductors.

A local grand opera company is projected, to be directed by Ettore Martini and managed by William H. Rosenbach. It plans a series of performances of the old-time favorites, at popular prices, beginning Dec. 18, at the Academy of Music.

The Matinee Musical Club, a flourishing organization of women, has on its season's calendar the Flonzaley quartet for Nov. 7, a MacDowell day for Jan. 16, a mid-winter choral concert with Antony Torello, contrabassist, for Jan. 18, a piano recital by Percy Grainger on Jan. 30, Ratan Devi in costume recital March 13, and numerous other events.

Other newly announced events casting their brightness before are Paderewski's recital, Oct. 21, and the Boston Symphony series of five concerts. Mr. Paderewski will play Bach's chromatic fantasia and fugue, restored to his repertory after a lapse of years, Beethoven's sonata "Appassionata," Chopin's G minor ballade, F sharp major nocturne, etudes 12, 7 and 3 from op. 10, the A flat major valse; then the "Cracovienne fantastique" by himself and finally Liszt's fantasia on Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The Boston Symphony orchestra dates are Oct. 30, with Fritz Kreisler (probably in the new Schelling concerto); Nov. 27, with Susan Millar, mezzo soprano; Jan. 1, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch; Feb. 12, with Carl Friedberg; and Emmy Destinn on March 12.

LONDON NOTES

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

LONDON, England—The visit of the famous French band, known officially as La Musique de la Garde Républicaine, has more than a political or military interest. Contrary to the general impression, these 80 players are not under the orders of any regimental authority, but, like the members of the Comédie Française and other state-endowed bodies, are paid and controlled directly by the French government. So long ago as 1795 France had a Band of the Republic, and the present organization has lived through the fall of the Second Republic and the Second Empire. The British Coldstream Guards, by the way, had a band of eight players even earlier than this, viz., 1783. Being purely a state institution, La Musique de la Garde Républicaine performs only at state functions and cannot be engaged privately; its members have salaries ranging from £100 to £210 a year. The most liberally supported English Guards bands are, of course, less advantageously placed. The members of these receive only the pay of soldiers and a complete band has about 65 players to the French band's 80. The conductor of La Musique is M. Guillaume Barlay, and the concert, which is to be given at the Albert hall in aid of French war charities, is certain to attract an enormous audience.

Several native composers figure in the present week's programs at the Queen's Hall Promenade concerts. There is a first orchestral performance of Mr. Frank Bridge's "Sally in Our Alley" and "Cherry Ripe," for string orchestra. Mr. Edward German's Welsh Rhapsody and Mr. Norman O'Neill's Four Dances from "The Blue Bird" are also being played. Mr. Coolbrooke's Symphonic Variations on "Three Blind Mice" and Mr. Grainger's "Shepherd's Hey" are, of course, part of the regular repertory. An interesting first performance is that of a new suite of Rebikov entitled "The Christmas Tree."

BIRMINGHAM, England — At a luncheon given by the Lord Mayor, Alderman Neville Chamberlain, a new organization called the Midland Concert Promoters Association was launched recently with the object of establishing a permanent orchestra in Birmingham. It will also act as a central agency for engaging soloists and a certain number of concerts will be given each season by arrangement with the various existing musical societies. The Lord Mayor, who is the president of the association and one of its leading promoters, expressed the opinion that the only hope for practical musical progress in Birmingham lay in the establishment of a permanent local orchestra. No one was strong enough to found and keep going a permanent local orchestra without the help of others. Therefore, the combination was the logical thing, so that as an association they might be able to offer a sufficiently substantial number of definite engagements as would enable them to keep the class of men they required for the orchestra. Sir Thomas Beecham, in an interesting speech, said that in musical history Great Britain was not much below the most prominent of musical nations. Many of its composers and instrumentalists need not fear comparison. There was no superior evidence of musical culture on the Continent, but it was necessary to combat the rather popular and erroneous idea that the foreigner, because he was a foreigner, was better musically than many Englishmen. Sir Henry Wood also spoke and hoped that the city would become a great musical pioneer.

From the Boston Herald Oct. 14, 1916.

FIRST CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The first Symphony concert of the season in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, will be given next Thursday evening, Oct. 19, at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Kreisler, who will play for the first time here Ernest Schelling's new Concerto, in one movement, for violin and orchestra.

The program is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony "Eroica"; Wagner, a "Faust" Overture; Schelling, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra; Brahms, Overture, "Academic Festival."

SECOND SUNDAY CONCERT

The second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall comes on Oct. 29, when Mr. Kreisler will give his first recital this season. The program will include Bach's Concerto in A minor, a concerto in E minor by Jules Conus, and two groups of characteristic pieces.

SECOND SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the season in Boston at the second pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon, Oct. 20, and Saturday evening, Oct. 21. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto in one movement for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling. This concerto will be played for the first time next Tuesday evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Providence. It will be played again next Thursday evening at the first Symphony concert in Cambridge. Mr. Kreisler is enthusiastic over it. Mr. Schelling sketched it last July, and finished its orchestration in three weeks. It is in one movement and lasts 19 minutes. Dr. Muck is reviving the Symphony in B Flat by Chausson. The symphony had its first performance in this country at Philadelphia in the fall of 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it there under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. It was played here in Boston under Mr. Gericke. The orchestra owns the original manuscript parts of the Symphony brought to this country by Mr. d'Indy. The program in full is as follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat; Wagner, a "Faust" Overture; Schelling, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra; Brahms, Overture, "Academic Festival."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

OLD AND NEW BEGINNINGS FOR ANOTHER YEAR

Scarcely a Departure from Custom—Dr. Muck and the Orchestra at the Top of Their Bent—From the "Eroica" Symphony Through Romantic Melodrama in Tones to the High Humors of Strauss and "Till"

FIVE months of pause, between spring and autumn, in the succession of the Symphony Concerts suffices to freshen each renewal of the series. Symphony Hall is relatively a changeless room and the most observant yesterday afternoon could discover nothing newer than a few re-covered chairs; yet, unvisited from May to October, it has a pleasant air of unfamiliarity. Scarcely a new face rose from the ranks of the orchestra; but a rearrangement of the sittings of the first and the second violins disclosed remembered figures in unaccustomed places. Narrow scrutiny of the programme-book returned but one variation in the routine pages—an answer at last to the prayer that the women of the audience be "earnestly requested not to put on hats before the end of a number." As for those women, considerate or careless, and for the rest of the listening company, they differed in no external respect from the assemblages of many a recent year, though the re-distribution of seats under the new plan of subscription had shifted here and there a familiar habitué. The youth, upon whom the future of the concerts depends, seemed a shade more numerous than usual; perhaps the middle-aged had even waxed a bit in their grave listening. Dr. Muck and the orchestra could not have asked a more intent or applausive audience as the public of the Symphony Concerts goes. The conductor was clapped loud and long when he came first to his stand; while, thrice and four times recalled at the end of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, he brought his men to their feet to share the plaudits. Nothing, indeed, that was reasonably to be expected was lacking to the occasion—no: not even the departure of the contingent that, were the concert only half an hour long, would probably forsake it before the final number.

So much for beginnings. On the other hand what the jargon of reviewing calls "the state of the orchestra" attested once more the continuity of the concerts since Dr. Muck has led them. The band might have been playing in public on Thursday instead of on the sixth day of last May, so fully was it in command of its familiar powers and distinctions. The precision of the strings was as sure as their pace was swift and their utterance clear in the racing passages of Beethoven's scherzo or the ride of Mazeppa in Liszt's like-named tone-poem. The mellow sonorities of the brass tempered the blatant pomps of the coronation march—for it deserves no higher title—with which that same "Mazeppa" ends. The voices of the wind choir, fused in edgeless suavities of song, similarly glorified the romantic sentimentalities of the slow introduction to Berlioz's overture, suggested by Byron's poem of "The Corsair." Not for an instant throughout the concert did the orchestra lack its wonted richness and suppleness of tone, energy of eloquence, fineness of adjustment, propulsive and characterizing power. It etched upon the ear the intricate tonal humors of Strauss's Till; it flung off Berlioz's overture like the stormy music, written and to be played in a heat, that it seems. Its power rose nigh in the up-swellings of the first movement of Beethoven's symphony; it matched it with beauty in the succeeding "funeral march." A single human voice might not be more sensitive and sure of modulation; many voices might not weave in such just measure and impeccable euphony the inner strands of symphonic music. The instrument that Dr. Muck had laid down in May he now picked up in October, without even the usually necessity to retune it.

As unchanged was the conductor himself in music that, outside the overture of "The Corsair," many in the audience were hearing familiarly in his imparting and heightening voice. Perhaps he took Till's tonal pranks with a little more of the exuberance of hearty folk-tale that is surely in the music and a little less of ironic humor than has hitherto been his wont, so that it was possible for the hearer to grin with the rogue as well as to smile at him. Perhaps now that Dr. Muck is assured of every intonation that he would give to Beethoven's symphony, he bears it forward through the first two movements with freer sweep, ampler surge, intenser contrasts, and more heroic note. In fact, in the passionate, changeful and inexhaustible progress of that first allegro under his leading, it was hard to note the equally fertile skill in modulation, gradation, contrast that enhanced the ensuing magnificences of tone. The sustained pace and rhythm, the rise and fall of the "funeral march" until it ends in the fragments that seem to drift upward into the haven of heroes, were as flawless. Dr. Muck's pace is slow and grave—the "adagio assai" that Beethoven wrote above the movement to the full—yet since he never lets the music droop or smear, he gains thereby an exceeding gravity and loftiness of lament. Perhaps the irresistible march and passion of the musical thought and the spiritual emotion, the epical voice and glory of the "Eroica" symphony cease with the final measures of this threnody; thereafter it may become no more than conventional Beethoven. Distinction enough surely as music-making goes, past, present and to come and not the less reason to praise the conductor's pliancy and vividness with the racing measures and the warm contrasts of scherzo and trio or the swift, clear flight in which he led variation after variation into the long ascent of the finale. There again what seemed his new freedom with the music told.

Two columns from the Transcript Oct. 16, 1916.

After the "Eroica," which for two movements at least is tonal tragedy, the overture of Berlioz and the tone-poem of Liszt were bound to seem no more than romantic and rhetorical melodrama. If anyone reads Eryon's "Corsair" now he probably reads it with a smile over Conrad of "the one virtue and a thousand crimes," and over Medora, devotion on a tower, if not exactly patience on a monument. Berlioz thought the versified tale "burning poetry," and after a hundred years upon the head of its romantic excesses, it does keep a pleasurable wildness of invention and ardor of word and rhyme. No one nowadays probably connotes the Englishman's poem with the Frenchman's overture, which, indeed, has rather the better of it as a survival from a romantic day in all the seven arts. Not even the copious programme book, though it outspread Hugo's poem about Mazeppa, deigned so much as to summarize "The Corsair." The overture stood or fell by its own musical merit; escaped the drenching sweetness of that first slow melody; succumbed not to occasional sound and fury, and prevailed by that same burning ardor of invention and speech that Berlioz found in the poem. To feel so hot and swift is somehow to burn away the fashions of music that time has outmoded.

The shortcoming of "Mazeppa" is the lack of this passionate heat. Grant the Cossack coronation as a musical fashion of a romantic time and an idiosyncrasy of Liszt, who, when he set to a symphonic poem, loved an "apotheosis" for ending. Yet even so, Mazeppa's tonal ride seems rather a programmatic affair. Away go the plunging triplets; 'round and 'round in tremolo figures swirls the flying landscape; Mazeppa's motive, now resolute, now piteous, now distorted as in a vertigo of suffering and sensation, undergoes the expected Lisztian transformations; suspensive, and mysterious suggestion precede a coronation which is far from either. No doubt, as Liszt wrote on the fly-leaf, it is all symbolic of portentous human destinies; somewhat more certainly it is graphic and resourceful narrative in tones; while most certainly of all, it is in the day's work of Liszt and his fellow-romantics. Some of them painted Mazeppa; others, Byron as well as Hugo, versified him; whoever chose had his fling at what seems no very impressive hero or moving adventure. Delineation and development go hand in hand in Liszt's music; the graphic incisiveness of the ride, the swelling pomps of the coronation serve the turn of the programme. The listener hears and approves, whereas with the burning Berlioz he hears and believes.

Dr. Muck missed neither the impetuous heat of "The Corsair" nor the vivid tone-picturing of "Mazeppa"; so far as performance goes, he answers not a whit less fully to the romantic dissolving views of Liszt and Berlioz than he does to the sharp-set characterization and the prankish wit of the Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel." Humor forsook them when they sat before music-paper and a merry mind went not well with their romantic intensities. Yet Strauss, witty and gay, as he is from end to end of "Till," outdoes them in pictorial vividness and musical aptness. What tonal form better suits the recurring Till and his pranks than the reiterations and returns of the chosen rondo? The motive that characterizes him is the teetering, leering jester to the life; invention never halts as the music is metamorphosed from one roguery into another; the illusion never flags; humor and spirit hold high to the end. "Once upon a time" begins the prologue; "once upon a time" summarizes the epilogue, and "once upon a time," cries the music, Strauss could write so perfect a piece in its kind. And yesterday Dr. Muck added the last touch, as it seemed to a perfect performance. Heretofore, he has missed nothing of exposition, characterization, humor, narrative, but the light about the music has been dry. Now he makes it glow with Strauss's own heartiness—the "folk-feeling" that no German, however "cerebral," quite escapes.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

ess OCT 8 1916

Dr. Karl Muck.

Conductor Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Elmwood Music hall January 28; third in series of concerts given by Mai Davis Smith.

From the Providence Journal October 18th.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

Orchestra Opens 36th Season Here with Fine Programme.

MANY NEW PLAYERS APPEAR

Total of 105 Men Work Under Leadership of Dr. Muck at Infantry Hall.—Kreisler Gives New Concerto by Schelling.—Conductor Gives Reading of "Eroica."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 36th season in Providence last evening in Infantry Hall. There were many new faces to be seen, the reason being that for the first time in the history of the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city they brought their full number of players. To be exact, there were 105 men playing under Dr. Muck last evening which is about 25 more than ordinarily has been the case in seasons past. An enlargement of the stage was necessary in order to accommodate the extra number.

The orchestra played magnificently. Naturally there was an increase in tonal volume over what we have been accustomed to hear in former concerts. Forte passages were noble, majestic, and climaxes thrilling in their power, while in pianissimo effects, in the producing of which Dr. Muck is an adept, there was a breadth and beauty which comes only with the use of a great number of instruments.

Although the programme contained but three numbers, the concert was a little longer than is usual, because of the length of the "Eroica" symphony.

Fritz Kreisler appeared as soloist, playing a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished piano virtuoso. The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler during the past summer, while the composer was at Bar Harbor, Me. This was the first public performance of the work and Mr. Schelling sat among the audience.

The programme follows:

Symphony No. 8, in F flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Concerto for violin and orchestra..... Schelling
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6..... Liszt

Beethoven's massive work is familiar to Boston symphony patrons. Whether or not it was inspired by Napoleon, whose figure loomed gigantic at the time of its composition, it is a noble musical creation and is quite overpowering when played under conditions such as existed last evening. We have heard the symphony given by the Boston orchestra under Nikish, Paur, Gericke, and, lastly, Dr. Muck—all admirable performances. But we have no hesitation in saying that never before in this city has it received such a noble, compelling interpretation as that of last evening. The increased size of the orchestra may have had something to do with the forming of this impression, but we believe that with an orchestra less in size, Dr. Muck's conception of the work would have gripped us as strongly.

Kreisler's playing of the new Schelling concerto was an interesting event. The concerto, which is in one movement, is unlike any violin work of its kind that we have ever heard. In character it is extremely modern. Many and violent are its changes of key. Its orchestration glitters with strange and bizarre coloring. The solo instrument is not given the prominence one expects to hear in a violin concerto. It is but a restless voice in the orchestral ensemble. Melodies are few, but in that portion of the work that serves for a slow movement there is a few measures of legato for the soloist, accompanied by harp and wood wind. At the end is a bright dance movement, which, however, is more rythmical than melodious.

Mr. Kreisler worked hard and made much of his few opportunities. The solo part appears very difficult. The performance met with the apparent favor of the audience, which applauded so vigorously that the violinist was recalled many times. The peculiar character of the concerto leads us to suspect that the artist's personal popularity had much to do with its noisy reception.

The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," which is a tone picture of the frightful ride so graphically told by Victor Hugo and Byron. The orchestra played it in stirring fashion.

rom TIMES

ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dance

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Smphony Orchestra is to give under Institute auspices in the Academy of Music on November 8 will be made notable through the first performance in this city of a new concerto for violin and orchestra by the distinguished American composer and pianist, Ernest Schelling. The soloist, as already announced, will be Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Schelling for two summers have been neighbors in Mt. Desert. Last summer, Mr. Schelling wrote this concerto for Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Kreisler is playing it at all of his eight appearances this fall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[22]

From the Monitor
October 18th

ELLING VIOLIN CERTO HEARD OR FIRST TIME

Given at Providence R. I., by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Mr. Kreisler as Soloist

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra—Produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo part, at Infantry hall, Providence, R. I.; evening of Oct. 17. The other pieces on the programme were Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica") and Liszt's "Mazeppa" tone poem.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Boys who see a newly-forged horseshoe tossed by the blacksmith from the tempering trough out on the floor of the shop, know better than to run and pick it up once and pick it up. They study it respectfully from afar, comparing the gray color with the purple of the blank shoe that hangs on the forge rack and with the silver of the road-worn shoe that is next being caught up in the jaws of the tongs, getting experience with their eyes and keeping their hands pocketed. The concerto of Mr. Schelling can advisedly be left to lie a while on the floor to cool. For perhaps it is but tentatively finished. There is a chance that it may be put back another minute or two in the coals, and that it may be given some more rounding and leveling on the anvil. While a piece of music is in manuscript, it can be judged only in a temporary and superficial way, since presently it may be a much changed piece, and the judgment made of it accordingly set at naught.

Listeners at Providence might say that the instrumentation of the concerto near the opening, and in two places or more further on, was thick, and that the scoring was tangled, the strings in these instances being inaptly treated or else injudiciously combined with woodwind. But listeners in the next city where the work is presented, may not find any such disability, so easy is it for a composer to silence a part on one page and to redistribute the melodies on another, bringing in transparency where was opaqueness. And then, there is the possibility that the players were given tasks that were too much for them, and that the occasional cases of turgidity were to some extent the result of inexact performance.

But whatever objections can be raised against passages of orchestration here and there, the coloring of the work as a whole is original and delightful. The brass choir in particular is well handled, and also moments for woodwind instruments are interesting and unconventional. The composer entertains an exquisite shyness on behalf of his numerous subsidiary and assisting voices and can introduce, and make effective, a brief strain for English horn or clarinet without resort to the common formula of pause, preparation and attack.

Of more significance, however, than the merely orchestral sound of the work is the melodic charm of it and its sustained expressiveness. The composition is from first to last a song, and an exalted one. It is a texture of many voices, and yet it has the import of one chief voice which the others support. The melodic interest is remarkably detached and single, never giving the idea of distraction or conflict. The music is written in a linear style, with a leading line, sometimes in the solo violin, sometimes in the orchestra, always traceable, and this line one of almost vocal directness and persuasion.

The piece is one of the kind that sounds better and speaks more intimately the farther it proceeds; and for that reason, if for no other, it seems assured of favor. The first movement, in which the composer might have displayed his learning but did not choose to, is clear in statement, precise and elegant in development, and withal concise—abrupt at the close, the carping might say. The second movement is an ecstatic flight, which entitles the writer to a place among orchestral odists, if there are such things. It is the work of a man who has thought in tone with the fervency of Schumann. The third movement is an irresistible rhythmic study, with two ideas bearing the same stamp alternating. It is as full of merriment as the second movement is of passion.

From the
MONITOR
Oct. 18th

A record of the concert would be making but an obvious point if it noted that Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of the Schelling piece in a sympathetic and finished manner. The markworthy aspect of the case is that the distinguished violinist has added to his repertory a work which is a challenge to his powers of technique and his talent for expression, and one that is likely to appeal to the public as an American composition. Simply a modern composition, however, it should perhaps more justly be designated, because with other conditions of international travel than those now prevailing, it would have doubtless been written in Switzerland. In any event, the artist has brought from the summer concourse of musicians that gathered at Bar Harbor, Me., in 1916 a document that must be deemed worthy of the world's attention.

From the
Transcript
Oct. 18th.

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE HIGH COST OF ORCHESTRAL LIVING

Novel Candor and a Novel Proposal from Chicago—An Absurd Yarn from Philadelphia About the Boston Band—Impending Programmes—The Remarkable Mr. Levitzki—Local Memoranda

THE Orchestra Association that controls the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra has a courage all its own. When it feels the financial pressure of increasing charges, it confides its burden frankly to the public of the concerts. When it sees a way toward the lightening of them it proposes it as candidly to that same public. Here in the East the founders and the sustainers of such bodies would probably keep their difficulties to themselves; hesitate to suggest to subscribers any surrender of their individual rights; and merely raise the prices of admission when there was no escaping such a step For Chicago another way and a way that by precedent usually works. Last winter, for example, as soon as the association made known to the public the need of a Pension Fund for the members of the orchestra large gifts and small provided one of ampler amount than any similar band enjoys.

Now the Association is otherwise embarrassed. The cost of orchestral living, so to say, has materially risen. The salary list of the orchestra for the present season exceeds by $27,000 that of ten years ago. Composers' royalties for the performance of their music steadily mount. Even the mere paper of scores and parts is increasingly costly. The incidental staff of the orchestra and the hall—ticket-sellers, usher-boys, cleaners and the like—is more highly paid than of old. Taxes rise and premiums for insurance keep pace. "Everything has increased in price except the admission to the concerts; the earnings of the orchestra and the net rentals from the hall and the building have barely sufficed to meet these larger expenses." Probably every one of the more important orchestras in the United States labors under a proportional increase in fixed charges; but as yet not one other has taken the public into its confidence about them.

"What cannot be cured must be endured," yet the association has discovered means to lighten by a little the financial pressure upon it—a small means, it is true, but likely to raise no little resentment were it tried in Boston and not in Chicago. From imperative circumstance or chance disinclination, not all the subscribers go to all the concerts. In that case, says the assotion in a circular letter, do not give your tickets to a friend, do not leave them in your desk; but send them to the offices of the orchestra to be sold for its profit for the concert from which you will be absent. Each sum so added to its revenues may be small in itself, but the total through a whole season will be considerable, since almost always the demand for admissions exceeds the supply. How the subscribers have received this proposal is not yet reported, but had it been made in Boston and not in Chicago, it is safe to say that the elect ladies of Friday afternoons would regard it as an exceedingly "cool proposition." May not one give away one's own?

Here in Boston

The New York Evening Post is grossly misinformed—not to say tricked—when in a conspicuously printed despatch from Philadelphia it says that "capitulation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent." The nominal occasion of the yarn was the "unionization" of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, the theatre in which the orchestra gives concerts there. It was written in the rodomontade of cheap-John journalism when it fancies it has a sensation—"adamant circle"; "the future of the orchestra is on the knees of the federation"; "one year's grace may be granted—or denied," and all that sort of thing. What was presumably the reporter's—or the inventor's signature was appended without other evidence of the credibility of the tale. It was offered for sale to this and doubtless other Bostonian newspapers on Monday last and straightway consigned to the passing rubbish of the hour. If there is one thing more certain than another it is that the Symphony Orchestra is going its independent way, in the present as in the past—and also in the future.

from the
Transcript
Oct. 18th.

By arrangement between Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend, the conductor of the Choral Music Society, singers from it will assist the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season in performances of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," notably revived two years ago, and now to be repeated; in a projected piece by Busoni and in Mr. Loeffler's new symphony if it is undertaken in the present series of concerts.

Programmes in Prospect

Mme. Alda, the soprano, and Mr. de Luca, the baritone, both from the Metropolitan Opera House and both applauded here last spring, will begin the new series of Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Their programme—partly of songs and partly of operatic pieces—abounds in unfamiliar numbers, viz:

Figaro's Air from "Il Barbière".....Rossini
Mr. de Luca.
Air from "Caratacco".....Christian Bach
Air from "Figaro's Wedding".....Mozart
My Lovely Celia.....Munro
Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
Canzonetta.....Perti
Mme. Alda.
Canta il mare.....de Leva
Occhi di fata.....Denza
Serenata.....Morlacchi
Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi-Peccia
Air from "The King of Ys".....Lalo
Mr. de Luca.
Sinulle (Finnish).....Merikanto
Margarethlein.—Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
Deep River (Negro Folk-Song).....Burleigh
Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Air from "The Masked Ball".....Verdi
Mr. de Luca.
L'Automne.....Sibelius
Edelweiss.—Chanson Norvegienne.....Fourdrain
Unrequited Love.—Song of the Open....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

Evidently Mme. Alda has been searching the by-ways of music for some of her pieces. The air from "Caratacco" (Caractacus) comes out of an opera, first heard in London in 1767 and written by Johann Christian Bach, one of the younger sons of Johann Sebastian, who spent his life in Italy and England. Perti of the chose canzonetta is an Italian composer of the second half of the seventeenth century while the "Sortita d'Ofelia" is a fragment of an opera, "Hamlet," written fifty years ago by Faccio, an Italian musician, better known in his time as a conductor than as a composer. As to Mme. Alda's songs from contemporary composers, Merikanto is a little-known Finn; Fourdrain, a Parisian whose salon-pieces please the singers and Mr. La Forge, the expert accompanist, who would be composer also.

As already announced, Mr. Gabrilowitsch the pianist, will be heard for the first time in Boston this season in a concert of his own at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon Oct. 28. For it he has put together a programme inviting both the largeness and the fineness of his powers and including two sonatas seldom played in public, viz:

Sonata in E-flat major, Op. 31, No. 3..Beethoven
Sonata in G minor, Op. 22.....Schumann
Nocturne in E minor—Study in F major,
Op. 10, No. 8—Waltz in A-flat major..Chopin
Jeud'Eaux.....Ravel
Clair de Lune—L'Ile Joyeuse.....Debussy

Mr. Kreisler's pieces for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, begin with a classic concerto (No. 2 in A minor) by Bach; continue with a contemporary concerto by Conus, a young Russian violinist killed in the war, and then proceed with these short pieces, some of which are novel from his bow:

Preghiera.....Martini
Tambourin.....Leclair
Aubade Provençale.....Couperin
Minuet.....Porpora
Caprice.....Wieniawski
Romance in E-flat.....Kreisler
Ballet Music from "Rosamünde".....
.....Schubert-Kreisler
Three Slavonic Dances.....Dvorak-Kreisler

From the Transcript.
Oct. 16 th.

CONCERTS AND OPERA

MORE SIGNS OF AUSPICIOUS BEGINNINGS

A Second Eager Audience and Notable Performance at Symphony Hall—Miss Leginska Gains a Public, but Hardly Rises to Her Best and Most Characteristic Self—Progress with the Civic Opera from the Bottom Upwards — Isadora's Dilemma

AS on Friday afternoon, so on Saturday evening for the resumption of the Symphony Concerts—an audience that filled the hall almost to the last seat; long, general and sincere applause for Dr. Muck and the orchestra and a variously and appropriately eloquent performance of epical, romantic and characterizing music. The natural forebodings that conductor and orchestra, "au point" as the French say, with the "Eroica" symphony on Friday, might decline a little from that summit in a repetition another day, was unfulfilled. By never so little, as it seemed, did they abate the manifold beauty of their tonal speech, their power in the unfolding and the upbuilding of Beethoven's thronging or sustained moods and the flawless unity in which they maintained the music from the swift, suspensive chords of the beginning to the long drawn, climacteric chords of the end. Many a conductor achieves the mighty strokes, transitions, and contrasts of the first movement, the deep-voiced and slow transfigured mourning of the "funeral march," the sharp rush of the scherzo, the leaping, luminous ardors of the finale. A few, however they may answer to the whole power and passion of the symphony excel in the massive moulding of the great chords, in the adroit gradation of progression or recession, in the feathering of incidental arabesques. To unite this large eloquence and this flawless process was the rare distinction of Dr. Muck and the players. Not a modulation, a shading, a passing phrase from an "inner voice" was overlooked; yet each fell into its place in the majestic march of the whole. Completely, in the utmost sense of the word, the listeners heard the symphony.

Repetition, too, pointed the contrast between the romantic pieces of Berlioz and Liszt and the characterizing music of Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." Given the clue of his title, the background of Till's traits and exploits that he justifiably assumes in the minds of his hearers, and the clown lives and moves in the music to the ear almost as to the eye. There is his swagger, his grin, his shrilling voice and out-thrust tongue; there his airy insolence or craven tremors. He upsets the marketplace; he mocks the reverend and the learned; he makes jaunty game of the women; he heaps and flaunts the full cup of his pranks—till full-mouthed and square-toed justice hangs him high as the flutes can carry his broken and fluttering motive. The music never misses a delineative point; yet to make one it is never constrained out of its normal progress. The characterization is clear, exact, unstinted and unwasting. Beside it, the romantic fervors of Berlioz in his overture to "The Corsair" seem merely a dispersed heat, however ardent, and the periods of Liszt in "Mazeppa," racing or sonorous, become no more than an over-charged rhetoric in tones. No wonder that the newest generation of composers, in reaction to the exuberant and empty luxuriance of the romantics and even of Strauss himself when he courts the magniloquent vein, seek the precision, economy, verity and subtlety of their more characteristic music. They puff out their cheeks now and then at Strauss, and with reason, but in "Till" at least he anticipates them.

From ...TYPICAL L... CHIC...
Address: ...
OCT 5 - 1916
Date.....

THE MODERNIZING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The old days of the sale of seats for the Symphony concerts by teachers are past and gone forever; but it would seem that even the most conservative express satisfaction at the new regime. The increased subscription has brought a recrudescence of talent. We are told that of the lower priced seats not one remains unsold.

The ridiculous term "rehearsal," formerly applied to the afternoon concerts, is as extinct as the dodo; while the routine of the concerts in recent years ensues. Thus between the beginnings on October 13 and 14 next, and the endings on May 4 and 5, there will be the usual six intervals in the succession of the twenty-four afternoons and the twenty-four evenings.

The innovation of the new year, aside from, although really seeming pertinent to, the question of the recent method of subscription, is the great increase in the number of assisting artists. Fifteen are to be heard at as many concerts. Contrary to precedent, the list of singers and virtuosi engaged was made public last spring, and has been since kept well before the public eye.

This list includes such eminent "stars" as: Destinn, Culp, Gerhardt, Gadski and Homer among established singers; Paderewski and Gabrilowitsch among the pianists, adding the name of Kreisler for a violinist of equal merit and fame.

That extreme conservatism that formerly rather ignored the existence of younger talent is overcome this season and we find that Mme. Kurt as a vocalist, Mr. Spalding among the violinists, Mr. Schelling and Mr. Friedberg among the pianists, have been engaged.

Mr. McCormack also has been engaged, and his exquisite work in rendering the XVIII Century lyrical work, will certainly overcome any prejudice among the Brahma caste against the popular ever being the absolutely artistic.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an institution, and unlike most institutions, a very perfect thing, and by ridding itself of hampering conditions it should move on under the able baton of Dr. Karl Muck to ideals of even greater perfection, for true art is only hindered by unmeaning convention.

[23]

n REPUBLICAN
ress: Springfield, Mass.

MISS FARRAR IN CONCERT

Appears at Auditorium, Assisted by Messrs Hackett, Malkin and Epstein

A large audience at the Auditorium Wednesday heard the first of the Ellis concerts, with Geraldine Farrar for star and Arthur Hackett, tenor, Joseph Malkins, 'cellist, and Richard Epstein, pianist, as assisting artists. The other concerts in this course, for which there has been a large sale of season tickets, will be given by the Boston symphony orchestra on November 6 with Miss Laeta Hartley as pianist, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, on January 29, 1917, with Karl Lamson as accompanist, and the Boston orchestra again on February 20 in a Wagner program.

The concert of Wednesday was of a quite different sort from all the rest, and in a way a reversion of the type of entertainment in vogue a generation ago, before the recital by a single artist had displaced the stock miscellaneous program. The older type has its good points, and though somewhat out of fashion, it is probably better liked by the general public than an entire evening of one kind of music. From the artistic point of view the one has the advantage in unity, the other is variety. From the musician's point of view one brings in more cash for the single performer, the other gives work to a greater number. From the side of the public there is the difference between a meal a la carte and a table d'hote—each with its merits. The mixed concert is likely to be less even in quality, for not all the performers will be equally good, on the other hand, it is perhaps better adapted for the needful work of popularizing good music, and it is well suited for a course in a large hall meant to interest a larger public than any single variety of music lovers can provide.

For such a course Geraldine Farrar is of course eminently fitted, both by her gifts as a singer and by her great generol popularity on the stage and on the films. She has the gifts needed to interest the public which likes music, yet is not much given to concert-going and needs to be stimulated by the celebrity and prestige of a famous musician. As to her singing, which is but a part of her notable equipment, there has been and is a conspicuous divergence of opinion. It has its undeniable defects, which were most apparent in her opening aria, Mozart's charming "Voiche sapete"; smooth lyric grace here is indispensable, and that is not Miss Farrar's strong point. She made a much better impression in "Souvenir," by Bemberg, which followed. The Gounod "Serenade" lacked lightness and polish, but the last song in the group, "Ouvre tes yesbleus," by Massenet, gave expression to the side of her art in wheih she is strongest. Her higher range, though effective enough, is not her best; there is more richness of timbre in her lower and medium tones, the quality of which goes well with her highly dramatic temperament.

These traits make her better in lieder than in Italian bel canto, and here was some fine singing in the group of northern European songs comprising "Stille Sicherheit," a little-known song by Robert Franz, "Volksliedchen," by Schumann, "Erstes Begegnen," by Grieg, "Sternlein," by Moussorgsky, and "Schneeglöeckchen," by Gretschaninov. Yet best of all was the great aria, "Un bel dì vedremo," from her famous role of "Madama Butterfly" in Puccini's opera of that name. After all, she is even more actress than singer, and this brought in enough of the atmosphere of the theater to show her at her best. She was generous with encores, singing the "Habanera" from "Carmen" after the first group and "Mighty Lak a Rose" after the lieder group, this to her own accompaniment, which did not need so elaborate an instrument as a pianoforte.

The tenor, Mr Hackett, was very much at his best in his closing part made up of three fine German songs, "Liebesfeier," by Weingartner, "Mondnacht," by Schumann, and "Caecelie," by Richard Strauss. His singing has good qualities which would be more conspicuous if he should, as he very well might, add to its variety. His tone is at the opposite extreme from the bright, shallow smiling tone which voice specialists call "white"; it is even at times too lugubrious and a moment now and then of the Bonci smile would have given point and variety. He sang first the aria "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden," which unfortunately a large part of his audience could not hear because of delays in the street car service, and later a group containing "Le Reve," from Massenet's "Marion," "Lamento Provencale," by Paladihe, "Phidyle," by Duparc, and "Les Vautours," by Lenormand. The violoncellist, Mr Malkin, is an artist of skill, who should have made a stronger impression than he did. He has a smooth tone and fleet fingers, yet he failed of the eloquent expressiveness which is the soul of this instrument, and in the rapid numbers, perhaps from some untoward condition, his fingering was not always precisely in tune. Less sordino, less palm garden music, and a robuster and more incisive style would make his skill more effective. He played first a Chopin nocturne, opus 27, No 2, and a "Hungarian Dance," by Brahms, then a Sicilienne and Rigaudon by Francoeur-Kreisler, "Berceuse Slave," by Friemann-Malkin, and the dainty "Elfentanz," by Popper, following the last for encore, with the same composer's "Spinning Song."

From the Monitor
October 18th

SCHELLING VIOLIN CONCERTO HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Work Given at Providence R. I., by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Mr. Kreisler as Soloist

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra—Produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler playing the solo part, at Infantry hall, Providence, R. I.; evening of Oct. 17, 1916. The other pieces on the program were Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica") and Liszt's "Mazeppa" tone poem.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Boys who see a newly-forged horseshoe tossed by a blacksmith from the tempering trough out on the floor of the shop, know better than to run at once and pick it up. They study it respectfully from afar, comparing its gray color with the purple of the blank shoe that hangs on the forge rack and with the silver of the road-worn shoe that is next being caught up in the jaws of the tongs, getting experience with their eyes and keeping their hands pocketed. The concerto of Mr. Schelling can advisedly be left to lie a while on the floor to cool. For perhaps it is but tentatively finished. There is a chance that it may be put back another minute or two in the coals, and that it may be given some more rounding and leveling on the anvil. While a piece of music is in manuscript, it can be judged only in a temporary and superficial way, since presently it may be a much changed piece, and the judgment made of it accordingly set at naught.

Listeners at Providence might say that the instrumentation of the concerto near the opening, and in two places or more further on, was thick, and that the scoring was tangled, the strings in these instances being inaptly treated or else injudiciously combined with woodwind. But listeners in the next city where the work is presented, may not find any such disability, so easy is it for a composer to silence a part on one page and to redistribute the melodies on another, bringing in transparency where was opaqueness. And then, there is the possibility that the players were given tasks that were too much for them, and that the occasional cases of turgidity were to some extent the result of inexact performance.

But whatever objections can be raised against passages of orchestration here and there, the coloring of the work as a whole is original and delightful. The brass choir in particular is well handled, and also moments for woodwind instruments are interesting and unconventional. The composer entertains an exquisite shyness on behalf of his numerous subsidiary and assisting voices and can introduce, and make effective, a brief strain for English horn or clarinet without report to the common formula of pause, preparation and attack.

Of more significance, however, than merely orchestral sound of the [illegible] is the melodic charm of it and sustained expressiveness. The composition is from first to last a song, and an exalted one. It is a texture of many voices, and yet it has the import of one chief voice which the others support. The melodic interest is remarkably detached and single, never giving the idea of distraction or conflict. The music is written in a linear style, with a leading line, sometimes in the solo violin, sometimes in the orchestra, always traceable, and this line one of almost vocal directness and persuasion.

The piece is one of the kind that sounds better and speaks more intimately the farther it proceeds; and for that reason, if for no other, it seems assured of favor. The first movement, in which the composer might have displayed his learning but did not choose to, is clear in statement, precise and elegant in development and withal concise—abrupt at the close, the carping might say. The second movement is an ecstatic flight, which entitles the writer to a place among orchestral odists, if there are such things. It is the work of a man who has thought in tone with the fervency of Schumann. The third movement is an irresistible rhythmic study, with two ideas bearing the folktune stamp alternating. It is as full of merriment as the second movement is of passion.

From the
MONITOR
Oct. 18th

A record of the concert would be making but an obvious point if it noted that Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of the Schelling piece in a sympathetic and finished manner. The markworthy aspect of the case is that the distinguished violinist has added to his repertory a work which is a challenge to his powers of technique and his talent for expression, and one that is likely to appeal to the public as an American composition. Simply a modern composition, however, it should perhaps more justly be designated, because with other conditions of international travel than those now prevailing, it would have doubtless been written in Switzerland. In any event, the artist has brought from the summer concourse of musicians that gathered at Bar Harbor, Me., in 1916 a document that must be deemed worthy of the world's attention.

From the
Transcript
Oct. 18th.

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE HIGH COST OF ORCHESTRAL LIVING

Novel Candor and a Novel Proposal from Chicago—An Absurd Yarn from Philadelphia About the Boston Band—Impending Programmes—The Remarkable Mr. Levitzki—Local Memoranda

THE Orchestra Association that controls the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra has a courage all its own. When it feels the financial pressure of increasing charges, it confides its burden frankly to the public of the concerts. When it sees a way toward the lightening of them it proposes it as candidly to that same public. Here in the East the founders and the sustainers of such bodies would probably keep their difficulties to themselves; hesitate to suggest to subscribers any surrender of their individual rights; and merely raise the prices of admission when there was no escaping such a step For Chicago another way and a way that by precedent usually works. Last winter, for example, as soon as the association made known to the public the need of a Pension Fund for the members of the orchestra large gifts and small provided one of ampler amount than any similar band enjoys.

Now the Association is otherwise embarrassed. The cost of orchestral living, so to say, has materially risen. The salary list of the orchestra for the present season exceeds by $27,000 that of ten years ago. Composers' royalties for the performance of their music steadily mount. Even the mere paper of scores and parts is increasingly costly. The incidental staff of the orchestra and the hall—ticket-sellers, usher-boys, cleaners and the like—is more highly paid than of old. Taxes rise and premiums for insurance keep pace. "Everything has increased in price except the admission to the con erts; the earnings of the orchestra and the net rentals from the hall and the building have barely sufficed to meet these larger expenses." Probably every one of the more important orchestras in the United States labors under a proportional increase in fixed charges; but as yet not one other has taken the public into its confidence about them.

"What cannot be cured must be endured," yet the association has discovered means to lighten by a little the financial pressure upon it—a small means, it is true, but likely to raise no little resentment were it tried in Boston and not in Chicago. From imperative circumstance or chance disinclination, not all the subscribers go to all the concerts. In that case, says the assotion in a circular letter, do not give your tickets to a friend, do not leave them in your desk; but send them to the offices of the orchestra to be sold for its profit for the concert from which you will be absent. Each sum so added to its revenues may be small in itself, but the total through a whole season will be considerable, since almost always the demand for admissions exceeds the supply. How the subscribers have received this proposal is not yet reported, but had it been made in Boston and not in Chicago, it is safe to say that the elect ladies of Friday afternoons would regard it as an exceedingly "cool proposition." May not one give away one's own?

Here in Boston

The New York Evening Post is grossly misinformed—not to say tricked—when in a conspicuously printed despatch from Philadelphia it says that "capitulation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent." The nominal occasion of the yarn was the "unionization" of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, the theatre in which the orchestra gives concerts there. It was written in the rodomontade of cheap-John journalism when it fancies it has a sensation—"adamant circle"; "the future of the orchestra is on the knees of the federation"; "one year's grace may be granted—or denied," and all that sort of thing. What was presumably the reporter's—or the inventor's signature was appended without other evidence of the credibility of the tale. It was offered for sale to this and doubtless other Bostonian newspapers on Monday last and straightway consigned to the passing rubbish of the hour. If there is one thing more certain than another it is that the Symphony Orchestra is going its independent way, in the present as in the past—and also in the future.

from the
Transcript
Oct. 18th.

By arrangement between Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend, the conductor of the Choral Music Society, singers from it will assist the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season in performances of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," notably revived two years ago, and now to be repeated; in a projected piece by Busoni and in Mr. Loeffler's new symphony if it is undertaken in the present series of concerts.

Programmes in Prospect

Mme. Alda, the soprano, and Mr. de Luca, the baritone, both from the Metropolitan Opera House and both applauded here last spring, will begin the new series of Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Their programme—partly of songs and partly of operatic pieces—abounds in unfamiliar numbers, viz:

Figaro's Air from "Il Barbière" ..... Rossini
Mr. de Luca.
Air from "Caratacco" ..... Christian Bach
Air from "Figaro's Wedding" ..... Mozart
My Lovely Celia ..... Munro
Sortita d'Ofelia ..... Faccio
Canzonetta ..... Perti
Mme. Alda.
Canta il mare ..... de Leva
Occhi di fata ..... Denza
Serenata ..... Morlacchi
Sulla Laguna ..... Buzzi-Peccia
Air from "The King of Ys" ..... Lalo
Mr. de Luca.
Sinulle (Finnish) ..... Merikanto
Margarethlein.—Erstes Begegnen ..... Grieg
Deep River (Negro Folk-Song) ..... Burleigh
Life and Death ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Air from "The Masked Ball" ..... Verdi
Mr. de Luca.
L'Automne ..... Sibella
Edelweiss.—Chanson Norvegienne ..... Fourdrain
Unrequited Love.—Song of the Open .... La Forge
Mme. Alda.

Evidently Mme. Alda has been searching the by-ways of music for some of her pieces. The air from "Caratacco" (Caractacus) comes out of an opera, first heard in London in 1767 and written by Johann Christian Bach, one of the younger sons of Johann Sebastian, who spent his life in Italy and England. Perti of the chosen canzonetta is an Italian composer of the second half of the seventeenth century while the "Sortita d'Ofelia" is a fragment of an opera, "Hamlet," written fifty years ago by Faccio, an Italian musician, better known in his time as a conductor than as a composer. As to Mme. Alda's songs from contemporary composers, Merikanto is a little-known Finn; Fourdrain, a Parisian whose salon-pieces please the singers and Mr. La Forge, the expert accompanist, who would be composer also.

As already announced, Mr. Gabrilowitsch the pianist, will be heard for the first time in Boston this season in a concert of his own at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28. For it he has put together a programme inviting both the largeness and the fineness of his powers and including two sonatas seldom played in public, viz:

Sonata in E-flat major, Op. 31, No. 3 .. Beethoven
Sonata in G minor, Op. 22 ..... Schumann
Nocturne in E minor—Study in F major, Op. 10, No. 8—Waltz in A-flat major .. Chopin
Jeud'Eaux ..... Ravel
Clair de Lune—L'Ile Joyeuse ..... Debussy

Mr. Kreisler's pieces for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, begin with a classic concerto (No. 2 in A minor) by Bach; continue with a contemporary concerto by Conus, a young Russian violinist killed in the war, and then proceed with these short pieces, some of which are novel from his bow:

Preghiera ..... Martini
Tambourin ..... Leclair
Aubade Provençale ..... Couperin
Minuet ..... Porpora
Caprice ..... Wieniawski
Romance in E-flat ..... Kreisler
Ballet Music from "Rosamünde" ..... Schubert-Kreisler
Three Slavonic Dances ..... Dvorak-Kreisler

From the Transcript.
Oct. 16 th.

CONCERTS AND OPERA

MORE SIGNS OF AUSPICIOUS BEGINNINGS

A Second Eager Audience and Notable Performance at Symphony Hall—Miss Leginska Gains a Public, but Hardly Rises to Her Best and Most Characteristic Self—Progress with the Civic Opera from the Bottom Upwards — Isadora's Dilemma

AS on Friday afternoon, so on Saturday evening for the resumption of the Symphony Concerts—an audience that filled the hall almost to the last seat; long, general and sincere applause for Dr. Muck and the orchestra, and a variously and appropriately eloquent performance of epical, romantic and characterizing music. The natural foreboding that conductor and orchestra, "au point," as the French say, with the "Eroica" symphony on Friday, might decline a little from that summit in a repetition another day, was unfulfilled. By never so little, as it seemed, did they abate the manifold beauty of their tonal speech, their power in the unfolding and the upbuilding of Beethoven's thronging or sustained moods, and the flawless unity in which they maintained the music from the swift, suspensive chords of the beginning to the long-drawn, climacteric chords of the end. Many a conductor achieves the mighty strokes, transitions, and contrasts of the first movement, the deep-voiced and slowly transfigured mourning of the "funeral march," the sharp rush of the scherzo, the leaping, luminous ardors of the finale. A few, however they may answer to the whole power and passion of the symphony, excel in the massive moulding of the great chords, in the adroit gradation of progression or recession, in the feathering of incidental arabesques. To unite this large eloquence and this flawless process was the rare distinction of Dr. Muck and the players. Not a modulation, a shading, a passing phrase from an "inner voice" was overlooked; yet each fell into its place in the majestic march of the whole. Completely, in the utmost sense of the word, the listeners heard the symphony.

Repetition, too, pointed the contrast between the romantic pieces of Berlioz and Liszt and the characterizing music of Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." Given the clue of his title, the background of Till's traits and exploits that he justifiably assumes in the minds of his hearers, and the clown lives and moves in the music to the ear almost as to the eye. There is his swagger, his grin, his shrilling voice and out-thrust tongue; there his airy insolence or craven tremors. He upsets the marketplace; he mocks the reverend and the learned; he makes jaunty game of the women; he heaps and flaunts the full cup of his pranks—till full-mouthed and squared-toed justice hangs him high as the flutes can carry his broken and fluttering motive. The music never misses a delineative point; yet to make one it is never constrained out of its normal progress. The characterization is clear, exact, unstinted and unwasting. Beside it, the romantic fervors of Berlioz in his overture to "The Corsair" seem merely a dispersed heat, however ardent, and the periods of Liszt in "Mazeppa," racing or sonorous, become no more than an over-charged rhetoric in tones. No wonder that the newest generation of composers, in reaction to the exuberant and empty luxuriance of the romantics and even of Strauss himself when he courts the magniloquent vein, seek the precision, economy, verity and subtlety of their more characteristic music. They puff out their cheeks now and then at Strauss, and with reason, but in "Till" at least he anticipates them.

From .....
Address: .....
Date .....

THE MODERNIZING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The old days of the sale of seats for the Symphony concerts by teachers are past and gone forever; but it would seem that even the most conservative express satisfaction at the new regime. The increased subscription has brought a recrudescence of talent. We are told that of the lower priced seats not one remains unsold.

The ridiculous term "rehearsal," formerly applied to the afternoon concerts, is as extinct as the dodo; while the routine of the concerts in recent years ensues. Thus between the beginnings on October 13 and 14 next, and the endings on May 4 and 5, there will be the usual six intervals in the succession of the twenty-four afternoons and the twenty-four evenings.

The innovation of the new year, aside from, although really seeming pertinent to, the question of the recent method of subscription, is the great increase in the number of assisting artists. Fifteen are to be heard at as many concerts. Contrary to precedent, the list of singers and virtuosi engaged was made public last spring, and has been since kept well before the public eye.

This list includes such eminent "stars" as: Destinn, Culp, Gerhardt, Gadski and Homer among established singers; Paderewski and Gabrilowitsch among the pianists, adding the name of Kreisler for a violinist of equal merit and fame.

That extreme conservatism that formerly rather ignored the existence of younger talent is overcome this season and we find that Mme. Kurt as a vocalist, Mr. Spalding among the violinists, Mr. Schelling and Mr. Friedberg among the pianists, have been engaged.

Mr. McCormack also has been engaged, and his exquisite work in rendering the XVIII Century lyrical work, will certainly overcome any prejudice among the Brahma caste against the popular ever being the absolutely artistic.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an institution, and unlike most institutions, a very perfect thing, and by ridding itself of hampering conditions it should move on under the able baton of Dr. Karl Muck to ideals of even greater perfection, for true art is only hindered by unmeaning convention.

[23]

n REPUBLICAN
ress: Springfield, Mass.

MISS FARRAR IN CONCERT

Appears at Auditorium, Assisted by Messrs Hackett, Malkin and Epstein

A large audience at the Auditorium Wednesday heard the first of the Ellis concerts, with Geraldine Farrar for star and Arthur Hackett, tenor, Joseph Malkins, 'cellist, and Richard Epstein, pianist, as assisting artists. The other concerts in this course, for which there has been a large sale of season tickets, will be given by the Boston symphony orchestra on November 6 with Miss Laeta Hartley as pianist, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, on January 29, 1917, with Karl Lamson as accompanist, and the Boston orchestra again on February 20 in a Wagner program.

The concert of Wednesday was of a quite different sort from all the rest, and in a way a reversion of the type of entertainment in vogue a generation ago, before the recital by a single artist had displaced the stock miscellaneous program. The older type has its good points, and though somewhat out of fashion, it is probably better liked by the general public than an entire evening of one kind of music. From the artistic point of view the one has the advantage in unity, the other is variety. From the musician's point of view one brings in more cash for the single performer, the other gives work to a greater number. From the side of the public there is the difference between a meal a la carte and a table d'hote—each with its merits. The mixed concert is likely to be less even in quality, for not all the performers will be equally good, on the other hand, it is perhaps better adapted for the needful work of popularizing good music, and it is well suited for a course in a large hall meant to interest a larger public than any single variety of music lovers can provide.

For such a course Geraldine Farrar is of course eminently fitted, both by her gifts as a singer and by her great generol popularity on the stage and on the films. She has the gifts needed to interest the public which likes music, yet is not much given to concert-going and needs to be stimulated by the celebrity and prestige of a famous musician. As to her singing, which is but a part of her notable equipment, there has been and is a conspicuous divergence of opinion. It has its undeniable defects, which were most apparent in her opening aria, Mozart's charming "Voiche sapete"; smooth lyric grace here is indispensable, and that is not Miss Farrar's strong point. She made a much better impression in "Souvenir," by Bemberg, which followed. The Gounod "Serenade" lacked lightness and polish, but the last song in the group, "Ouvre tes yesbleus," by Massenet, gave expression to the side of her art in whcih she is strongest. Her higher range, though effective enough, is not her best; there is more richness of timbre in her lower and medium ones, the quality of which goes well with her highly dramatic temperament.

These traits make her better in lieder than in Italian bel canto, and there was some fine singing in the group of northern European songs comprising "Stille Sicherheit," a little-known song by Robert Franz, "Volksliedchen," by Schumann, "Erstes Begegnen," by Grieg, "Sternlein," by Moussorgsky, and "Schneegloeckchen," by Gretschaninov. Yet best of all was the great aria, "Un bel di vedremo," from her famous role of "Madama Butterfly" in Puccini's opera of that name. After all, she is even more actress than singer, and this brought in enough of the atmosphere of the theater to show her at her best. She was generous with encores, singing the "Habanera" from "Carmen" after the first group and "Mighty Lak a Rose" after the lieder group, this to her own accompaniment, which did not need so elaborate an instrument as a pianoforte.

The tenor, Mr Hackett, was very much at his best in his closing part made up of three fine German songs, "Liebesfeier," by Weingartner, "Mondnacht," by Schumann, and "Caecelie," by Richard Strauss. His singing has good qualities which would be more conspicuous if he should, as he very well might, add to its variety. His tone is at the opposite extreme from the bright, shallow smiling tone which voice specialists call "white"; it is even at times too lugubrious and a moment now and then of the Bonci smile would have given point and variety. He sang first the aria "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden," which unfortunately a large part of his audience could not hear because of delays in the street car service, and later a group containing "Le Reve," from Massenet's "Marion," "Lamento Provencale," by Paladihe, "Phidyle," by Duparc, and "Les Vautours," by Lenormand. The violoncellist, Mr Malkin, is an artist of skill, who should have made a stronger impression than he did. He has a smooth tone and fleet fingers, yet he failed of the eloquent expressiveness which is the soul of this instrument, and in the rapid numbers, perhaps from some untoward condition, his fingering was not always precisely in tune. Less sordino, less palm garden music, and a robuster and more incisive style would make his skill more effective. He played first a Chopin nocturne, opus 27, No 2, and a "Hungarian Dance," by Brahms, then a Sicillienne and Rigaudon by Francoeur-Kreisler, "Berceuse Slave," by Friemann-Malkin, and the dainty "Elfentanz," by Popper, following the last for encore, with the same composer's "Spinning Song."

From the Monitor
October 18th

SCHELLING VIOLIN CONCERTO HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Work Given at Providence R. I., by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Mr. Kreisler as Soloist

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra—Produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler playing the solo part, at Infantry hall, Providence, R. I.; evening of Oct. 17, 1916. The other pieces on the program were Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica") and Liszt's "Mazeppa" tone poem.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Boys who see a newly-forged horseshoe tossed by a blacksmith from the tempering trough out on the floor of the shop, know better than to run at once and pick it up. They study it respectfully from afar, comparing its gray color with the purple of the blank shoe that hangs on the forge rack and with the silver of the road-worn shoe that is next being caught up in the jaws of the tongs, getting experience with their eyes and keeping their hands pocketed. The concerto of Mr. Schelling can advisedly be left to lie a while on the floor to cool. For perhaps it is but tentatively finished. There is a chance that it may be put back another minute or two in the coals, and that it may be given some more rounding and leveling on the anvil. While a piece of music is in manuscript, it can be judged only in a temporary and superficial way, since presently it may be a much changed piece, and the judgment made of it accordingly set at naught.

Listeners at Providence might say that the instrumentation of the concerto near the opening, and in two places or more further on, was thick, and that the scoring was tangled, the strings in these instances being inaptly treated or else injudiciously combined with woodwind. But listeners in the next city where the work is presented, may not find any such disability, so easy is it for a composer to silence a part on one page and to redistribute the melodies on another, bringing in transparency where was opaqueness. And then, there is the possibility that the players were given tasks that were too much for them, and that the occasional cases of turgidity were to some extent the result of inexact performance.

But whatever objections can be raised against passages of orchestration here and there, the coloring of the work as a whole is original and delightful. The brass choir in particular is well handled, and also moments for woodwind instruments are interesting and unconventional. The composer entertains an exquisite shyness on behalf of his numerous subsidiary and assisting voices and can introduce, and make effective, a brief strain for English horn or clarinet without resort to the common formula of pause, preparation and attack.

Of more significance, however, than the merely orchestral sound of the [illegible] is the melodic charm of it and [illegible]stained expressiveness. The composition is from first to last a song, and an exalted one. It is a texture of many voices, and yet it has the import of one chief voice which the others support. The melodic interest is remarkably detached and single, never giving the idea of distraction or conflict. The music is written in a linear style, with a leading line, sometimes in the solo violin, sometimes in the orchestra, always traceable, and this line one of almost vocal directness and persuasion.

The piece is one of the kind that sounds better and speaks more intimately the farther it proceeds; and for that reason, if for no other, it seems assured of favor. The first movement, in which the composer might have displayed his learning but did not choose to, is clear in statement, precise and elegant in development and withal concise—abrupt at the close, the carping might say. The second movement is an ecstatic flight, which entitles the writer to a place among orchestral odists, if there are such things. It is the work of a man who has thought in tone with the fervency of Schumann. The third movement is an irresistible rhythmic study, with two ideas bearing the folktune stamp alternating. It is as full of merriment as the second movement is of passion.

From the
MONITOR
Oct. 18th

A record of the concert would be making but an obvious point if it noted that Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of the Schelling piece in a sympathetic and finished manner. The markworthy aspect of the case is that the distinguished violinist has added to his repertory a work which is a challenge to his powers of technique and his talent for expression, and one that is likely to appeal to the public as an American composition. Simply a modern composition, however, it should perhaps more justly be designated, because with other conditions of international travel than those now prevailing, it would have doubtless been written in Switzerland. In any event, the artist has brought from the summer concourse of musicians that gathered at Bar Harbor, Me., in 1916 a document that must be deemed worthy of the world's attention.

From the Transcript
Oct. 18th.

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE HIGH COST OF ORCHESTRAL LIVING

Novel Candor and a Novel Proposal from Chicago—An Absurd Yarn from Philadelphia About the Boston Band—Impending Programmes—The Remarkable Mr. Levitzki—Local Memoranda

THE Orchestra Association that controls the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra has a courage all its own. When it feels the financial pressure of increasing charges, it confides its burden frankly to the public of the concerts. When it sees a way toward the lightening of them it proposes it as candidly to that same public. Here in the East the founders and the sustainers of such bodies would probably keep their difficulties to themselves; hesitate to suggest to subscribers any surrender of their individual rights; and merely raise the prices of admission when there was no escaping such a step For Chicago another way and a way that by precedent usually works. Last winter, for example, as soon as the association made known to the public the need of a Pension Fund for the members of the orchestra large gifts and small provided one of ampler amount than any similar band enjoys.

Now the Association is otherwise embarrassed. The cost of orchestral living, so to say, has materially risen. The salary list of the orchestra for the present season exceeds by $27,000 that of ten years ago. Composers' royalties for the performance of their music steadily mount. Even the mere paper of scores and parts is increasingly costly. The incidental staff of the orchestra and the hall—ticket-sellers, usher-boys, cleaners and the like—is more highly paid than of old. Taxes rise and premiums for insurance keep pace. "Everything has increased in price except the admission to the con erts; the earnings of the orchestra and the net rentals from the hall and the building have barely sufficed to meet these larger expenses." Probably every one of the more important orchestras in the United States labors under a proportional increase in fixed charges; but as yet not one other has taken the public into its confidence about them.

"What cannot be cured must be endured," yet the association has discovered means to lighten by a little the financial pressure upon it—a small means, it is true, but likely to raise no little resentment were it tried in Boston and not in Chicago. From imperative circumstance or chance disinclination, not all the subscribers go to all the concerts. In that case, says the asso tion in a circular letter, do not give your tickets to a friend, do not leave them in your desk; but send them to the offices of the orchestra to be sold for its profit for the concert from which you will be absent. Each sum so added to its revenues may be small in itself, but the total through a whole season will be considerable, since almost always the demand for admissions exceeds the supply. How the subscribers have received this proposal is not yet reported, but had it been made in Boston and not in Chicago, it is safe to say that the elect ladies of Friday afternoons would regard it as an exceedingly "cool proposition." May not one give away one's own?

Here in Boston

The New York Evening Post is grossly misinformed—not to say tricked—when in a conspicuously printed despatch from Philadelphia it says that "capitulation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent." The nominal occasion of the yarn was the "unionization" of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, the theatre in which the orchestra gives concerts there. It was written in the rodomontade of cheap-John journalism when it fancies it has a sensation—"adamant circle"; "the future of the orchestra is on the knees of the federation"; "one year's grace may be granted—or denied," and all that sort of thing. What was presumably the reporter's—or the inventor's signature was appended without other evidence of the credibility of the tale. It was offered for sale to this and doubtless other Bostonian newspapers on Monday last and straightway consigned to the passing rubbish of the hour. If there is one thing more certain than another it is that the Symphony Orchestra is going its independent way, in the present as in the past—and also in the future.

from the
Transcript
Oct. 18th.

By arrangement between Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend, the conductor of the Choral Music Society, singers from it will assist the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season in performances of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," notably revived two years ago, and now to be repeated; in a projected piece by Busoni and in Mr. Loeffler's new symphony if it is undertaken in the present series of concerts.

Programmes in Prospect

Mme. Alda, the soprano, and Mr. de Luca, the baritone, both from the Metropolitan Opera House and both appeared here last spring, will begin the new series of Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Their programme—partly of songs and partly of operatic pieces—abounds in unfamiliar numbers, viz:

Figaro's Air from "Il Barbière".....Rossini
Mr. de Luca.
Air from "Caratacco".....Christian Bach
Air from "Figaro's Wedding".....Mozart
My Lovely Celia.....Munro
Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
Canzonetta.....Perti
Mme. Alda.
Canta il mare.....de Leva
Occhi di'fata.....Denza
Serenata.....Morlacchi
Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi-Peccia
Air from "The King of Ys".....Lalo
Mr. de Luca.
Sinulle (Finnish).....Merikanto
Margarethlein.—Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
Deep River (Negro Folk-Song).....Burleigh
Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Air from "The Masked Ball".....Verdi
Mr. de Luca.
L'Automne.....Sibella
Edelweiss.—Chanson Norvegienne.....Fourdrain
Unrequited Love.—Song of the Open....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

Evidently Mme. Alda has been searching the by-ways of music for some of her pieces. The air from "Caratacco" (Caractacus) comes out of an opera, first heard in London in 1767 and written by Johann Christian Bach, one of the younger sons of Johann Sebastian, who spent his life in Italy and England. Perti of the chosen canzonetta is an Italian composer of the second half of the seventeenth century, while the "Sortita d'Ofelia" is a fragment of an opera, "Hamlet," written fifty years ago by Faccio, an Italian musician, better known in his time as a conductor than as a composer. As to Mme. Alda's songs from contemporary composers, Merikanto is a little-known Finn; Fourdrain, a Parisian whose salon-pieces please the singers and Mr. La Forge, the expert accompanist, who would be composer also.

As already announced, Mr. Gabrilowitsch the pianist, will be heard for the first time in Boston this season in a concert of his own at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28. For it he has put together a programme inviting both the largeness and the fineness of his powers and including two sonatas seldom played in public, viz:

Sonata in E-flat major, Op. 31, No. 3..Beethoven
Sonata in G minor, Op. 22.....Schumann
Nocturne in E minor—Study in F major,
Op. 10, No. 8—Waltz in A-flat major..Chopin
Jeud'Eaux.....Ravel
Clair de Lune—L'Ile Joyeuse.....Debussy

Mr. Kreisler's pieces for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29, begin with a classic concerto (No. 1 in A minor) by Bach; continue with a contemporary concerto by Conus, a young Russian violinist killed in the war, and then proceed with these short pieces, some of which are novel from his bow:

Preghiera.....Martini
Tambourin.....Leclair
Aubade Provençale.....Couperin
Minuet.....Porpora
Caprice.....Wieniawski
Romance in E-flat.....Kreisler
Ballet Music from "Rosamünde".....
.....Schubert-Kreisler
Three Slavonic Dances.....Dvorak-Kreisler

From the Transcript.
Oct. 16 th.

CONCERTS AND OPERA

MORE SIGNS OF AUSPICIOUS BEGINNINGS

A Second Eager Audience and Notable Performance at Symphony Hall—Miss Leginska Gains a Public, but Hardly Rises to Her Best and Most Characteristic Self—Progress with the Civic Opera from the Bottom Upwards — Isadora's Dilemma

AS on Friday afternoon, so on Saturday evening for the resumption of the Symphony Concerts—an audience that filled the hall almost to the last seat; long, general and sincere applause for Dr. Muck and the orchestra, and a variously and appropriately eloquent performance of epical, romantic and characterizing music. The natural forebodings that conductor and orchestra, "au point," as the French say, with the "Eroica" symphony on Friday, might decline a little from that summit in a repetition another day, was unfulfilled. By never so little, as it seemed, did they abate the manifold beauty of their tonal speech, their power in the unfolding and the upbuilding of Beethoven's thronging or sustained moods, in the flawless unity in which they maintained the music from the swift, suspense chords of the beginning to the long-awn, climacteric chords of the end. [illegible] a conductor achieves the mighty [illegible]es, transitions, and contrasts of the movement, the deep-voiced and slowly [illegible]figured mourning of the "funeral [illegible]h," the sharp rush of the scherzo, the [illegible]g, luminous ardors of the finale. However they may answer to the power and passion of the symphony, [illegible] the massive moulding of the great [illegible] in the adroit gradation of progression, recession, in the feathering of in[illegible] arabesques. To unite this large [illegible]e and this flawless process was distinction of Dr. Muck and the Not a modulation, a shading, a [illegible]hrase from an "inner voice" was [illegible]d; yet each fell into its place in [illegible]stic march of the whole. Com[illegible]n the utmost sense of the word, [illegible]ers heard the symphony.

[illegible]on, too, pointed the contrast be[illegible] romantic pieces of Berlioz and the characterizing music of "Till Eulenspiegel." Given the title, the background of Till's exploits that he justifiably as[illegible]e minds of his hearers, and the [illegible] and moves in the music to the [illegible] as to the eye. There is his [illegible]s grin, his shrilling voice and [illegible]ongue; there his airy insolence [illegible]remors. He upsets the market-[illegible] mocks the reverend and the [illegible]e makes jaunty game of the [illegible] heaps and flaunts the full cup [illegible]ks—till full-mouthed and square-[illegible]e hangs him high as the flutes [illegible] his broken and fluttering mo-[illegible]nusic never misses a delineative [illegible] to make one it is never con-[illegible]t of its normal progress. The [illegible]tion is clear, exact, unstinted [illegible]ng. Beside it, the [illegible]rlioz in his

LETTERS TO THE EDIT
[illegible] space for any considerable stores.
[illegible] comparatively small structure, w
[illegible]e sea at high tide. The fish stan
[illegible]otorboat or tender, could reach it [illegible] vessels

From [illegible]
Address: [illegible]
Date [illegible]

THE MODERNIZING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The old days of the sale of seats for the Symphony concerts by teachers are past and gone forever; but it would seem that even the most conservative express satisfaction at the new regime. The increased subscription has brought a recrudescence of talent. We are told that of the lower priced seats not one remains unsold.

The ridiculous term "rehearsal," formerly applied to the afternoon concerts, is as extinct as the dodo; while the routine of the concerts in recent years ensues. Thus between the beginnings on October 13 and 14 next, and the endings on May 4 and 5, there will be the usual six intervals in the succession of the twenty-four afternoons and the twenty-four evenings.

The innovation of the new year, aside from, although really seeming pertinent to, the question of the recent method of subscription, is the great increase in the number of assisting artists. Fifteen are to be heard at as many concerts. Contrary to precedent, the list of singers and virtuosi engaged was made public last spring, and has been since kept well before the public eye.

This list includes such eminent "stars" as: Destinn, Culp, Gerhardt, Gadski and Homer among established singers; Paderewski and Gabrilowitsch among the pianists, adding the name of Kreisler for a violinist of equal merit and fame.

That extreme conservatism that formerly rather ignored the existence of younger talent is overcome this season and we find that Mme. Kurt as a vocalist, Mr. Spalding among the violinists, Mr. Schelling and Mr. Friedberg among the pianists, have been engaged.

Mr. McCormack also has been engaged, and his exquisite work in rendering the XVIII Century lyrical work, will certainly overcome any prejudice among the Brahma caste against the popular ever being the absolutely artistic.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an institution, and unlike most institutions, a very perfect thing, and by ridding itself of hampering conditions it should move on under the able baton of Dr. Karl Muck to ideals of even greater perfection, for true art is only hindered by unmeaning convention.

[23]

[illegible] REPUBLICAN
[illegible]ress: Springfield, Mass.

MISS FARRAR IN CONCERT

Appears at Auditorium, Assisted by Messrs Hackett, Malkin and Epstein

A large audience at the Auditorium Wednesday heard the first of the Ellis concerts, with Geraldine Farrar for star and Arthur Hackett, tenor, Joseph Malkins, 'cellist, and Richard Epstein, pianist, as assisting artists. The other concerts in this course, for which there has been a large sale of season tickets, will be given by the Boston symphony orchestra on November 6 with Miss Laeta Hartley as pianist, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, on January 29, 1917, with Karl Lamson as accompanist, and the Boston orchestra again on February 20 in a Wagner program.

The concert of Wednesday was of a quite different sort from all the rest, and in a way a reversion of the type of entertainment in vogue a generation ago, before the recital by a single artist had displaced the stock miscellaneous program. The older type has its good points, and though somewhat out of fashion, it is probably better liked by the general public than an entire evening of one kind of music. From the artistic point of view the one has the advantage in unity, the other is variety. From the musician's point of view one brings in more cash for the single performer, the other gives work to a greater number. From the side of the public there is the difference between a meal a la carte and a table d'hote—each with its merits. The mixed concert is likely to be less even in quality, for not all the performers will be equally good, on the other hand, it is perhaps better adapted for the needful work of popularizing good music, and it is well suited for a course in a large hall meant to interest a larger public than any single variety of music lovers can provide.

For such a course Geraldine Farrar is of course eminently fitted, both by her gifts as a singer and by her great generol popularity on the stage and on the films. She has the gifts needed to interest the public which likes music, yet is not much given to concert-going and needs to be stimulated by the celebrity and prestige of a famous musician. As to her singing, which is but a part of her notable equipment, there has been and is a conspicuous divergence of opinion. It has its undeniable defects, which were most apparent in her opening aria, Mozart's charming "Voiche sapete"; smooth lyric grace here is indispensable, and that is not Miss Farrar's strong point. She made a much better impression in "Souvenir," by Bemberg, which followed. The Gounod "Serenade" lacked lightness and poish, but the last song in the group, "Ouvre tes yesbleus," by Massenet, gave expression to the side of her art in wheih she is strongest. Her higher range, though effective enough, is not her best; there is more richness of timbre in her lower and medium tones, the quality of which goes well with her highly dramatic temperament.

These traits make her better in lieder than in Italian bel canto, and there was some fine singing in the group of northern European songs comprising "Stille Sicherheit," a little-known song by Robert Franz, "Volksliedchen," by Schumann, "Erstes Begegnen," by Grieg, "Sternlein," by Moussorgsky, and "Schneegloeckchen," by Gretschaninov. Yet best of all was the great aria, "Un bel di vedremo," from her famous role of "Madama Butterfly" in Puccini's opera of that name. After all, she is even more actress than singer, and this brought in enough of the atmosphere of the theater to show her at her best. She was generous with encores, singing the "Habanera" from "Carmen" after the first group and "Mighty Lak a Rose" after the lieder group, this to her own accompaniment, which did not need so elaborate an instrument as a pianoforte.

The tenor, Mr Hackett, was very much at his best in his closing part made up of three fine German songs, "Liebesfeier," by Weingartner, "Mondnacht," by Schumann, and "Caecelie," by Richard Strauss. His singing has good qualities which would be more conspicuous if he should, as he very well might, add to its variety. His tone is at the opposite extreme from the bright, shallow smiling tone which voice specialists call "white"; it is even at times too lugubrious and a moment now and then of the Bonci smile would have given point and variety. He sang first the aria "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden," which unfortunately a large part of his audience could not hear because of delays in the street car service, and later a group containing "Le Reve," from Massenet's "Marion," "Lamento Provencale," by Paladihe, "Phidyle," by Duparc, and "Les Vautours," by Lenormand. The violoncellist, Mr Malkin, is an artist of skill, who should have made a stronger impression than he did. He has a smooth tone and fleet fingers, yet he failed of the eloquent expressiveness which is the soul of this instrument, and in the rapid numbers, perhaps from some untoward condition, his fingering was not always precisely in tune. Less sordino, less palm garden music, and a robuster and more incisive style would make his skill more effective. He played first a Chopin nocturne, opus 27, No 2, and a "Hungarian Dance," by Brahms, then a Sicillienne and Rigaudon by Francoeur-Kreisler, "Berceuse Slave," by Friemann-Malkin, and the dainty "Elfentanz," by Popper, following the last for encore, with the same composer's "Spinning Song."

From the Advertiser Oct.14,1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM WARLIKE

SHOCKS OF BATTLE ARE NOT TOO RUDE

Conductor Is Greeted With Warm Applause—Reading Is Termed Great

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
Berlioz—"Corsair" overture.
Liszt—"Mazeppa." Symphonic Poem.
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel." Orchestral Scherzo.

Dr. Muck's thoughts must have been rather combative when he made this programme, for the first three pieces tell tales of war very distinctly. We ought to be thankful that Strauss's "Heldenleben" did not round out the programme; that work where the composer agrees with Sherman's statement about War, and pictures it accordingly.

But Liszt and Berlioz and Beethoven, do not become ugly even when they picture combat. Beethoven held that Music should never become ugly, no matter what it pictured. Therefore the shocks of battle in the development of the first movement of the symphony were not too rude, and if the composer ventured to bring in two opposing chords together at the end of this section, it was smoothed down, so as to become quite innocuous, and it was by no means so terrible as the three different keys used simultaneously, in Strauss's battle, would have been.

But in this symphony, as in his Emperor concerto, and his violin concerto, Beethoven leads his strongest suit first. The symphony tapers off in power, noticeably, as it goes on. The Funeral March is too long, in spite of its Imperial character, and the exquisite oboe-playing that was exhibited in it, and the dignified reading it received. The Scherzo is brilliant and was very brilliantly played, but it scarcely seems to fit in the "Heroic" scheme. What does it mean? Berlioz and a few others thought that it portrayed the chattering crowd, forgetting all about the hero as soon as he was dead. Still less does the finale carry out the scheme. A set of variations, founded on a Ballet theme, scarcely indicate the apotheosis of the hero at the end. Compare the manner in which Liszt treats his hero, with the Beethoven finale, and the fitness is all on to side of Liszt, in spite of some glorious ingenuity in the Beethoven ending.

However, Dr. Muck must have felt the work deeply, and had his hero in mind, as he read the work. Heroes are (the more the sadness of it) as plenty as blackberries, at the present time, and probably every auditor had his thoughts transplanted to European or Mexican soil, by the music. And there was the same technique of which we are all so proud, in the performance, almost as if there had been no sumer dispersal. Great applause was given at the beginning of the symphony, when Dr. Muck appeared, and was more than repeated at the end, when much enthusiasm was manifested. The reading was absolutely a great one.

Berlioz's "Corsair" is not a work that is often heard. We believe the former generation heard it once at these concerts and then it was shelved. It was only proper that naval warfare should be present, in this bellicose program, even if the Corsair existed in days when no U boats sank ship and raised international problems simultaneously.

The work has little to say for itself. It is too watery even for a navy subject, and may well be put back on the shelf for another 25 years. The chief theme was gentle and amatory, the subordinate one savage and sanguinary and the work went on in alternate layers of ff. and pp.—roars and whispers. A work that seemed rather easy to create and having much "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Next the cavalry had its chance, with "Mazeppa." Liszt plunges into "medias res" at once with a clash of cymbals and an earthquake chord of all the wind instruments. The "Tartar of the Ukraine Breed" (even though Victor Hugo did not mention him, as Byron did) begins his gallop in triplets at once.

This whole second part of the program bristled with technical difficulties, and it meant much to dare to give such work at the first concert of the season and carry them through successfully. Most grandly did the trombones, contrabasses and violoncellos play the Mazeppa theme, and this forcible and virile subject was splendidly worked up in all its subsequent changes. Especially effective was the change of this melody to sadness, against percussion of the wood of the violin bows upon the strings ("col legno), although this seemed changed to pizzicato, and its subsequent repetition a semitone higher, was appropriately intensified. Then after fortississimo crashes and some strokes that might have burst the kettledrum, came the portrayal of weakness and doubt, in which the wind instruments gave excellent shading. And finally there came the still more barbaric march of victory, all foes crushed, and each auditor at liberty to choose his own victor. It was a grand climax to a very remarkable composition.

From the Advertiser Oct.14,1916.

Then we were allowed a little play, and the Rabelaisian humor of the Mediaeval Till was as charming as ever, perhaps more so because of the stern earnestness which had preceded it. We feel that nobody can excel Dr. Muck in bringing out the subtleties of this work. The mischievous pranks, the conceit of the hero, the philistinism of the burghers, the pursuit of the watchman, the trial and denunciation of Till, the terrible verdict, the wobbly weakness which at last takes the place of his supreme self-assurance, and the final squeaks on the scaffold were all graphically done. It was probably the most ambitious "first concert" that the orchestra has ever given, and it was abundantly appreciated by the usual large and distinguished audience, while Dr. Muck was in his most leonine mood.

m REPUBLICAN

dress: Springfield, Mass.

te

THE FIRST ELLIS CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar and Assisting Artists in Auditorium Wednesday Night

A program of beauty and attractiveness has been arranged for the first of the four Ellis subscription concerts, which will be given in the Auditorium on Wednesday evening. In addition to Geraldine Farrar, the artists who will appear are of high quality. Miss Farrar's associates are Arthur Hackett, a young tenor, and Joseph Malkin, the violoncello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony orchestra, while the accompanist will be Richard Epstein, who is accomplished in his very exacting and difficult art.

The program comprises eight numbers, Miss Farrar and Mr Hackett having each three of them, and Mr Malkin two. The opening number by Mr Hackett will be "Ah! moon of my delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden." Mr Malkin, who follows, plays two pieces. Then comes Miss Farrar with her first group of four songs. The first of these is the cavatina, "Voi, che Sapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Eigaro." The other three are French songs: Bemberg's "Souvenir," Gounod's "Serenade" and Massenet's always charming "Ouvre tes yeux."

The fourth number brings Mr Hackett again in French music. The fifth number is a group of five songs, two of them German, one of them Norwegian and two of them Russian, but all sung in German by Miss Farrar. These are Robert Franz's "Stille Sicherheit," Robert Schumann's "Volksliedehen," Eduard Grieg's "Erstes Begegnen," Moussorgsky's "Sternlein," and Gretschaninou's "Schneeglockchen" (Snow Balls).

In the sixth number Mr Malkin plays three pieces for 'cello: Kreisler's arrangement of the quaint old dances, "Sicilienne et Rigavdon," by the 18th century French composer, Francoeur; Malkin's arrangement of Friemann's "Berceuse Slave," and David Popper's "Elfentanz." Mr Hackett's last appearance in the program brings three German songs. The concert will be closed by Miss Farrar, who sings the aria, "Un bel dì," which comes at the end of the second act of Puccini's "Madama [illegible]"

dress: Providence, R. I.

te 1916

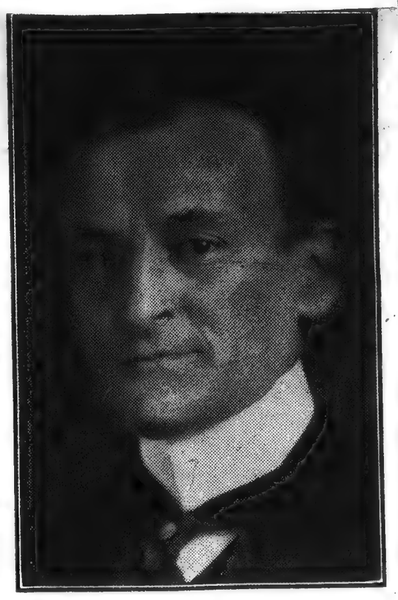
Symphony Seat Sale.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, next Monday morning. There will be six concerts which Dr. Muck will direct, arranged as usual for Tuesday night, and for the first time in this city the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. This has been made possible by the movable extension which has been built to fit the stage at Infantry Hall, and which will give ample room for 100 musicians. The first concert will come on Oct. 17, at which Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The other soloists will appear as follows: Nov. 21, Susan Millar, a pupil of Marcella Sembrich; Dec. 26, Irma Seydal; Feb. 6, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; March 6, Emmy Destinn; April 10, Ethel Leginska, Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, Miss Seydel a violiniste and Miss Leginska a pianiste, these soloists being new to the symphony concerts here.

m EXPRESS

dress: Buffalo, N. Y.

te OCT 8 1916



DR. KARL MUCK.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play here on Tuesday, January 23d, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series of concerts.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 15, 1916

TO PLAY NEW CONCERTO.

Fritz Kreisler to Be Soloist with Boston Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give under Institute auspices in the Academy of Music the coming season. Friday evening, Nov. 3, will be made notable through the first performance in this city of a new concerto for violin and orchestra by the distinguished American composer and pianist, Ernest Schelling. The soloist, as already announced, will be Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Schelling for two summers have been neighbors in Mount Desert. Last summer Mr. Schelling wrote this concerto for Mr. Kreisler, and the latter is playing it at all of his eight appearances this fall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is most enthusiastic over it, and the first rehearsal of the work held in Boston last week revealed it as a composition exceedingly rich in melodic beauty and technical brilliance. Its first performance anywhere will be in Providence, R. I., next Tuesday evening, Oct. 17. It will be played again in Cambridge on the 19th and in Boston on the 20th and 21st.

FRITZ KREISLER

rom EVENING Bulletin

ddress: ENING Providence, R. I.

ate OCT 7 - 1916

Symphony Seat Sale.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, next Monday morning. There will be six concerts which Dr. Muck will direct, arranged as usual for Tuesday night, and for the first time in this city the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. This has been made possible by the movable extension which has been built to fit the stage at Infantry Hall, and which will give ample room for 100 musicians. The first concert will come on Oct. 17, at which Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The other soloists will appear as follows: Nov. 21, Susan Millar, a pupil of Marcella Sembrich; Dec. 26, Irma Seydal; Feb. 6, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; March 6, Emmy Destinn; April 10, Ethel Leginska, Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, Miss Seydel a violiniste and Miss Leginska a pianiste, these soloists being new to the symphony concerts here.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date Oct-13, OCT 2

Just a week after local bands, the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the first of its five visits to New York. The dates of the first concerts are Thursday evening, Nov. 2, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4. Neither of these concerts will have a soloist.

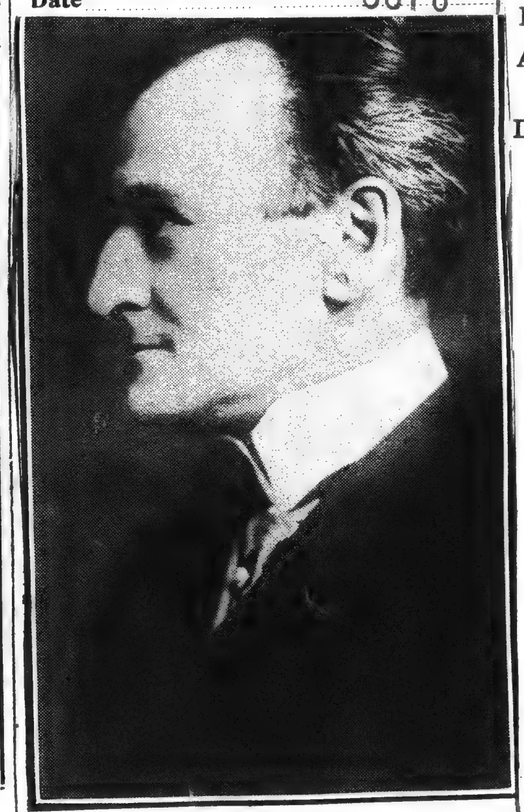
Boston is on the map now in world series style. The regular season of the premier orchestra was opening yesterday afternoon and this Saturday evening, with the largest subscription the band ever had in its home city. For the first time in many years the sale of season tickets for the Boston concerts by "auction" was abandoned, and a subscription at fixed prices similar to that in New York has been adopted.

Dr. Muck will lead during the season a total of 112 concerts, ten of which are in Carnegie Hall and five in the Brooklyn Academy. There is the usual subscription for both the New York and Brooklyn series, and a waiting list of 600 in Manhattan alone.

From TIMES

Address: Buffalo, N. Y.

Date OCT 8



DR. KARL MUCK.
Director Boston Symphony Orchestra—Third Concert, Jan. 23rd.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 15 1916

Date

THE CONCERT STAGE

The subscription sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress for the last week, and is well up to the high average set by recent years. By the time the first concert arrives, October 30, there will be very few seats left of any kind. The dates of the concerts are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12, and the soloists announced are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. Of these, Susan Millar and Carl Friedberg are new to Philadelphia.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert. He plans then to play, for the first time in Philadelphia, a new concerto for violin and orchestra, which has been written especially for him by Ernest Schelling. His first recital in Philadelphia is set for Saturday afternoon, November 11 in the Academy of Music.

rom

ddress: Bulletin

ate

Boston Symphony Sale Opens.

The sale of tickets for the six concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence was opened this morning at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Oct. 17, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10. The soloists announced are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist.

[24]

rom

Address: CONN

SEP 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony's season will consist of 30 weeks, ending May 5.

A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged—48 for Boston, 10 for New York, 8 for Cambridge, 6 for Providence, 5 each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, 3 each for Hartford and Worcester, 2 each for New Bedford and Springfield, with single concerts in various cities of New England and the middle west.

It is necessary to search one's memory for many years back to find a season when the management has offered to its patrons a list of soloists so long, so comprehensive and so distinguished as that announced for the season of 1916-1917. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving only six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

The salient feature which strikes the eye in looking over the list is the number of distinguished singers engaged. Of these there are seven, just half of the total number of assisting artists who come from outside the orchestra. Six of these are women. Of these, four are distinguished members of the Metropolitan Opera company, Mesdames Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are the most distinguished concert singers of the day, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt.

The seventh singer engaged in John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular singer of the day.

Of pianists there are six, headed by the master, Paderewski. The others are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Friedberg makes his first appearance with the orchestra.

The two violinists drawn from outside the orchestra are Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding. Kreisler has become a fixture in the Symphony schedule. Mr. Spalding, whose rise into the front rank of contemporary violinists has been rapid, makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date

Ernest Schelling has again been complimented by the acceptance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of his new concerto for violin, almost before the ink was dry on the manuscript. It was composed for Fritz Kreisler, who will play it with the Boston Orchestra in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Brooklyn. Why not in Carnegie Hall, too? Can it be true that, as intimated in Musical America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no soloists at its New York concerts, whereas in Boston it will have many more than before?

Martina Phillips, Swedish coloratura soprano, who will make her New York début at Aeolian Hall next Friday evening

From the Advertiser Oct.14,1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM WARLIKE

SHOCKS OF BATTLE ARE NOT TOO RUDE

Conductor Is Greeted With Warm Applause—Reading Is Termed Great

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
Berlioz—"Corsair" overture.
Liszt—"Mazeppa." Symphonic Poem.
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel." Orchestral Scherzo.

Dr. Muck's thoughts must have been rather combative when he made this programme, for the first three pieces tell tales of war very distinctly. We ought to be thankful that Strauss's "Heldenleben" did not round out the programme; that work where the composer agrees with Sherman's statement about War, and pictures it accordingly.

But Liszt and Berlioz and Beethoven, do not become ugly even when they picture combat. Beethoven held that Music should never become ugly, no matter what it pictured. Therefore the shocks of battle in the development of the first movement of the symphony were not too rude, and if the composer ventured to bring in two opposing chords together at the end of this section, it was smoothed down, so as to become quite innocuous, and it was by no means so terrible as the three different keys used simultaneously, in Strauss's battle, would have been.

But in this symphony, as in his Emperor concerto, and his violin concerto, Beethoven leads his strongest suit first. The symphony tapers off in power, noticeably, as it goes on. The Funeral March is too long, in spite of its Imperial character, and the exquisite oboe-playing that was exhibited in it, and the dignified reading it received. The Scherzo is brilliant and was very brilliantly played, but it scarcely seems to fit in the "Heroic" scheme. What does it mean? Berlioz and a few others thought that it portrayed the chattering crowd, forgetting all about the hero as soon as he was dead. Still less does the finale carry out the scheme. A set of variations, founded on a Ballet theme, scarcely indicate the apotheosis of the hero at the end. Compare the manner in which Liszt treats his hero, with the Beethoven finale, and the fitness is all on to side of Liszt, in spite of some glorious ingenuity in the Beethoven ending.

However, Dr. Muck must have felt the work deeply, and had his hero in mind, as he read the work. Heroes are (the more the sadness of it) as plenty as blackberries, at the present time, and probably every auditor had his thoughts transplanted to European or Mexican soil, by the music. And there was the same technique, of which we are all so proud, in the performance, almost as if there had been no sumer dispersal. Great applause was given at the beginning of the symphony, when Dr. Muck appeared, and was more than repeated at the end, when much enthusiasm was manifested. The reading was absolutely a great one.

Berlioz's" Corsair" is not a work that is often heard. We believe the former generation heard it once at these concerts and then it was shelved. It was only proper that naval warfare should be present, in this bellicose program, even if the Corsair existed in days when no U-boats sank ship and raised international problems simultaneously.

The work has little to say for itself. It is too watery even for a naval subject, and may well be put back on the shelf for another 25 years. The chief theme was gentle and amatory; the subordinate one savage and sanguinary and the work went on in alternate layers of ff. and pp.—roars and whispers. A work that seemed rather easy to create and having much "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Next the cavalry had its chance, with "Mazeppa." Liszt plunges into "medias res" at once with a clash of cymbals and an earthquake chord of all the wind instruments. The "Tartar of the Ukraine Breed" (even though Victor Hugo did not mention him, as Byron did) begins his gallop in triplets at once.

This whole second part of the program bristled with technical difficulties, and it meant much to dare to give such work at the first concert of the season and carry them through successfully. Most grandly did the trombones, contrabasses and violoncellos play the Mazeppa theme, and this forcible and virile subject was splendidly worked up in all its subsequent changes. Especially effective was the change of this melody to sadness, against percussion of the wood of the violin bows upon the strings ("col legno), although this seemed changed to pizzicato, and its subsequent repetition a semitone higher, was appropriately intensified. Then after fortississimo crashes and some strokes that might have burst the kettledrum, came the portrayal of weakness and doubt, in which the wind instruments gave excellent shading. And finally there came the still more barbaric march of victory, all foes crushed, and each auditor at liberty to choose his own victor. It was a grand climax to a very remarkable composition.

From the Advertiser Oct.14,1916.

Then we were allowed a little play, and the Rabelaisian humor of the Mediaeval Till was as charming as ever, perhaps more so because of the stern earnestness which had preceded it. We feel that nobody can excel Dr. Muck in bringing out the subtleties of this work. The mischievous pranks, the conceit of the hero, the philistinism of the burghers, the pursuit of the watchman, the trial and denunciation of Till, the terrible verdict, the wobbly weakness which at last takes the place of his supreme self-assurance, and the final squeaks on the scaffold were all graphically done. It was probably the most ambitious "first concert" that the orchestra has ever given, and it was abundantly appreciated by the usual large and distinguished audience, while Dr. Muck was in his most leonine mood.

m REPUBLICAN
dress: Springfield, Mass.

te

THE FIRST ELLIS CONCERT

eraldine Farrar and Assisting Artists in Auditorium Wednesay Night program of beauty and attractive- has been arranged for the first of four Ellis subscription concerts, will be given in the Auditorium Vednesday evening. In addition eraldine Farrar, the artists who ppear are of high quality. Miss r's associates are Arthur Hackyoung tenor, and Joseph Malkin, oloncello virtuoso of the Boston ony orchestra, while the acnist will be Richard Epstein, accomplished in his very exactd difficult art.

program comprises eight numss Farrar and Mr Hackett havthree of them, and Mr Malkin he opening number by Mr will be "Ah! moon of my deom Liza Lehmann's "In a Garden." Mr Malkin, who folays two pieces. Then comes arrar with her first group of gs. The first of these is th "Voi, che Sapete," from Mo Marriage of Eigaro." The other e French songs: Bemberg's r," Gounod's "Serenade" and 's always charming "Ouvre urth number brings Mr Hack- in French music. The fifth is a group of five songs, two German, one of them Norand two of them Russian, but in German by Miss Farrar. e Robert Franz's "Stille t," Robert Schumann's dehen," Eduard Grieg's Begegnen," Moussorgsky's ," and Gretschaninou's ockchen" (Snow Balls).

sixth number Mr Malkin

Garage Be Sp

m JOURNAL
dress: Providence, R. I.

te 1916

Symphony Seat Sale.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, next Monday morning. There will be six concerts which Dr. Muck will direct, arranged as usual for Tuesday night, and for the first time in this city the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. This has been made possible by the movable extension which has been built to fit the stage at Infantry Hall, and which will give ample room for 100 musicians. The first concert will come on Oct. 17, at which Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The other soloists will appear as follows: Nov. 21, Susan Millar, a pupil of Marcella Sembrich; Dec. 26, Irma Seydal; Feb. 6, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; March 6, Emmy Destinn; April 10, Ethel Leginska, Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, Miss Seydel a violiniste and Miss Leginska a pianiste, these soloists being new to the symphony concerts here.

m EXPRESS
dress: Buffalo, N. Y.

te OCT 8 1916

DR. KARL MUCK.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play here on Tuesday, January 23d, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series of concerts.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date Oct 15, 1916

TO PLAY NEW CONCERTO.

Fritz Kreisler to Be Soloist with Boston Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give under Institute auspices in the Academy of Music the coming season. Friday evening, Nov. 3, will be made notable through the first performance in this city of a new concerto for violin and orchestra by the distinguished American composer and pianist, Ernest Schelling. The soloist, as already announced, will be Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Schelling for two summers have been neighbors in Mount Desert. Last summer Mr. Schelling wrote this concerto for Mr. Kreisler, and the latter is playing it at all of his eight appearances this fall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is most enthusiastic over it, and the first rehearsal of the work held in Boston last week revealed it as a composition exceedingly rich in melodic beauty and technical brilliance. Its first performance anywhere will be in Providence, R. I., next Tuesday evening, Oct. 17. It will be played again in Cambridge on the 19th and in Boston on the 20th and 21st.

FRITZ KREISLER

rom ..... Bulletin
ddress: Providence, R. I. ate OCT 9 - 1916

Boston Symphony Sale Opens.

The sale of tickets for the six concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence was opened this morning at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Oct. 17, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10. The soloists announced are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist.

[24]

rom ..... Bulletin
ddress: Providence, R. I. ate OCT 7 - 1916

Symphony Seat Sale.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, next Monday morning. There will be six concerts which Dr. Muck will direct, arranged as usual for Tuesday night, and for the first time in this city the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. This has been made possible by the movable extension which has been built to fit the stage at Infantry Hall, and which will give ample room for 100 musicians. The first concert will come on Oct. 17, at which Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The other soloists will appear as follows: Nov. 21, Susan Millar, a pupil of Marcella Sembrich; Dec. 26, Irma Seydal; Feb. 6, Ossip Gabrilowitsch; March 6, Emmy Destinn; April 10, Ethel Leginska, Miss Millar is a mezzo-soprano, Miss Seydel a violiniste and Miss Leginska a pianiste, these soloists being new to the symphony concerts here.

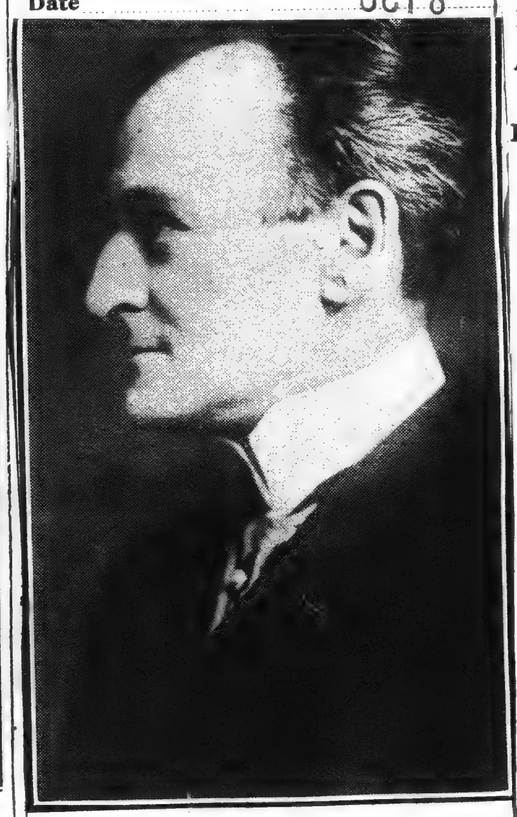
From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date Oct 13 OCT

Just a week after local bands, the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the first of its five visits to New York. The dates of the first concerts are Thursday evening, Nov. 2, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4. Neither of these concerts will have a soloist.

Boston is on the map now in world series style. The regular season of the premier orchestra was opening yesterday afternoon and this Saturday evening, with the largest subscription the band ever had in its home city. For the first time in many years the sale of season tickets for the Boston concerts by "auction" was abandoned, and a subscription at fixed prices similar to that in New York has been adopted.

Dr. Muck will lead during the season a total of 112 concerts, ten of which are in Carnegie Hall and five in the Brooklyn Academy. There is the usual subscription for both the New York and Brooklyn series, and a waiting list of 600 in Manhattan alone.

From TIMES
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date OCT 8



DR. KARL MUCK.
Director Boston Symphony Orchestra—Third Concert, Jan. 23rd.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1916
Date

THE CONCERT STAGE

The subscription sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress for the last week, and is well up to the high average set by recent years By the time the first concert arrives, October 30, there will be very few seats left of any kind The dates of the concerts are October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12, and the soloists announced are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. Of these, Susan Millar and Carl Friedberg are new to Philadelphia.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the first concert. He plans then to play, for the first time in Philadelphia, a new concerto for violin and orchestra, which has been written especially for him by Ernest Schelling. His first recital in Philadelphia is set for Saturday afternoon, November 11 in the Academy of Music.

From ..... Bulletin
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 9 - 1916

Boston Symphony Sale Opens.

The sale of tickets for the six concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence was opened this morning at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Oct. 17, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10. The soloists announced are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Susan Millar, mezzo soprano; Irma Seydel, violinist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist.

From Rec ... RISD
Address: 144 BRISTOL CONN SEP 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony's season will consist of 30 weeks, ending May 5.

A schedule of 110 concerts has been arranged—48 for Boston, 10 for New York, 8 for Cambridge, 6 for Providence, 5 each for Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, 3 each for Hartford and Worcester, 2 each for New Bedford and Springfield, with single concerts in various cities of New England and the middle west.

It is necessary to search one's memory for many years back to find a season when the management has offered to its patrons a list of soloists so long, so comprehensive and so distinguished as that announced for the season of 1916-1917. Including the four leading members of the string sections, Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos, there will be 19 soloists at as many pairs of concerts, leaving only six pairs in which the programs will be purely orchestral.

The salient feature which strikes the eye in looking over the list is the number of distinguished singers engaged. Of these there are seven, just half of the total number of assisting artists who come from outside the orchestra. Six of these are women. Of these, four are distinguished members of the Metropolitan Opera company, Mesdames Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The other two are the most distinguished concert singers of the day, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt.

The seventh singer engaged is John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular singer of the day.

Of pianists there are six, headed by the master, Paderewski. The others are Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Ernest Schelling and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Friedberg makes his first appearance with the orchestra.

The two violinists drawn from outside the orchestra are Fritz Kreisler and Albert Spalding. Kreisler has become a fixture in the Symphony schedule. Mr. Spalding, whose rise into the front rank of contemporary violinists has been rapid, makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Ernest Schelling has again been complimented by the acceptance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of his new concerto for violin, almost before the ink was dry on the manuscript. It was composed for Fritz Kreisler, who will play it with the Boston Orchestra in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Brooklyn. Why not in Carnegie Hall, too? Can it be true that, as intimated in Musical America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no soloists at its New York concerts, whereas in Boston it will have many more than before?

Martina Phillips, Swedish coloratura soprano, who will make her New York début at Aeolian Hall next Friday evening

From the Providence Tribune
Oct. 18th

FIRST CONCERT HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, Created Great Enthusiasm.

There was a large audience at Infantry Hall last night to greet the musicians and the soloist at the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is pleasing to note once more that the people of this city evince a growing appreciation of the kind of music this organization renders and of the excellent opportunity that is afforded to hear the best works of the masters and the best singers and players as supporting artists. This first concert of the present fall and winter gives full assurance that this series will be attended by capacity audiences and that the concerts will be of as high quality as ever with respect to the work of the orchestra and the ability of the soloists.

There were two special features last night that made the opening event of more than ordinary interest. One of these was the fact that for the first time in this city the orchestra was present in full numbers. Heretofore this has not been possible as the space for the musicians was too limited to permit the seating of the entire organization. The stage has now been enlarged, however, and will accommodate all the members and thus make it possible for the orchestra to present any work of merit which requires for its production as many as a hundred players. The change was very noticeable both to the eye and to the ear, for naturally the volume of the orchestral music was increased and the quality also showed the good effect of large numbers and a more symmetrical arrangement.

The second special feature was the presence of Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist of the world, as the soloist of the evening. Mr. Kreisler is by no means a stranger to this city, but he is ever welcome and he was accorded an enthusiastic reception last night not only when he appeared upon the platform, but also at the close of his selection when prolonged and repeated applause brought him back to the stage several times.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, was given his usual meed of applause when he stepped to his platform for the opening number, Beethoven's great "Eroica" symphony. This familiar work occupied the entire first half of the program and was rendered superbly by the enlarged orchestra. The allegro is beautiful in form and expression, the funeral march solemn and stately in its mood and manner, the scherzo full of melody with a gay theme supposed to have been taken from an Austrian folk song and the finale effective with its involved themes and joyful conclusion. The rendition was delightful in every detail and the orchestra won long applause.

After the intermission Mr. Kreisler made his first appearance of a series of eight in Ernest Schelling's new concerto for violin and orchestra. The audience last night had the distinction of being the first to hear this work, for it was composed for Mr. Kreisler as recently as the past summer. It is not a long [illegible] is brilliant and difficult in many features. It is highly ambitious but nothing possesses too much of that quality to daunt this violinist of the highest rank. It is undoubtedly, as Mr. Kreisler says, an important contribution to the literature of the violin, and it will be heard with distinct pleasure wherever it is played. Mr. Kreisler was at his best in his work and roused his audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm though not a few probably prefer to hear him in recital, where the violin is not drowned in the orchestra volume.

The closing number was Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," a selection of brilliant form, but unusual character, which was received with approval.

The program in order follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .....Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto for violin and orchestra.....
..... Schelling

"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6....
..... Liszt

From the Record
Oct. 21,1916.

MUSIC NOTES

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 o'clock. The artists will be Madame Frances Alda and Guiseppe de Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The third pair of Symphony Concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening present as soloist Madame Gadski.

Kreisler, who received a tremendous ovation at the Symphony yesterday, will give his first recital of the season at Symphony Hall Sunday, Oct. 29.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Augmented but otherwise practically unchanged, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will open its 36th season in this city next week. Its prospectus for the six concerts which it will give here contains promise of engaging soloists, and the vital fact that Providence will get the same orchestra that is heard in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and other large cities of the East.

In spite of reports that Emmy Destinn will be unable to leave Austria, the Symphony announces its disbelief in their truth, and it is hoped that she will arrive in time to sing at the fifth concert on March 6.

While the names of Kreisler and Gabrilowitsch are familiar to all music lovers here, the other soloists are less well known. Ethel Leginska is an English pianist who is playing this year for the first time with the orchestra. Irma Seydel is the daughter of one of the members of the orchestra. As those who heard her here at an Arion concert last season will testify, she is young, attractive and an admirable artist. She has played a number of times with the orchestra with success.

Susan Miller is a Virginian who is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice. She is the first pupil entirely trained by Mme. Marcella Sembrich to be launched into professional life. Her appearance here will be her second as a professional, the first taking place with the orchestra in Cambridge a fortnight earlier.

The general sale of season tickets, which have not been taken up by subscription, will open at Seddon's news stand in the Butler Exchange to-morrow morning.

* * *

Prof. John P. Marshall of Boston University, who has been the official organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1909, will give a free lecture in Sayles Hall, Brown University, on Friday evening at 8 o'clock, upon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert on Oct. 17. In addition to the discussion of the works to be played on this occasion, Prof. Marshall will discuss the orchestra, mentioning the functions of the different instruments; also the work of the conductor, and other interesting features of orchestral routine.

STAR
BALTIMORE, MD
OCT 14 1916
LYRIC

Public subscription sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress since last Monday with most excellent results and the season of 1916-1917 promises in every respect to be on a par with that of 1915-16, which was a record. The five concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theater, some as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The soloists announced, in the order in which they will appear, are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. To be sure there is doubt about the appearance of Mme. Destinn. Even through the American Embassy at Vienna it has been impossible to get word to or from this famous Bohemian singer who, by all accounts, has been taken into custody by the Austrian government, or at least, interned; but "much water may flow under a bridge" between now and March 1 when Miss Destinn is scheduled to appear here, and it is hoped by that time she will arrive safely in America.

From the Advertiser
Oct. 21, 1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS LESS WARLIKE

CHARM ASCRIBED TO ITS SINCERITY

Chausson's Work Consists of But Three Movements—Is Earnest and Sombre

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

Program
Chausson—Symphony in B-flat.
Wagner—"Faust" overture.
Schelling—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler
Brahms—"Academic" overture.

A concert by no means so warlike as the opening one, and rather too strenuous for the average public. Chausson's Symphony might teach a lesson to the moderns, for it is a good deal shorter than Korngold's "Sinfonietta," being of three movements only. It has no Scherzo and is never in a playful mood. It is earnest, even sombre, almost throughout, yet in spite of this it is not monotonous, for Chausson has the art of working up his climaxes with real fervor, and these lost none of their power in the hands of Dr. Muck.

The second movement seems to suggest tragedy in almost every part, yet the sombre passages are contrasted with moments of ineffable tenderness and nothing seems forced or overstrained.

The Finale speaks of triumph and in its development of figures recalls Chausson's teacher, Cesar Franck. It is a little three-noted figure (D, B-flat, A, descending) which plays an important role in this last movement, and there is also a chorale-like theme which is very lofty. The trumpet-playing in the finale was inspiring, and the work was read with a freedom that suited well to its impressionist style.

The charm of the symphony lies in its sincerity. One may doubt the honesty of several of the moderns, but no such doubt ever attaches to the music of Chausson. It rings true from beginning to end. There is here an enforced style and a nobility that compel admiration, even from those who do not fully comprehend the work. But, after all, it is "musician's music," and cannot convey its message to the general public, even though it was greatly applauded at this performance.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," was finely given, but after all it does not seem the Faust of Goethe. Amid all the many compositions which the poem-play has inspired one can only think of Schumann as coming somewhere near to the poet's conception. To be sure Liszt's "Marguerite" and his ethical idea of Mephistopheles must not be forgotten, and we must also remember Berlioz, who refused to follow Goethe in the final salvation of his hero, and sent him to the subterranean winter resort, but the character of this hero yet remains to be revealed in music. Wagner presents us with a very dissatisfied gentleman, but the Faust who betrayed Gretchen is not in evidence, in fact there is almost nothing feminine in the work.

It was beautifully played, although to add the darkness of Wagner to the sombreness of Chausson was beginning to make matters rather dismal.

Mr. Schelling's new work is an echo of—Schelling. That is the modern vein of his previous compositions is strongly present. Its brevity is commendable, the composer not being led into prolixity by the demon of variations (who has even led Beethoven and Brahms into garrulity) and the succinct and earnest style of the composition may be cordially recognized. The concerto has its technical difficulties—a great many of them—but it was played by an artist by whom difficulties are easily conquered—Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

The reception of this violinist proved how thoroughly Boston recognizes his leading rank. It was an ovation, both before and after the concerto. But before it was a greeting, after it was a tribute to great and artistic work. But we cannot consider the composition a masterpiece. It is in a single movement, but changes of tempo give to it the essence of a regular three-movement concerto. It is too continuously in the high positions and also too constantly pianissimo until near the end. Only at the finale is there a touch of Spanish dash and tambourine and castagnettes add their tropical flavor to the score.

But it is only fair to add that the public did not agree with the critic's verdict and called Mr. Schelling as well as Mr. Kreisler out again and again.

Brahm's "Academic Overture" never grows stale. The genial working up of college melodies is a tribute to the student's muse which is quite unique in the musical repertoire. And Beethoven himself never used the bassoons better than they are employed in passages of this work. But nothing new can be said of a composition which every musical Bostonian knows and which is always played by our orchestra in a flawless manner. Therefore, the concert, which began tragically and with sombre thoughts, ended with geniality, combined with intellectuality. It was high time to relax a little.

n EVENING GLOBE
ress: New York City
OCT 19 19

The programme for the first Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall this season, Thursday evening, Nov. 2, will be the same with which the Boston season of the orchestra opened Oct. 13 and 14. It includes the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's overture "The Corsair"; Liszt's "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." For Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4, the programme includes Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra," and Brahms's "Variations on a Chorale by Josef Haydn."

From the
Herald
Oct. 21,1916.

CHAUSSON WORK PERFORMED AT SYMPHONY HALL

Orchestra Gives Superb Interpretation of Interesting Composition — Wagner's Faust Overture Also Played—Mr. Kreisler's Playing Greatly Enjoyed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Chausson, Symphony in b-flat major; Wagner, A Faust overture; Schelling, concerto for violin and orchestra (first time in Boston; Mr. Kreisler, violinist); Brahms, Academic Festival overture.

Chausson's Symphony has not been performed here since Mr. Gericke conducted it ten years ago last January. It is surprising that the Symphony has been so neglected. Chausson was a pupil of Cesar Franck. The influence of that great composer is plainly observed in his pupil's music. In the first movement of the Symphony there is practically a quotation from the Symphony of Franck. Chausson was also under the spell of Wagner. This is to be observed in the second movement of the Symphony. All this is natural and to be expected. Chausson, a rich man, and at first an amateur, not satisfied with the routine instruction at the Paris Conservatory, studied with Franck. That he should have escaped the influence of that master would have argued poorly for his future. But Chausson was by no means a slavish imitator. He had much to say for himself in his own way.

The prevailing characteristic of this Symphony is a gentle melancholy that is neither depressing nor irritating. The mood is not lugubrious; it is not pessimistic. The mood of the Symphony is that of other works by Chausson, instrumental and vocal. He was enamored of Death and found varied expression of this absorbing theme. Perhaps he had a premonition of his cruel fate. This obsession puts him on a lower plane than that of his master. The sadness Franck expressed in music is that felt by a serene and compassionate soul above the din and the anguish; there is also the triumphant spirt of hope and assurance. The melancholy in Chausson's Symphony is seldom relieved by a light-hearted or aspiring episode.

And in this symphony, noble as it is in its idealism, its refinement, its spirituality, there are pages that betray the pupil, still experimenting, still not wholly sure of his own force. Witness the coda of the first movement. There is not sufficient contrast in mood between the first and second movements. As a work of art, in contents and expression, the first movement is the best. The third is much less significant until the introduction of the sacred hymn, which brings a sonorous and contemplative ending. But even here, in spirit and in technical matters, as in the treatment of the bass, there is the suggestion of Franck reviewing and encouraging the work of his disciple.

Beautiful music, for the most part; music that should be more familiar. This and certain other compositions have been played at Symphony concerts once within the last dozen or fifteen years and then put aside. The audience has had no opportunity of becoming well acquainted with them. In their place we have had endless repetitions of well known compositions: overtures by Weber, symphonies by Mozart and Haydn — the same old symphonies by Haydn. Wagner's "Faust" overture might well stay on the shelf for a while. Would musical righteousness suffer if the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms were not played regularly once in two or three seasons. The years glide by; there is much music; comparatively little of that which is noteworthy in the modern period is as well known as mediocre compositions of the 19th century.

The superb performance of the symphony and the quality of the music itself were fully appreciated by an audience that filled the hall.

Mr. Schelling wrote his concerto for Mr. Kreisler in July and August of this year, but he had the concerto in mind when he was on the Pacific coast. The concerto is not a virtuoso piece in the ordinary sense; music for the display and glory of a violinist. There is no pompous introduction to introduce the gentleman; there is no obsequious accompaniment. The concerto is for the most part a symphonic work in which the solo violin is in the ensemble. Only in the recitatives an episode borrowed from Mr. Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life" (played here last season), does the solo violin have the traditional lead. To us the most fascinating pages of the concerto—Mr. Schelling as a composer is always interesting—are those of the interludes "Lagoon," with its original and charming orchestration

From the
Herald
Oct.21,1916.

—the whispering of strings—the variation above mentioned "Fr. Kr.," the dramatic recitatives and the interlude in the Spanish vein. In the last pages—those of the Scottish jig and Spanish folk songs—the orchestration is too heavy, too thick. The orchestration of the opening pages might also be lightened.

These faults can easily be remedied. The finer features of the concerto which show poetic feeling, true imagination and technical skill far outweigh them. Mr. Kreisler displayed his customary facility, verve, beauty of tone, also a spirit of personal friendship and devotion. To him the concerto is a masterpiece. Fortunate the composer that has so brilliant and sympathetic an interpreter.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Schumann, "Rhenish" Symphony; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative (Mme. Gadski); Beethoven, Fuguo for string orchestra, op. 133 (first time at these concerts); Wagner, Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" (Mme. Gadski.)

From the Traveler
Oct.21,1916.

Busy Week for Lovers of Music

First of Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon Concerts; Opera Season.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The coming week brings the first concert in the annual series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. It also brings to Boston its first taste of opera, when the Aborn Company on Monday night opens a two weeks' engagement at the Boston Opera House.

For the first of his Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Mr. Mudgett will have for artists Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Giuseppe de Luca, baritone, of the same company. Both artists are well known here and deservedly popular. There will also be an orchestra of Symphony players under Joseph Pasternack to assist. The program will be:

Aria, "Barbiere Cavatina".....Rossini
Mr. De Luca.
(a) Aria from "Carattaco".....Johann Bach
(b) Non so piu (Marriage of Figaro)....Mozart
(c) My Lovely Celia.....Munro
(d) Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
(e) Canzonetta.....John Antonio Perti
Mme. Alda.
(a) Canta il mare.....De Leva
(b) Occhi di fata.....Denza
(c) Serenata ..... Morlacchi
(d) Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi Peccia
(e) Roi d'Ys.....Lalo
Mr. De Luca.
(a) Sinulle (Finnish) (first time)....Merikanto
(b) Margarethlein .....Grieg
(c) Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
(d) Deep River (Negro Folk Song)....Burleigh
(e) Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Aria, "Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi
Mr. De Luca.
(a) L'Automne (first time; dedicated to Mme Alda).....Sibella
(b) Edelweiss (first time).....Fourdrain
(c) Chanson Norvegienne (first time).Fourdrain
(d) Unrequited Love (first time; dedicated to Mme. Alda).....La Forge
(e) Song of the Open (first time; dedicated to Mme. Alda).....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

Dr. Muck's program for the Symphony concerts next week will be: Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony; an excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," with Madame Gadski as soloist; Beethoven's Grand Fugue for string orchestra and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," with Madame Gadski as the soloist.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the artist for the concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Josef Malkin, 'cellist, will be the artists, Nov. 5.

KREISLER PLAYS NEW CONCERTO WITH SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist, playing for the first time Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra, writen with Mr. Kreisler's artistry in mind, was the feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. If anybody had doubts as to the popularity of the soloist, said doubts must have been removed by the reception accorded him when he came on the stage.

The concerto made a hit. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his composition introduced to the public by such a soloist and such an orchestra. Mr. Kreisler was recalled and recalled and, even though he brought forth the composer to share in the tribute and still later Dr. Muck and the composer, the applause did not cease until the soloist added a couple or more appearances.

After hearing Dr. Muck's reading of the Chausson symphony one wonders more than ever that the Symphony concerts have been deprived of this gem of real music for 10 years. It's a safe prediction that it will be heard again before another 10 years have elapsed. The audience recalled Dr. Muck at its close until he had the players stand and share in the honor.

For full measure Dr. Muck presented Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms's "Academic" overture, both being given in the orchestra's best style.

[25]

From the Providence Tribune
Oct. 18th

FIRST CONCERT HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, Created Great Enthusiasm.

There was a large audience at Infantry Hall last night to greet the musicians and the soloist at the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is pleasing to note once more that the people of this city evince a growing appreciation of the kind of music this organization renders and of the excellent opportunity that is afforded to hear the best works of the masters and the best singers and players as supporting artists. This first concert of the present fall and winter gives full assurance that this series will be attended by capacity audiences and that the concerts will be of as high quality as ever with respect to the work of the orchestra and the ability of the soloists.

There were two special features last night that made the opening event of more than ordinary interest. One of these was the fact that for the first time in this city the orchestra was present in full numbers. Heretofore this has not been possible as the space for the musicians was too limited to permit the seating of the entire organization. The stage has now been enlarged, however, and will accommodate all the members and thus make it possible for the orchestra to present any work of merit which requires for its production as many as a hundred players. The change was very noticeable both to the eye and to the ear, for naturally the volume of the orchestral music was increased and the quality also showed the good effect of large numbers and a more symmetrical arrangement.

The second special feature was the presence of Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist of the world, as the soloist of the evening. Mr. Kreisler is by no means a stranger to this city, but he is ever welcome and he was accorded an enthusiastic reception last night not only when he appeared upon the platform, but also at the close of his selection when prolonged and repeated applause brought him back to the stage several times.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, was given his usual meed of applause when he stepped to his platform for the opening number, Beethoven's great "Eroica" symphony. This familiar work occupied the entire first half of the program and was rendered superbly by the enlarged orchestra. The allegro is beautiful in form and expression, the funeral march solemn and stately in its mood and manner, the scherzo full of melody with a gay theme supposed to have been taken from an Austrian folk song and the finale effective with its involved themes and joyful conclusion. The rendition was delightful in every detail and the orchestra won long applause.

After the intermission Mr. Kreisler made his first appearance of a series of eight in Ernest Schelling's new concerto for violin and orchestra. The audience last night had the distinction of being the first to hear this work, for it was composed for Mr. Kreisler as recently as the past summer. It is not a long [illegible] is brilliant and difficult in many features. It is highly ambitious but nothing possesses too much of that quality to daunt this violinist of the highest rank. It is undoubtedly, as Mr. Kreisler says, an important contribution to the literature of the violin, and it will be heard with distinct pleasure wherever it is played. Mr. Kreisler was at his best in his work and roused his audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm though not a few probably prefer to hear him in recital, where the violin is not drowned in the orchestra volume.

The closing number was Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," a selection of brilliant form, but unusual character, which was received with approval.

The program in order follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto for violin and orchestra..... Schelling

"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6..... Liszt

From the Record
Oct. 21, 1916.

MUSIC NOTES

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 o'clock. The artists will be Madame Frances Alda and Guiseppe de Luca of the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The third pair of Symphony Concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening present as soloist Madame Gadski.

Kreisler, who received a tremendous ovation at the Symphony yesterday, will give his first recital of the season at Symphony Hall Sunday, Oct. 29.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Augmented but otherwise practically unchanged, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will open its 36th season in this city next week. Its prospectus for the six concerts which it will give here contains promise of engaging soloists, and the vital fact that Providence will get the same orchestra that is heard in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and other large cities of the East.

In spite of reports that Emmy Destinn will be unable to leave Austria, the Symphony announces its disbelief in their truth, and it is hoped that she will arrive in time to sing at the fifth concert on March 6.

While the names of Kreisler and Gabrilowitsch are familiar to all music lovers here, the other soloists are less well known. Ethel Leginska is an English pianist who is playing this year for the first time with the orchestra. Irma Seydel is the daughter of one of the members of the orchestra. As those who heard her here at an Arion concert last season will testify, she is young, attractive and an admirable artist. She has played a number of times with the orchestra with success.

Susan Miller is a Virginian who is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice. She is the first pupil entirely trained by Mme. Marcella Sembrich to be launched into professional life. Her appearance here will be her second as a professional, the first taking place with the orchestra in Cambridge a fortnight earlier.

The general sale of season tickets, which have not been taken up by subscription, will open at Seddon's news stand in the Butler Exchange to-morrow morning.

* * *

Prof. John P. Marshall of Boston University, who has been the official organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1909, will give a free lecture in Sayles Hall, Brown University, on Friday evening at 8 o'clock, upon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert on Oct. 17. In addition to the discussion of the works to be played on this occasion, Prof. Marshall will discuss the orchestra, mentioning the functions of the different instruments; also the work of the conductor, and other interesting features of orchestral routine.

STAR
BALTIMORE, MD
OCT 11 1916
LYRIC

Public subscription sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress since last Monday with most excellent results and the season of 1916-1917 promises in every respect to be on a par with that of 1915-16, which was a record. The five concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theater, some as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The soloists announced, in the order in which they will appear, are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. To be sure there is doubt about the appearance of Mme. Destinn. Even through the American Embassy at Vienna it has been impossible to get word to or from this famous Bohemian singer who, by all accounts, has been taken into custody by the Austrian government, or at least, interned; but "much water may flow under a bridge" between now and March 1 when Miss Destinn is scheduled to appear here, and it is hoped by that time she will arrive safely in America.

From the Advertiser
Oct. 21, 1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS LESS WARLIKE

CHARM ASCRIBED TO ITS SINCERITY

Chausson's Work Consists of But Three Movements—Is Earnest and Sombre

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

Program
Chausson—Symphony in B-flat.
Wagner—"Faust" overture.
Schelling—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler
Brahms—"Academic" overture.

A concert by no means so warlike as the opening one, and rather too strenuous for the average public. Chausson's Symphony might teach a lesson to the moderns, for it is a good deal shorter than Korngold's "Sinfonietta," being of three movements only. It has no Scherzo and is never in a playful mood. It is earnest, even sombre, almost throughout, yet in spite of this it is not monotonous, for Chausson has the art of working up his climaxes with real fervor, and these lost none of their power in the hands of Dr. Muck.

The second movement seems to suggest tragedy in almost every part, yet the sombre passages are contrasted with moments of ineffable tenderness and nothing seems forced or overstrained.

The Finale speaks of triumph and in its development of figures recalls Chausson's teacher, Cesar Franck. It is a little three-noted figure (D, B-flat, A, descending) which plays an important role in this last movement, and there is also a chorale-like theme which is very lofty. The trumpet-playing in the finale was inspiring, and the work was read with a freedom that suited well to its impressionist style.

The charm of the symphony lies in its sincerity. One may doubt the honesty of several of the moderns, but no such doubt ever attaches to the music of Chausson. It rings true from beginning to end. There is here an enforced style and a nobility that compel admiration, even from those who do not fully comprehend the work. But, after all, it is "musician's music," and cannot convey its message to the general public, even though it was greatly applauded at this performance.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," was finely given, but after all it does not seem the Faust of Goethe. Amid all the many compositions which the poem-play has inspired one can only think of Schumann as coming somewhere near to the poet's conception. To be sure Liszt's "Marguerite" and his ethical idea of Mephistopheles must not be forgotten, and we must also remember Berlioz, who refused to follow Goethe in the final salvation of his hero, and sent him to the subterranean winter resort, but the character of this hero yet remains to be revealed in music. Wagner presents us with a very dissatisfied gentleman, but the Faust who betrayed Gretchen is not in evidence, in fact there is almost nothing feminine in the work.

It was beautifully played, although to add the darkness of Wagner to the sombreness of Chausson was beginning to make matters rather dismal.

Mr. Schelling's new work is an echo of—Schelling. That is the modern vein of his previous compositions is strongly present. Its brevity is commendable, the composer not being led into prolixity by the demon of variations (who has even led Beethoven and Brahms into garrulity) and the succinct and earnest style of the composition may be cordially recognized. The concerto has its technical difficulties—a great many of them—but it was played by an artist by whom difficulties are easily conquered—Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

The reception of this violinist proved how thoroughly Boston recognizes his leading rank. It was an ovation, both before and after the concerto. But before it was a greeting, after it was a tribute to great and artistic work. But we cannot consider the composition a masterpiece. It is in a single movement, but changes of tempo give to it the essence of a regular three-movement concerto. It is too continuously in the high positions and also too constantly pianissimo until near the end. Only at the finale is there a touch of Spanish dash and tambourine and castagnettes add their tropical flavor to the score.

But it is only fair to add that the public did not agree with the critic's verdict and called Mr. Schelling as well as Mr. Kreisler out again and again.

Brahm's "Academic Overture" never grows stale. The genial working up of college melodies is a tribute to the student's muse which is quite unique in the musical repertoire. And Beethoven himself never used the bassoons better than they are employed in passages of this work. But nothing new can be said of a composition which every musical Bostonian knows and which is always played by our orchestra in a flawless manner. Therefore, the concert, which began tragically and with sombre thoughts, ended with geniality, combined with intellectuality. It was high time to relax a little.

n EVENING GLOBE
ress: New York City
OCT 19 19

The programme for the first Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall this season, Thursday evening, Nov. 2, will be the same with which the Boston season of the orchestra opened Oct. 13 and 14. It includes the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's overture "The Corsair"; Liszt's "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." For Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4, the programme includes Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra," and Brahms's "Variations on a Chorale by Josef Haydn."

From the
Herald
Oct. 21, 1916.

CHAUSSON WORK PERFORMED AT SYMPHONY HALL

Orchestra Gives Superb Interpretation of Interesting Composition — Wagner's Faust Overture Also Played—Mr. Kreisler's Playing Greatly Enjoyed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Chausson, Symphony in b-flat major; Wagner, A Faust overture; Schelling, concerto for violin and orchestra (first time in Boston; Mr. Kreisler, violinist); Brahms, Academic Festival overture.

Chausson's Symphony has not been performed here since Mr. Gericke conducted it ten years ago last January. It is surprising that the Symphony has been so neglected. Chausson was a pupil of Cesar Franck. The influence of that great composer is plainly observed in his pupil's music. In the first movement of the Symphony there is practically a quotation from the Symphony of Franck. Chausson was also under the spell of Wagner. This is to be observed in the second movement of the Symphony. All this is natural and to be expected. Chausson, a rich man, and at first an amateur, not satisfied with the routine instruction at the Paris Conservatory, studied with Franck. That he should have escaped the influence of that master would have argued poorly for his future. But Chausson was by no means a slavish imitator. He had much to say for himself in his own way.

The prevailing characteristic of this Symphony is a gentle melancholy that is neither depressing nor irritating. The mood is not lugubrious; it is not pessimistic. The mood of the Symphony is that of other works by Chausson, instrumental and vocal. He was enamored of Death and found varied expression of this absorbing theme. Perhaps he had a premonition of his cruel fate. This obsession puts him on a lower plane than that of his master. The sadness Franck expressed in music is that felt by a serene and compassionate soul above the din and the anguish; there is also the triumphant spirt of hope and assurance. The melancholy in Chausson's Symphony is seldom relieved by a light-hearted or aspiring episode.

And in this symphony, noble as it is in its idealism, its refinement, its spirituality, there are pages that betray the pupil, still experimenting, still not wholly sure of his own force. Witness the coda of the first movement. There is not sufficient contrast in mood between the first and second movements. As a work of art, in contents and expression, the first movement is the best. The third is much less significant until the introduction of the sacred hymn, which brings a sonorous and contemplative ending. But even here, in spirit and in technical matters, as in the treatment of the bass, there is the suggestion of Franck reviewing and encouraging the work of his disciple.

Beautiful music, for the most part; music that should be more familiar. This and certain other compositions have been played at Symphony concerts once within the last dozen or fifteen years and then put aside. The audience has had no opportunity of becoming well acquainted with them. In their place we have had endless repetitions of well known compositions: overtures by Weber, symphonies by Mozart and Haydn — the same old symphonies by Haydn. Wagner's "Faust" overture might well stay on the shelf for a while. Would musical righteousness suffer if the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms were not played regularly once in two or three seasons. The years glide by; there is much music; comparatively little of that which is noteworthy in the modern period is as well known as mediocre compositions of the 19th century.

The superb performance of the symphony and the quality of the music itself were fully appreciated by an audience that filled the hall.

Mr. Schelling wrote his concerto for Mr. Kreisler in July and August of this year, but he had the concerto in mind when he was on the Pacific coast. The concerto is not a virtuoso piece in the ordinary sense; music for the display and glory of a violinist. There is no pompous introduction to introduce the gentleman; there is no obsequious accompaniment. The concerto is for the most part a symphonic work in which the solo violin is in the ensemble. Only in the recitatives an episode borrowed from Mr. Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life" (played here last season), does the solo violin have the traditional lead. To us the most fascinating pages of the concerto—Mr. Schelling as a composer is always interesting—are those of the interludes "Lagoon," with its original and charming orchestration

From the
Herald
Oct. 21, 1916.

—the whispering of strings—the variation above mentioned "Fr. Kr.," the dramatic recitatives and the interlude in the Spanish vein. In the last pages—those of the Scottish jig and Spanish folk songs—the orchestration is too heavy, too thick. The orchestration of the opening pages might also be lightened.

These faults can easily be remedied. The finer features of the concerto which show poetic feeling, true imagination and technical skill far outweigh them. Mr. Kreisler displayed his customary facility, verve, beauty of tone, also a spirit of personal friendship and devotion. To him the concerto is a masterpiece. Fortunate the composer that has so brilliant and sympathetic an interpreter.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Schumann, "Rhenish" Symphony; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative (Mme. Gadski); Beethoven, Fuguo for string orchestra, op. 133 (first time at these concerts); Wagner, Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" (Mme. Gadski.)

From the Traveler
Oct. 21, 1916.

Busy Week for Lovers of Music

First of Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon Concerts; Opera Season.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The coming week brings the first concert in the annual series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. It also brings to Boston its first taste of opera, when the Aborn Company on Monday night opens a two weeks' engagement at the Boston Opera House.

For the first of his Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Mr. Mudgett will have for artists Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Giuseppe de Luca, baritone, of the same company. Both artists are well known here and deservedly popular. There will also be an orchestra of Symphony players under Joseph Pasternack to assist. The program will be:

Aria, "Barbiere Cavatina".....Rossini
Mr. De Luca.
(a) Aria from "Carattaco".....Johann Bach
(b) Non so piu (Marriage of Figaro)....Mozart
(c) My Lovely Celia.....Munro
(d) Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
(e) Canzonetta.....John Antonio Perti
Mme. Alda.
(a) Canta il mare.....De Leva
(b) Occhi di fata.....Denza
(c) Serenata ..... Morlacchi
(d) Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi Peccia
(e) Roi d'Ys.....Lalo
Mr. De Luca.
(a) Sinulle (Finnish) (first time)....Merikanto
(b) Margarethlein .....Grieg
(c) Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
(d) Deep River (Negro Folk Song)....Burleigh
(e) Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Aria, "Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi
Mr. De Luca.
(a) L'Automne (first time; dedicated to Mme Alda).....Sibella
(b) Edelweiss (first time).....Fourdrain
(c) Chanson Norvegienne (first time).Fourdrain
(d) Unrequited Love (first time; dedicated to Mme. Alda).....La Forge
(e) Song of the Open (first time; dedicated to Mme. Alda).....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

Dr. Muck's program for the Symphony concerts next week will be: Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony; an excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," with Madame Gadski as soloist; Beethoven's Grand Fugue for string orchestra and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," with Madame Gadski as the soloist.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the artist for the concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 29. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Josef Malkin, 'cellist, will be the artists, Nov. 5.

KREISLER PLAYS NEW CONCERTO WITH SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist, playing for the first time Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra, writen with Mr. Kreisler's artistry in mind, was the feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. If anybody had doubts as to the popularity of the soloist, said doubts must have been removed by the reception accorded him when he came on the stage.

The concerto made a hit. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his composition introduced to the public by such a soloist and such an orchestra. Mr. Kreisler was recalled and recalled and, even though he brought forth the composer to share in the tribute and still later Dr. Muck and the composer, the applause did not cease until the soloist added a couple or more appearances.

After hearing Dr. Muck's reading of the Chausson symphony one wonders more than ever that the Symphony concerts have been deprived of this gem of real music for 10 years. It's a safe prediction that it will be heard again before another 10 years have elapsed. The audience recalled Dr. Muck at its close until he had the players stand and share in the honor.

For full measure Dr. Muck presented Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms's "Academic" overture, both being given in the orchestra's best style.

[25]

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

PASTE OVER

News

Providence, R. I.

OCT 18 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An enthusiastic audience turned out last night to welcome back the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall which began its 36th season here. Although the program was rather short the work was excellently rendered and was of the same timbre associated with this wonderful musical organization for so many years. There were over 100 men in the orchestra which is a great many more than have usually been heard here, this creating an unusually ponderous tonal beauty.

Fritz Kreisler was the soloist and he gave a splendid rendition of Ernest Schelling's new concerto for orchestra and violin which was composed only recently by the distinguished piano virtuoso. The violinist was given a reception that reached ovation proportions and although the concerto appeared to be somewhat labored the delicacy of touch and majesty of interpretation of Kresiler lent, perhaps, an unthought of charm to the piece.

The Symphony Orchestra was never in better form and throughout the entire performance their work was especially meritious. Although the "Eroica" symphony was rather tedious towards the end a quickening of execution saved this from losing interest. Beethoven is always popular and although the present piece is liked by many music lovers it has not the colorful beauty that his more romantic works possesses.

The following program was given:

Symphony No. 8, in E-flat, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Harcia funebre: Adogio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Conrecto for violin and orchestra .... Schelling

"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6... ..... Liszt

The increase in the size of the orchestra is pleasing and the volume of tone, while greater, is none the less sweeted and more delicate even in the forte passages. The reed and string instruments were in excelent spirit last night and perhaps outshone the other units, but the rendition of Liszt's "Mazeppa" was well done all around, each unit blending in creating a beautiful tonal picture. Dr. Muck's conception of the interpretation of this piece is masterful as well as colorful and displays his master wand working out some innovations which were agreeably accepted. The sadly prevailing note is blended with the lighter, the shadow and light properly distributed, with an absence of bizarre effect.

Mr. Kreisler is always a welcome performer in Providence and he was greeted most cordially last evening. Schelling's selection while not susceptible to immediate appreciation, was well interpreted by the master touch of Kreisler. It was really a better rendition than one imagined after a remenberance of some of the passages.

only fami
izt of one for orga out are ren's eces
no-

[illegible]
Boston Evening T[illegible]

From the
Monitor
October 20th

FRITZ KREISLER PLAYS CONCERTO AT UNIVERSITY

Fritz Kreisler, soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra—First Cambridge concert of the orchestra, Karl Muck conducting, Sanders Theater, evening of Oct. 19. The program: Beethoven, third symphony ("Eroica"); Wagner, "Faust" overture; Schelling, concerto for violin and orchestra (Mr. Kreisler assisting); Brahms, "Academic" overture.

In a review of the first performance of the Schelling violin concerto at Providence, R. I., which appeared in The Christian Science Monitor on Wednesday, the composition itself and the general performance were discussed, but detail about the soloist's immediate hand in it was deferred. So much is Mr. Kreisler's playing part and parcel of his music, so strikingly does the violinist make himself one with whatever he interprets, that his reading of the solo part in the Schelling concerto may be said to be precisely as good as the score, no better and no worse. The piece has certain marks of melodic originality, structural variety and rhythmic appeal, and at the same time certain marks of haste in its proportions and in its orchestration that put the violinist both at an advantage and a disadvantage.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date Oct 21/16.

FRITZ KREISLER'S PLANS.

Will Appear Twice This Season in Brooklyn.

An evening with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, is always anticipated with keen interest in Brooklyn as elsewhere. Those who have not already read the announcements of the Brooklyn Institute will be glad to know that such a treat is in store for them. Mr. Kreisler's personality, as well as his art, is attractive, and the two combined never fail to draw a capacity house.

Brooklyn is fortunate in having two opportunities of hearing this distinguished violinist during November, as he is to be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 3, and will appear in recital under Institute auspices on Friday evening, Nov. 17.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date Oct. 22nd OCT

matinee.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, October 30. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance with the Orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Mr. Kreisler will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling. This concerto was written last summer for Mr. Kreisler by Mr. Schelling, and had its first performance anywhere in Providence on Tuesday evening, October 17. Mr. Kreisler played it again in Cambridge last Thursday evening and in Boston Friday afternoon and last evening. He plays it with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. The concerto is in one movement and lasts a little more than fifteen minutes. It might, however, be divided into sections. There is the first allegro vivo, an orthodox symphonic poem; the second, an interlude, followed by a short transitional recitative for violin and two harps, and then an intermezzo; and, finally, a rondo, which has the character of a Spanish jig.

Those who went to the Boston Symphony concerts last winter remember with pleasure the variations for piano and orchestra by Mr. Schelling, which he played. It is interesting to note that he has used two of these variations in this new concerto. The interlude is the fourteenth variation, which is entitled "The Lagoon," and the intermezzo is the sixteenth variation, which is entitled "Kreisler." The other numbers on the program will be Schumann's symphony in E flat major, No. 3; Wagner, "A Faust Overture," and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

From REPUBLICAN

Address: Springfield, Mass.

Date

Fernandez Arbos, for a year concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, suffered so from gout while on his annual tour of the Spanish provinces with his Madrid orchestra that he had to abandon the tour half way. This month he will go to San Sebastian for his summer season, after which he will return to London for the winter.

After Chicago caught a flash of Pom-Pom the pickpocket, in the person of Mitzi, it took out its wallet and begged her to keep the change.

From the
Monitor
Oct. 20,1916.

Far would it be from a performer of this soloist's type to do more or less than fill the role given to him. Accordingly, if the composer is hesitating in the exposition of his opening subject, so will the violinist be a little less than himself at first. But when the interest grows with the presentation and development of subsequent material, then will the artist begin to rise to his full strength. Again, if the composer curtly ends the first division of his piece, the soloist must needs share in the impatience of the music and go headlong at the next task. When the melody of the second division begins to glow, when the barcarolle, the tide-song, or whatever it should be called, gets going, then will the soloist's instrument respond searchingly and rapturously. And lastly, when the rhythms of the third division fell to criss-crossing, and the orchestra voices become merry, merrily comes the response from the solo violin.

housetops and a finely touched young reticence with the poetry and passion of music is more to be desired than fiery young frenzies. It is not so likely to empty with life and the years. H. T. P.

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

AT Cambridge, last evening, Dr. Muck conducted one more of his opening concerts, splitting the halves of his first two programmes, and combining the "Eroica" symphony with three numbers which Cambridge heard in advance of Boston: Wagner's "Faust Overture," a brand new concerto which Ernest Schelling has composed for Mr. Kreisler (who played the solo part), and finally the "Academic Overture" of Brahms.

Since Ernest Schelling delighted his hearers with his "Variations" last December, his creative faculties have not been idle. Amid the general "recuperation" of musicians in Maine during the summer, he has composed, or, more precisely, strung together a concerto for the benefit of Mr. Kreisler, which Mr. Kreisler in turn played in such a way as to confirm the capabilities of both Mr. Schelling and himself. What Mr. Schelling calls a "Concerto" has no serious or formal pretensions. It starts off as a symphony, becomes a "reverie," borrows a couple of the Variations aforesaid and winds up, suite-like, with a Scottish jig and a Spanish dance. Mr. Schelling is not of those who try to shake the foundation of things. He is genial, informal, and now and then, inconsequential. We must take him as such—or not at all. He introduced Mr. Kreisler in the accepted obbligato style, and showed immediately that he knows at least as much of violin technique as of orchestral technique. Of the "Lagoon," of the variation devoted to Kreisler—both worked over from the music of last year—and of the dances there is little to be said. Each is a pleasing little violin piece in itself, having no apparent connection with anything else, and of the sort eminently useful for encores and records. Mr. Kreisler, as usual, played the most difficult passages with the quiet ease which is the acme of technique. As usual, he delighted his audience with the beauty of his tone and execution, even in the "dry" runs, arpeggios, and other stock feats. In the fragmentary dances he missed no rhythmic possibility, although he had much to cope with in the Spanish Ritornello, strangely over-loaded with syncopation. Dr. Muck obviously worked hard and conscientiously to keep up his end of the matter, and succeeded. He was called upon to supply thick layers of background and exotic atmosphere, and at moments to make his orchestra prominent, but not at the expense of the soloist.

Once more under Dr. Muck's leading, the "Eroica" symphony moved in a performance of perfection, fire and deep interpretation. Having accomplished his marvels in rehearsal the conductor can afford to be confident over public performance; survey it as well as lead it—in the freedom for example that he allows the orchestra in the scherzo—yet not once relax his keenness for detail or the play of that penetrating transmitting force over music and performance, and audience as well, which is lamely named "reading" whereas it is nearer revelation. Revelation, unmistakable, of Beethoven's free, independent, universal mind even when the spirit of the French Revolution suggested his symphony and the warlike years that followed inflected the music. Perhaps, indeed, the "Eroica" is a remarkable example of the misapplied ideals of a seclusive genius. In it Beethoven exalted the martial spirit as the spirit of deliverance, only to find that this same militarism was destroying the universal freedom which he hoped it would attain. Beethoven did not make patriotism an ultimate ideal, nor did the militant expression of patriotism mean anything to him (witness his "Battle" Symphony). He loved and believed in humanity, and not in his own people at the expense of everyone else; he believed in a common ideal and not a partisan ideal in deadlock with another; he believed in universal brotherhood and not in mutually exhausting hatred; he believed in a universal God, and not a God who backs one side against another. In all the days of the Napoleonic war, ante-type in a way of the present conflict, there was no such idealist as he. J. N. B.

From the
Boston Post
Oct.21,1916.

KREISLER PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

Divides Honors With Composer at the Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Fritz Kreisler was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He played for the first time in Boston the new violin concerto which Ernest Schelling, the pianist, composed, with thought of Mr. Kreisler as the performer, last summer at Bar Harbor.

From the Monitor
Oct. 21,1916.

KREISLER SOLOIST PLAYS SCHELLING WORK IN BOSTON

Second pair of concerts by Boston Symphony orchestra, Fritz Kreisler, soloist, Oct. 20 and 21, 1916. The program: Chausson, symphony in B flat major, op. 20; Wagner, a Faust overture; Schelling, concerto for violin and orchestra (first time in Boston); Brahms, "Academic Festival" overture.

The second program of the season divided itself at once logically, naturally and unostentatiously into the two kinds of music that must always be evident among us—the music of the past and the music of the present. Wagner and Brahms slipped easily into the category of the music that was. Chausson and Schelling were emphatically the exponents of present musical thought, the Frenchman being easily classified further among those who find romance in tonal writing and the American among those who would indicate in sound the storm, stress, repose and ease of everyday life.

The Chausson symphony is a favorite with audiences in the middle West; so familiar, indeed, that it is placed among the numbers brought forward for popular concerts. It has been many years since it has been heard in Boston, but if the applause of the Friday afternoon audience can be taken as a criterion, the symphony may become as well liked here as by western audiences. The presentation of the few ideas it sets forth is accomplished skillfully, of course, as was to be expected from a pupil of César Franck. While the master was concerned, however, with the exposition of the fundamentals of human thought and feeling, the pupil was more restricted in his inspiration and his paucity of deep feeling is reflected in barreness of invention. Chausson's joy is not the true, free, vivid outpouring that will not be denied. His grief is not the deep, barren, bewildered hopelessness that must wail its anguish. His emotions are more the surface sort, as if he had said: "Come now, I will write a symphony. I will write of joy for a time, and then of sorrow and then I will pass to something else." Calculating thus, he cannot stir with his music a response in his hearers.

Unusual approbation was meted out to Mr. Kreisler and the concerto. A review of this piece appeared in The Christian Science Monitor after its first performance in Providence Tuesday night and it was again noted after the Cambridge performance. It is eminently the sort of music to reconcile Dr. Muck to having a soloist at his concert, for as Mr. Schelling has written it, the conductor has simply one more musician, and, in the case of Mr. Kreisler, a consummate artist, added to his band. The soloist was recalled many times. The applause mounted even higher for the composer and continued long after soloist, composer and conductor had appeared hand-in-hand to acknowledge the approval of the audience.

The academic overture of Brahms, familiar and well liked in Boston, was played with snap and crispness well suited to a vigorous last word, supposing the conductor wished to present a brief for the music of the well-tried past in contradistinction to the somewhat vague and uncharted present.

From the
Boston Post
Oct. 21,1916,

WORTH WHILE MUSIC

This concerto had an immediate and unconditional success. It is a delightful work, delightful in the piquancy of the ideas and the skill and taste with which they are treated. The part corresponding to a slow movement is based on two of the variations from Mr. Schelling's former composition, "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme." The final section is an admirable suggestion of a scene in a Spanish cafe, where Mr. Schelling listened to the strumming of guitars and the singing of folk songs.

Harmonically the concerto is always interesting and original, without the scheme of dissonance being overdone. The violin part, thanks in part, perhaps, to Mr. Kreisler, appears to be written effectively, and this is equally true—much to the credit of Mr. Schelling—of the orchestral score.

One would shudder to think of this score in hands less capable than those of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony. But a most interesting score it is, not only as regards instrumentation and manipulation of melodic ideas, but also as concerns rhythm. It was given a rendering past praise for the unity of conception on the part of conductor and soloist, and for the admirable performance of Mr. Kreisler. No wonder there was applause. First Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler responded. Later these two were joined by Mr. Schelling, who was also present and the three men bowed from the platform.

As regards melody, structural arrangement, and for the greater part harmony also Chausson's symphony is whole cloth of Franck. Yet is has certain qualities which are grateful and are evidently individual with the composer. By virtue of the nobility and sincerity of this symphony, the tenderness and idealism of its expression, the unassuming simplicity and the unmistakable feeling for the architecture which is the soul of symphonic music, one regrets, indeed, the untoward accident which killed Chausson in 1899, in his 44th year, and deprived him of his future as a musician.

[26]

From the BOSTON POST Oct. 22,1916/

Mme. Frances Alda, the famous soprano, who has made her first visit to Boston with the intention of singing at the first of the Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Photo by Rain News Service.

From the
Herald
Oct.22,1916.

FIRST SUNDAY CONCERT

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. The artists will be Mme. Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe de Luca of the same institution. Mme. Alda, the wife of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, is one of the principal lyric sopranos of the company and a distinguished singer in every sense of the word. In addition to being an experienced opera singer, she is skilled in concert work. Giuseppe de Luca was a newcomer to the Metropolitan Opera Company last year. He brought to this country the reputation of being one of the foremost Italian baritones. A part of his career has been spent in Russia. Mr. de Luca is a brother of Pio de Luca, musical director of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, and instructor of music in the parochial schools of the archdiocese of Boston. Mr. de Luca, the baritone, made a favorable impression last season as Figaro and Rigoletto.

Aria, "Barbiere Cavatina".....Rossini
Mr. De Luca.
Aria from "Carattaco".....Johann Bach
"Non so piu'".....Mozart
My Lovely Celia.....Munro
Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
Carizonetta.....Perti
Mme. Alda.
Canta il mare.....De Leva
Occhi di' fata.....Denza
Serenata.....Morlacchi
Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi Peccia
Air from "Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Mr. De Luca.
Sinulle.....Merikanto
Margarethlein.....Grieg
Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
Deep River.....Burleigh
Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda.
Aria, "Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi
Mr. De Luca.
L'Automne.....Sibella
Edelweiss.....Fourdrain
Chanson Norvegienne.....Fourdrain
Unrequited Love.....La Forge
Song of the Open.....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

THIRD PAIR OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the third pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon, October 27 and Saturday evening, October 28, Mme. Gadski will sing. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish." This has not been played here since 1910 when Mr. Fiedler gave a Schumann program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. The second half of the program contains a long excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde" which Mme. Gadski will sing. This is Isolde's narrative to Braengane of how the Cornish knight came to Ireland to woo her for King Mark. The second is Beethoven's Grand Fugue for string orchestras, Opus 133, which has been played in Boston once by the Kneisel Quartet. The final number will be the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," Mme. Gadski will sing the Liebestod. The program as it stands reads: Schumann, Symphony in E flat No. 3; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative, "Tristan und Isolde," Beethoven, Grand Fugue for string orchestra and Wagner's Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The third Sunday concert in Symphony Hall, Nov. 5, will bring Alma Gluck, who returns to the concert stage after a year's absence. Associated with her will be Josef Malkin, the 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Madame Gluck appears four times on the program and Mr. Malkin twice.

From the
GLOBE
Oct.23,1916.

SUNDAY CONCERT

Popular Afternoon Series Resumed

Mme Alda and Mr de Luca Contribute Program

Mme Alda and Mr de Luca, both of the Metropolitan Opera House, began yesterday another series of the Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall. Mme Alda has been heard on various occasions both in opera and concert. Mr de Luca first visited Boston last April. Yesterday was his first appearance here in concert.

The audience is indebted to Mme Alda and to the counsels of Mr La Forge, her accompanist, for some groups of rare and beautiful songs. The first bore the title of Aria from Caratacco, and opposite stood the name of Johann Bach. Now there were no less than 24 Johann Bachs, whose deeds brought more or less fame. The composer of this work was Johann Christian Bach, born at Leipzig in 1735, the 11th son of the great Johann Sebastian, the youngest of those who survived his father, and probably the best known of them excepting his brother Emanuel, with whom he studied in Berlin, Johann Ch was known as the Milanese or English Bach.

He is credited with a "certain gayety of disposition" ascribed by some to "his acquaintance with Italian singers. He went to Milan in 1754, studied, served as organist at the Cathedral for two years, then came to London and began to produce opera. We read that in 1767 he married the singer Cecilia Grassi and brought out his "Caratacco." The air is in the agreeably superficial manner which it is said gave pleasure to the Neapolitans, and no less to the Royal Family in London to which he was music master.

Franco Faccio, the composer of the "Sortita d'Ofelia," wrote his opera on the subject of Hamlet to a libretto by Boito, who was his friend. The music is not of striking inspiration. As a conductor he won greater fame. The first European performances of Verdi's "Aida" and "Othello," both at Milan, were under his direction. Perti's sprightly "Carizonetta" does not suggest his title as one of the most distinguished composers for the church of the 17th century.

Mme Alda's final group, all five marked "first time," the first and last two dedicated to her, were admirably suited to a lyric voice, yet varied. Sibella's hauntingly sombre "L'Automne," Fourdrain's gracious "Edelweiss" and "Chanson Norvegienne" of folk character and the two unpublished songs by Mr La Forge, "Unrequited Love" and "Song of the Open," the first with its fine, long, melodic line, and both ending with a sustained flight into the upper and noticeably best part of Mme Alda's voice.

During the last three years a marked gain in the means of interpretation has come into Mme Alda's singing. She showed yesterday results of expert guidance in making points of emphasis and contrast in a song, particularly in the last group, and probably in Mr La Forge's songs most of all. The voice itself shows clearness and, in the fullest tones, warmth.

A constriction which stifles quality and lowers pitch is becoming chronic through the medium. This is less regretable when Mme Alda's singing has the spontaneity which it had for example in Massenet's "Ouvre tes jeux." Mr La Forge was again the accompanist of unobtrusive but rare powers.

Mr de Luca afforded pleasure by the admirable use of a baritone voice which must have possessed beauty by nature and has been well schooled. It is to be hoped he will continue to avoid the vociferous tendencies bred in opera houses. He was not a singer of distinctive variety in the familiar aria of Figaro, nor deeply emotional in Renato's "Eri tu," but his style is admirable and spontaneous, diction flexible and clear, and his mastery of the mezza di voce a model for many of his following.

His program included the transposed aria of Mylio, a tenor role, from the first scene of the third act of Lalo's "Roi D'ys." Mr de Luca was enthusiastically applauded, and besought for more added numbers than he gave. There was an audience of good size.

From the
BOSTON GLOBE
Oct.22,1916

Sunday Matinee Concerts Begin Today in Symphony Hall

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The artists will be Mme Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe de Luca of the same institution. Mme Alda, the wife of Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, is one of the principal lyric sopranos of the company and her appearances here last spring won for her warm praise.

Giuseppe de Luca was a newcomer to the Metropolitan Opera Company last year. He brought to this country the reputation of being one of the foremost Italian baritones of our time. A considerable part of his career had been spent in Russia where he shared the honors and favor of the Russian court with his colleague, the great Italian baritone, Battistini.

Mr de Luca is a brother of Pio de Luca, musical director of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, and instructor of music in the parochial schools of the Archdiocese of Boston. It will be remembered that the baritone made a success here last season, principally as Figaro in "The Barber of Seville," and Rigoletto in Verdi's opera of the same name.

Mme Alda will sing three groups of songs. The first will include selections from Bach, Mozart, Munro, Faccio and Perti. In the second Merikanto's "Sinulle" and Coleridge-Taylor's "Life and Death" will be sung. The closing group is composed entirely of "first time" songs, those by La Forge and Libella being dedicated to Mme Alda. Two by Fourdain complete the list.

Mr de Luca's contributions will include Rossini's aria, "Barbiere Cavatina," an aria from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera" and pieces by de Leva, Denza, Morlacchi, Buzzi Pecca and Lalo.

Third Pair of Boston Symphony Concerts

The third pair of Symphony concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening present as soloist Mme Gadski. The Symphony will be Schumann's third, known as the "Rhenish." This has not been played here since the first concert in the season of 1910-1911, when Mr Fiedler gave a Schumann program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Dr Muck since he has been in Boston has conducted only one of the Schumann Symphonies, that in B-flat. Twice he was ready to play the D minor and both times he was ill and it had to be conducted by the assistant conductor.

The second half of the program contains two works new to Symphony audiences. The first is a long excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," which Mme Gadski will sing. This is Isolde's narrative to Brangane of how the Cornish knight came to Ireland to woo her for King Mark.

The second is Beethoven's Fugue for String Orchestra, op. 133. This has been played in Boston once by the Kneisel Quartet, but it is doubtful whether it has been played yet in America by an orchestra.

The final number will be the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," Mme Gadski soloist.

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital at the second of the series of Sunday concerts at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. His principal numbers will be the A minor concerto of Bach, and a concerto in E minor by the Russian, Jules Conus. There will also be two groups of short pieces by Mr Kreisler's favorite 17th and 18th century composers.

From .....

Address: New York City

Schlimm für Bostoner.

Bühnenarbeiter der Philadelphiaer Musik-Akademie bilden Union.

Philadelphia, 17. Okt. Die Kapitulation des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters vor der organisierten Arbeiterschaft und die Aufgabe seines unionfeindlichen Standpunktes ist in Bälde zu erwarten. Dieser Tage haben sich nämlich die Bühnenarbeiter, die Schreiner, Elektriker und die Hilfskräfte der hiesigen Musikakademie, des letzten Nicht-Unionhauses, das den Bostonern noch offen stand, zu einer Union zusammengeschlossen. Voraussichtlich werden sie jedoch in diesem Jahre noch nicht der Leitung der Musikakademie ihr Ultimatum überreichen, so daß die Bostoner in diesem Winter ihre Kontrakte noch erfüllen können.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist das einzige größere Orchester, das noch nicht der American Federation of Musicians angeschlossen ist. Die Mitglieder der Symphonie-Orchester New Yorks und Philadelphias, sowie der großen Orchester in Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Cincinnati und Minneapolis gehören sämtlich der Musiker-Union an.

From the Journal
Oct.23,1916.

ALDA AND DE LUCCA IN SUNDAY CONCERT

Two members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mme. Alda, the soprano, and Giuseppe de Luca, the barytone, were the soloists yesterday at the first of the Sunday afternoon musicales to be given at Symphony Hall.

Mme. Alda was content to sing comparatively simple songs in various languages, including two written by her accomplished accompanist, Frank La Forge, and her singing was applauded warmly. Mr. de Luca not only sang many popular Italian songs, but he offered two of the most brilliant arias in his repertoire, the famous "Largo al Factotum," from the "Barber of Seville," and the hardly less celebrated "Eri Tu," from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera." He proved again that he is one of the foremost singers of the times.

Fritz Kreisler's recital will be the attraction at Symphony Hall next Sunday.

[27]

From the BOSTON POST Oct. 22,1916/

Mme. Frances Alda, the famous soprano, who has made her first visit to Boston with the intention o... singing at the first of the Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Photo by Bain News Service.

From the Herald Oct.22,1916.

FIRST SUNDAY CONCERT

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. The artists will be Mme. Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe de Luca of the same institution. Mme. Alda, the wife of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, is one of the principal lyric sopranos of the company and a distinguished singer in every sense of the word. In addition to being an experienced opera singer, she is skilled in concert work. Giuseppe de Luca was a newcomer to the Metropolitan Opera Company last year. He brought to this country the reputation of being one of the foremost Italian baritones. A part of his career has been spent in Russia. Mr. de Luca is a brother of Pio de Luca, musical director of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, and instructor of music in the parochial schools of the archdiocese of Boston. Mr. de Luca, the baritone, made a favorable impression last season as Figaro and Rigoletto.

Aria, "Barbiere Cavatina".....Rossini
Mr. De Luca.
Aria from "Carattaco".....Johann Bach
"Non so pin".....Mozart
My Lovely Celia.....Munro
Sortita d'Ofelia.....Faccio
Carizonetta.....Perti
Mme. Alda.
Canta il mare.....De Leva
Occhi di' fata.....Denza
Serenata.....Mocchi
Sulla Laguna.....Buzzi Peccia
Air from "Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Mr. De Luca.
Sinulle.....Merikanto
Margarethlein.....Grieg
Erstes Begegnen.....Grieg
Deep River.....Burleigh
Life and Death.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mme. Alda
Aria, "Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi
Mr. De Luca.
L'Automne.....Sibella
Edelweiss.....Fourdrain
Chanson Norvegienne.....Fourdrain
Unrequited Love.....La Forge
Song of the Open.....La Forge
Mme. Alda.

THIRD PAIR OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the third pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon, October 27 and Saturday evening, October 28, Mme. Gadski will sing. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish." This has not been played here since 1910 when Mr. Fiedler gave a Schumann program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. The second half of the program contains a long excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde" which Mme. Gadski will sing. This is Isolde's narrative to Braengane of how the Cornish knight came to Ireland to woo her for King Mark. The second is Beethoven's Grand Fugue for string orchestras, Opus 133, which has been played in Boston once by the Kneisel Quartet. The final number will be the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." Mme. Gadski will sing the Liebestod. The program as it stands reads: Schumann, Symphony in E flat No. 3; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative, "Tristan und Isolde;" Beethoven, Grand Fugue for string orchestra and Wagner's Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The third Sunday concert in Symphony Hall, Nov. 5, will be Alma Gluck, who returns to the concert stage after a year's absence. Associated with her will be Jose Mojica, the tenor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Madame Gluck appears four times in the program and Mr. Mojica twice.

From the GLOBE Oct.22,1916.

SUNDAY CONCERT

Popular Afternoon Series Resumed

Mme Alda and Mr de Luca Contribute Program

Mme Alda and Mr de Luca, both of the Metropolitan Opera House, began yesterday another series of the Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall. Mme Alda has been heard on various occasions both in opera and concert. Mr de Luca first visited Boston last April. Yesterday was his first appearance here in concert.

The audience is indebted to Mme Alda and to the counsels of Mr La Forge, her accompanist, for some groups of rare and beautiful songs. The first bore the title of Aria from Caratacco, and opposite stood the name of Johann Bach. Now there were no less than 24 Johann Bachs, whose deeds brought more or less fame. The composer of this work was Johann Christian Bach, born at Leipzig in 1735, the 11th son of the great Johann Sebastian, the youngest of those who survived his father, and probably the best known of them excepting his brother Emanuel, with whom he studied in Berlin. Johann Ch was known as the Milanese or English Bach.

He is credited with a "certain gayety of disposition" ascribed by some to "his acquaintance with Italian singers. He went to Milan in 1754, studied, served as organist at the Cathedral for two years, then came to London and began to produce opera. We read that in 1767 he married the singer Cecilia Grassi and brought out his "Caratacco." The air is in the agreeably superficial manner which it is said gave pleasure to the Neapolitans, and no less to the Royal Family in London to which he was music master.

Franco Faccio, the composer of the "Sortita d'Ofelia," wrote his opera on the subject of Hamlet to a libretto by Boito, who was his friend. The music is not of striking inspiration. As a conductor he won greater fame. The first European performances of Verdi's "Aida" and "Othello," both at Milan, were under his direction. Perti's sprightly "Carizonetta" does not suggest his title as one of the most distinguished composers for the church of the 17th century.

Mme Alda's final group, all five marked "first time," the first and last two dedicated to her, were admirably suited to a lyric voice, yet varied. Sibelia's hauntingly sombre "L'Automne," Fourdrain's gracious "Edelweiss" and "Chanson Norvegienne" of folk character and the two unpublished songs by Mr La Forge, "Unrequited Love" and "Song of the Open," the first with its fine, long, melodic line, and both ending with a sustained flight into the upper and noticeably best part of Mme Alda's voice.

During the last three years a marked gain in the means of interpretation has come into Mme Alda's singing. She showed yesterday results of expert guidance in making points of emphasis and contrast in a song, particularly in the last group, and probably in Mr La Forge's songs most of all. The voice itself shows clearness and, in the fullest tones, warmth.

A constriction which stifles quality and lowers pitch is becoming chronic through the medium. This is less regretable when Mme Alda's singing has the spontaneity which it had for example in Massenet's "Ouvre tes jeux." Mr La Forge was again the accompanist of unobtrusive but rare powers.

Mr de Luca afforded pleasure by the admirable use of a baritone voice which must have possessed beauty by nature and has been well schooled. It is to be hoped he will continue to avoid the vociferous tendencies bred in opera houses. He was not a singer of distinctive variety in the familiar aria of Figaro, nor deeply emotional in Renato's "Eri tu," but his style is admirable and spontaneous, diction flexible and clear, and his mastery of the mezza di voce a model for many of his following.

His program included the transposed aria of Mylio, a tenor role, from the first scene of the third act of Lalo's "Roi D'ys." Mr de Luca was enthusiastically applauded, and besought for more added numbers than he gave. There was an audience of good size.

Sunday Matinee Concerts Begin Today in Symphony Hall

The first of the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The artists will be Mme Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Giuseppe de Luca of the same institution. Mme Alda, the wife of Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, is one of the principal lyric sopranos of the company and her appearances here last spring won for her warm praise.

Giuseppe de Luca was a newcomer to the Metropolitan Opera Company last year. He brought to this country the reputation of being one of the foremost Italian baritones of our time. A considerable part of his career had been spent in Russia where he shared the honors and favor of the Russian court with his colleague, the great Italian baritone, Battistini.

Mr de Luca is a brother of Pio de Luca, musical director of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, and instructor of music in the parochial schools of the Archdiocese of Boston. It will be remembered that the baritone made a success here last season, principally as Figaro in "The Barber of Seville," and Rigoletto in Verdi's opera of the same name.

Mme Alda will sing three groups of songs. The first will include selections from Bach, Mozart, Munro, Faccio and Perti. In the second Merikanto's "Sinulle" and Coleridge-Taylor's "Life and Death" will be sung. The closing group is composed entirely of "first time" songs, those by La Forge and Libella being dedicated to Mme Alda. Two by Fourdain complete the list.

Mr de Luca's contributions will include Rossini's aria, "Barbiere Cavatina," an aria from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera" and pieces by de Leva, Denza, Morlacchi, Buzzi Pecca and Lalo.

Third Pair of Boston Symphony Concerts

The third pair of Symphony concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening present as soloist Mme Gadski. The Symphony will be Schumann's third, known as the "Rhenish." This has not been played here since the first concert in the season of 1910-1911, when Mr Fiedler gave a Schumann program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Dr Muck since he has been in Boston has conducted only one of the Schumann Symphonies, that in B-flat. Twice he was ready to play the D minor and both times he was ill and it had to be conducted by the assistant conductor.

The second half of the program contains two works new to Symphony audiences. The first is a long excerpt from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," which Mme Gadski will sing. This is Isolde's narrative to Braengane of how the Cornish knight came to Ireland to woo her for King Mark.

The second is Beethoven's Fugue for String Orchestra, op. 133. This has been played in Boston once by the Kneisel Quartet, but it is doubtful whether it has been played yet in America by an orchestra.

The final number will be the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," Mme Gadski soloist.

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere

Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital at the second of the series of Sunday concerts at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. His principal numbers will be the A minor concerto of Bach, and a concerto in E minor by the Russian, Jules Conus. There will also be two groups of short pieces by Mr Kreisler's favorite 17th and 18th century composers.

From

Address: New York City

Date.....

Schlimm für Bostoner.

Bühnenarbeiter der Philadelphiaer Musik-Akademie bilden Union.

Philadelphia, 17. Okt. Die Kapitulation der Bostoner Symphonie-Musiker vor der organisierten Arbeiterschaft und die Aufgabe seines unionfeindlichen Standpunktes ist in Bälde zu erwarten. Dieser Tage haben sich nämlich die Bühnenarbeiter, die Schreiner, Elektriker und die Hilfskräfte der hiesigen Musikakademie, des letzten Nicht-Unionhauses, das den Bostonern noch offen stand, zu einer Union zusammengeschlossen. Voraussichtlich werden sie jedoch in diesem Jahre noch nicht der Leitung der Musikakademie ihr Ultimatum überreichen, so daß die Bostoner in diesem Winter ihre Kontrakte noch erfüllen können.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist das einzige größere Orchester, das noch nicht der American Federation of Musicians angeschlossen ist. Die Mitglieder der Symphonie-Orchester New Yorks und Philadelphias, sowie der großen Orchester in Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Cincinnati und Minneapolis gehören sämtlich der Musiker-Union an.

Oct.23,1916.

ALDA AND DE LUCCA IN SUNDAY CONCERT

Two members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mme. Alda, the soprano, and Giuseppe de Luca, the barytone, were the soloists yesterday at the first of the Sunday afternoon musicales to be given at Symphony Hall.

Mme. Alda was content to sing comparatively simple songs in various languages, including two written by her accomplished accompanist, Frank La Forge, and her singing was applauded warmly. Mr. de Luca not only sang many popular Italian songs, but he offered two of the most brilliant arias in his repertoire, the famous "Largo al Factotum," from the "Barber of Seville," and the hardly less celebrated "Eri Tu," from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera." He proved again that he is one of the foremost singers of the times.

Fritz Kreisler's recital will be the attraction at Symphony Hall next Sunday.

EVENING POST
New York City
OCT 17 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ISOLATED BY UNION LABOR

Last Non-Union House in Which It Can Appear Becomes Unionized —Question for A. F. of L.

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Post.]

PHILADELPHIA, October 17.—Capitulation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent. The cordon of union labor surrounding this orchestra was strengthened this week by the unionizing of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia—the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its appearance. Whether the labor unions associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will subtly issue their ultimatum this year, and force the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear to cancel their contracts, or postpone pressure until the next season, will probably be decided at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, to be held next month at Baltimore.

The Boston Symphony is the only important orchestra not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. The New York Symphony Orchestra under Damrosch, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stowkowski, the Pittsburgh, the St. Louis, the Cincinnati, and the Minneapolis Orchestras are all unionized.

The problem confronting the managers of the houses in which the Boston Symphony has contracted to appear is whether the union carpenters, electricians, and stage men will continue to serve the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The employees of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia have joined the International Alliance of Stage Employees, thereby forging an adamant circle around the Boston Symphony.

The possibility of a strike being called this year was discussed by labor leaders in Philadelphia, but it was agreed that the question of a strike was not a local one; that the matter was one for the chiefs at the annual convention in Baltimore.

"I shall recommend to the chiefs," said Mr. Ben Harrison, president of the Philadelphia local of the International Alliance of Stage Employees and also delegate to the annual convention, "that no action be called against the Academy of Music this year. We don't want to embarrass them. But, of course, if any other union asks our coöperation we shall be ready. The Academy knows that next year all organizations signing up with them must be union organizations, but until next year, we may not do anything."

Mr. Shepherd, local president of the American Federation of Musicians, would say only that "so far as I know, at present, we have no difference of opinion, and nothing in common, with the Academy of Music, in connection with the Boston Symphony."

But, however, it is definitely admitted that no contract has been made with the Academy of Music not to go on strike when the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its initial appearance of the season. The future of the year's schedule of the orchestra is on the knees of the Federation; one year's grace may be granted—or denied.

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
Oct 15, 1916
OCT

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

Laeta Hartley to be Soloist at Concert November 6

The Boston symphony orchestra, with Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, as soloist, will be the attraction for the second in the series of Ellis concerts to be given in the Auditorium Monday evening, November 6. It is fortunate that plans for the Ellis concerts were made last May and the dates determined at that time, for the orchestra is now booked for the entire season, with as many engagements as it is permitted to accept. The orchestra is again under the direction of Dr Karl Muck, having opened its Boston season on Friday. Miss Hartley played with the orchestra several times last season, and was well received wherever she played. The sale of single tickets for this concert will open the 30th at Otto Baab's, but advance orders for tickets will be filled in the order of their receipt.

Mr Ellis came to Springfield with Miss Farrar on Wednesday for the opening concert of his series, and he expressed himself well pleased with the [illegible] concert series [illegible] of Springfield.

News
Providence, R. I.
Oct 7 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The prospectus for the six concerts which the Boston Symphone Orchestra is to give in Infantry hall, Providence, the coming season calls attention to the fact that the general sale of season tickets will open at Seddon's News stand in the Butler Exchange next Monday morning, October 9. There is already a large subscription comprising chiefly renewals of those who subscribed last year. But there is still a wide choice of seats at all prices and, from all indications, interest in the concerts is keener than ever.

The prospectus emphasizes the fact that for the first time in the history of these concerts the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. Heretofore, this has been impossible owing to the limited size of the stage in Infantry Hall, but a movable extension has been built this fall which will give ample room for one hundred musicians and, when it is necessary, the piano besides. This will mean much in the performance of works in the modern repertoire.

There will be a soloist at each concert and the list is one of the usual distinction the Boston Symphony Orchestra provides for this city. The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings and at the first, October 17, the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; at the second, November 21, Susan Millar; at the third, December 26, Irma Seydel; at the fourth, February 6, Osip Gabrilowitsch; at the fifth, March 6, Emmy Destinn; and at the sixth and last, April 10, Ethel Leginska. Three of these are very famous artists very well known here; Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch and Destinn. Regarding the detainment of Miss Destinn in Austria, which has been in the papers recently, reports have been received that this is merely temporary and that she will be here in time for her appearance with the Orchestra in March If it should turn out that she is unable to come, there will be ample time to get an eminent soloist as her substitute.

The other three artists are less well known. Irma Seydel has appeared in Providence in the past and shown here, as elsewhere, that she is a violinist of most unusual talent and artistry. Ethel Leginska who, despite her name is an English woman, is, so to say, the most remarkable find among the women pianists of recent years. She is an extraordinary artist in every sense of the word. Susan Millar is, to all intents and prposes, a debutante, a mezzo-soprano with a voice of unusual warmth and beauty. Miss Millar has been engaged as a debutante for six of the most important concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are: Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

Her appearance here should be an incident of unusual interest for she is the first "complete" pupil that Marcella Sembrich, the greatest mistress of song of our time, [illegible] has daunched into public life. A hearing given to Miss Millar last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, and the warm recomendation of Mme, Sembrich, has resulted in these notable engagements for this young singer. It is expected that she will "make good" in every sense of the word.

The orchestra returns with its personnel little changed and Dr. Muck will this year as in the past four years, be at its head.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 16 19

TO PLAY NEW WORK

Kreisler Will Render Schelling's New Concerto At Boston Symphony Concert.

The public subscription sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress since last Monday with most excellent results, and the season of 1916-1917 promises in every respect to be on a par with that of 1915-1916, which was a record. The five concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre, come as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The soloists announced, in the order in which they will appear, are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. To be sure, there is doubt about the appearance of Mme. Destinn. Even through the American Embassy at Vienna it has been impossible to get word to or from this famous Bohemian singer.

Mr. Kreisler, at the first concert, will play a new Concerto by the distinguished composer and pianist, Ernest Schelling. He plays for the first time in Providence next Tuesday night, October 17. The rehearsals which have been held reveal the work as one of extraordinary melodic beauty and brilliancy.

POST
Washington, D. C.
Oct. 15 th OCT

Season tickets for the five concerts to be given at the National by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now on sale at Droop's music store. The concerts are announced Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13.

The soloists so far announced are Fritz Kreisler, October 31; Miss Susan Millar, November 28; Carl Friedberg, January 2; Emmy Destinn, March 13. This list offers two singers, one pianist and one violinist.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Oct. 17th

UNIONS MAY FIGHT ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Loses Its Last Unorganized Theatre.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 17.—The probability that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only important organization not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, will be forced to submit to unionization appeared today when the stage hands of the Academy of Music here were unionized. The Academy of Music is the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears.

At the annual convention of the A. F. of L. in Baltimore next month it will be decided whether the labor unions associating with the Boston Symphony Orchestra shall compel the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear this year to cancel the contracts or to postpone pressure until next season.

From the
Boston Post
Oct.22,1916.

Saturday evening, Nov. 11, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, with the pieces already specified.

Thursday evening, Nov. 9, at Sanders Theatre, in Cambridge, the second of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, with Miss Susan Millar, trained by Mme. Sembrich, for the assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 10, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck. Brahms' first symphony and Rimski-Korsakoff's oriental suite, "Scheherazade," are the chief items of his programme.

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
OCT 15 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in the New National Theater this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now open at Droop's. These concerts have come to be an important function in the musical and social life of Washington. It is thirty years since they first were given here and, with the exception of an interim of a few years, they have been an annual fixture in this city.

The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Four soloists are announced. For October 31 the assisting artist will be Fritz Kreisler; November 28, Miss Susan Millar; January 2, Carl Friedberg, and March 13, Emmy Destinn. No soloist is yet scheduled for the concert of February 13.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Oct 15th OCT
[illegible] much favor.

The subscription sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress for the past week and is well up to the high average set by recent years. By the time the first concert arrives, October 30, there will be very few seats left of any kind. The dates of the concerts are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12, and the soloists announced are: Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. Of these, Susan Millar and Carl Friedberg are new to Philadelphia.

As usual, M. B. Swaab, violinist, of the Fuller Building, 10 South Eighteenth street, will award several free and part-free violin scholarships this season. Applicants, who must be deserving, may be of any age, either sex, beginner or advanced. This offer will be open from now on till November 11. Mr. Swaab received his musical education in Leipzig, Germany, obtaining his diploma from the famous Royal Conservatory there. He was for a long time violinist with the celebrated Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra, under the conductorship of Arthur Nikisch.

From NEWS
Address: Providence
OCT 11 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts which has been in progress at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange since last Monday promises well for the series, as it is very large. The sale for the first concert, which comes next Tuesday evening, October 17, in Infantry hall, will open at Seddon's next Saturday morning, October 14. As already announced, the soloist at this concert will be Fritz Kreisler.

[28]

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music Monday night, October 30. He plans to play, for the first time in Philadelphia, a new concerto for violin and orchestra, which has been written especially for him by Ernest Schelling. His first recital in Philadelphia is set for Saturday afternoon, November 11, in the Academy of Music.

MUSICAL AMERICA
New York City
OCT 21 1916

THREATENS NON-UNIONISM OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

CAPITULATION of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent, according to a story in the New York Evening Post under a Philadelphia date line. The cordon of union labor surrounding this orchestra was strengthened this week, says the article, by the unionizing of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia—the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its appearance.

Whether the labor unions associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will subtly issue their ultimatum this year, and force the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear to cancel their contracts, or postpone pressure until the next season, will probably be decided at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, to be held next month at Baltimore.

The problem confronting the managers of the houses in which the Boston Symphony has contracted to appear is whether the union carpenters, electricians and stage men will continue to serve the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
OCT 22 1916

THE SECOND ELLIS CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Booked for November 6

The second concert of the Ellis series will be given in the Auditorium of this city on Monday evening, November 6. This will be the first of the two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, which will bring its entire personnel for this purpose. The soloist will be Laeta Hartley, an American pianist, who in the past two years has had several appearances with the Boston symphony orchestra. Miss Hartley is a southern woman and a graduate of the New England conservatory of music. Her training has been entirely in this country. A young woman of much personal attraction, she plays interestingly, her work being praiseworthy for tonal beauty, crispness of touch and musicianship.

Dr Muck has made a very interesting program for this concert. It contains three numbers and will run rather more than an hour and three-quarters. The first number will be Schumann's beautiful "Third Symphony in E-flat," known as the "Rhenish" symphony. The second number will be the brilliant first pianoforte concerto of the Russian, Tschaikowsky, and the final number will be Liszt's thrilling and grandiloquent symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

Tickets for this concert will go on sale at Otto Baab's, Elm street, Monday, October 30, and advance orders will be filled in the order of their receipt.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 22 1916

Schelling's New Concerto to Be Played by Kreisler at Boston Symphony Concert.

The chief point of interest in the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto, by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote, last summer, specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at this concert, this being his only appearance here with orchestra in the coming season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston, Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony Concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes, two variations from his symphonic variations for piano and orchestra which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Kreisler's Coming Recital at the Academy.

An evening with Fritz Kreisler, master violinist, is always anticipated with keen interest in Brooklyn as elsewhere. Mr. Kreisler's personality, as well as his art, is attractive, and the two combined never fail to draw a capacity house. Brooklyn is fortunate in having two opportunities of hearing the violinist during November, as he is to be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 3, and will appear in retical under Institute auspices on Friday evening, November 17.

TRIBUNE
Minneapolis, Minn.
Oct. 15th
OCT 15 1916

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is now carrying out what seems to be the cleverest grand opera idea that has occurred to anybody in a long time. The only grand opera, by artists of absolutely first rank, to be heard before March or April in this country, has been in New York and Chicago. At that time choruses, orchestras and soloists, fatigued from a season of hard work, have been sent out on limited road tours in performances that, in many ways, were not altogether satisfactory. To Mr. Ellis came the inspired thought of having an opera road tour early in the season instead of late, and before the New York and Chicago seasons instead of after. So he gathered together a number of the leading singers of the Metropolitan and Chicago opera companies, assembled a chorus of 60 and an orchestra of the same number, secured Campinini as artistic director and conductor, selected two box-office certainties for his repertoire and is sending this interesting aggregation out through the Middle West for a three weeks' tour in "Carmen" and "Ill Trovatore." The details of the affair will be found in another column on this page.

The results, it seems to me, will be keen musical pleasure at a time when everyone, performers and public alike, are eager and thirsty for music and a net little balance of profit for Mr. Ellis. Let us hope that this balance may be large enough to encourage him to make an annual feature of the autumn tour of the Ellis Opera company, which will appear in the St. Paul Auditorium next Friday and Saturday evenings.

TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 21 1916

Kreisler at Boston Concert.

The great point of interest in the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote last summer specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler, of course, will play it at this concert, this being his only appearance here with orchestra the coming season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes two variations from his Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

1 EVENING POST
ess: New York City
OCT 17 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ISOLATED BY UNION LABOR

Last Non-Union House in Which It Can Appear Becomes Unionized —Question for A. F. of L.

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Post.]

PHILADELPHIA, October 17.—Capitulation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent. The cordon of union labor surrounding this orchestra was strengthened this week by the unionizing of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia—the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its appearance. Whether the labor unions associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will subtly issue their ultimatum this year, and force the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear to cancel their contracts, or postpone pressure until the next season, will probably be decided at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, to be held next month at Baltimore.

The Boston Symphony is the only important orchestra not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. The New York Symphony Orchestra under Damrosch, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stowkowski, the Pittsburgh, the St. Louis, the Cincinnati, and the Minneapolis Orchestras are all unionized.

The problem confronting the managers of the houses in which the Boston Symphony has contracted to appear is whether the union carpenters, electricians, and stage men will continue to serve the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The employees of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia have joined the International Alliance of Stage Employees, thereby forging an adamant circle around the Boston Symphony.

The possibility of a strike being called this year was discussed by labor leaders in Philadelphia, but it was agreed that the question of a strike was not a local one; that the matter was one for the chiefs at the annual convention in Baltimore.

"I shall recommend to the chiefs," said Mr. Ben Harrison, president of the Philadelphia local of the International Alliance of Stage Employees and also delegate to the annual convention, "that no action be called against the Academy of Music this year. We don't want to embarrass them. But, of course, if any other union asks our coöperation we shall be ready. The Academy knows that next year all organizations signing up with them must be union organizations, but until next year, we may not do anything."

Mr. Shepherd, local president of the American Federation of Musicians, would say only that "so far as I know, at present, we have no difference of opinion, and nothing in common, with the Academy of Music, in connection with the Boston Symphony."

But, however, it is definitely admitted that no contract has been made with the Academy of Music not to go on strike when the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its initial appearance of the season. The future of the year's schedule of the orchestra is on the knees of the Federation; one year's grace may be granted—or denied.

1 REPUBLICAN
ess: Springfield, Mass.
Oct. 15, 1916.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

Laeta Hartley to be Soloist at Concert November 6

The Boston symphony orchestra, with Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, as soloist, will be the attraction for the second in the series of Ellis concerts to be given in the Auditorium Monday evening, November 6. It is fortunate that plans for the Ellis concerts were made last May and the dates determined at that time, for the orchestra is now booked for the entire season, with as many engagements as it is permitted to accept. The orchestra is again under the direction of Dr Karl Muck, having opened its Boston season on Friday. Miss Hartley played with the orchestra several times last season, and was well received wherever she played. The sale of single tickets for this concert will open the 30th at Otto Baab's, but advance orders for tickets will be filled in the order of their receipt.

Mr Ellis came to Springfield with Miss Farrar on Wednesday for the opening concert of his series, and he expressed himself as well pleased with the support given his concert series by the music-loving people of Springfield.

News
Providence, R. I.
Oct 7, 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The prospectus for the six concerts which the Boston Symphone Orchestra is to give in Infantry hall, Providence, the coming season calls attention to the fact that the general sale of season tickets will open at Seddon's News stand in the Butler Exchange next Monday morning, October 9. There is already a large subscription comprising chiefly renewals of those who subscribed last year. But there is still a wide choice of seats at all prices and, from all indications, interest in the concerts is keener than ever.

The prospectus emphasizes the fact that for the first time in the history of these concerts the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. Heretofore, this has been impossible owing to the limited size of the stage in Infantry Hall, but a movable extension has been built this fall which will give ample room for one hundred musicians and, when it is necessary, the piano besides. This will mean much in the performance of works in the modern repertoire.

There will be a soloist at each concert and the list is one of the usual distinction the Boston Symphony Orchestra provides for this city. The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings and at the first, October 17, the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; at the second, November 21, Susan Millar; at the third, December 26, Irma Seydel; at the fourth, February 6, Osip Gabrilowitsch; at the fifth, March 6, Emmy Destinn; and at the sixth and last, April 10, Ethel Leginska. Three of these are very famous artists very well known here; Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch and Destinn. Regarding the detainment of Miss Destinn in Austria, which has been in the papers recently, reports have been received that this is merely temporary and that she will be here in time for her appearance with the Orchestra in March. If it should turn out that she is unable to come, there will be ample time to get an eminent soloist as her substitute.

The other three artists are less well known. Irma Seydel has appeared in Providence in the past and shown here, as elsewhere, that she is a violinist of most unusual talent and artistry. Ethel Leginska who, despite her name is an English woman, is, so to say, the most remarkable find among the women pianists of recent years. She is an extraordinary artist in every sense of the word. Susan Millar is, to all intents and prposes, a debutante, a mezzo-soprano with a voice of unusual warmth and beauty. Miss Millar has been engaged as a debutante for six of the most important concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are: Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

Her appearance here should be an incident of unusual interest for she is the first "complete" pupil that Marcella Sembrich, the greatest mistress of song of our time, [illegible] with Maids of America, has daunched into publiic life. A hearing given to Miss Millar last spring by Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, and the warm recomendation of Mme, Sembrich, has resulted in these notable engagements for this young singer. It is expected that she will "make good" in every sense of the word.

The orchestra returns with its personnel little changed and Dr. Muck will this year as in the past four years, be at its head.

n SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 16 19

TO PLAY NEW WORK

Kreisler Will Render Schelling's New Concerto At Boston Symphony Concert.

The public subscription sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress since last Monday with most excellent results, and the season of 1916-1917 promises in every respect to be on a par with that of 1915-1916, which was a record. The five concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre, come as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 14.

The soloists announced, in the order in which they will appear, are Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. To be sure, there is doubt about the appearance of Mme. Destinn. Even through the American Embassy at Vienna it has been impossible to get word to or from this famous Bohemian singer.

Mr. Kreisler, at the first concert, will play a new Concerto by the distinguished composer and pianist, Ernest Schelling. He plays for the first time in Providence next Tuesday night, October 17. The rehearsals which have been held reveal the work as one of extraordinary melodic beauty and brilliancy.

m POST
ress: Washington, D. C.
Oct. 15 th 1916

Season tickets for the five concerts to be given at the National by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now on sale at Droop's music store. The concerts are announced Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13.

The soloists so far announced are Fritz Kreisler, October 31; Miss Susan Millar, November 28; Carl Friedberg, January 2; Emmy Destinn, March 13. This list offers two singers, one pianist and one violinist.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
ate Oct. 17th

UNIONS MAY FIGHT ORCHESTRA.

Boston Symphony Loses Its Last Unorganized Theatre.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 17.—The probability that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only important organization not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, will be forced to submit to unionization appeared today when the stage hands of the Academy of Music here were unionized. The Academy of Music is the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears.

At the annual convention of the A. F. of L. in Baltimore next month it will be decided whether the labor unions associating with the Boston Symphony Orchestra shall compel the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear this year to cancel the contracts or to postpone pressure until next season.

From the
Boston Post
Oct. 22, 1916.

Saturday evening, Nov. 11, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, with the pieces already specified.

Thursday evening, Nov. 9, at Sanders Theatre, in Cambridge, the second of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, with Miss Susan Millar, trained by Mme. Sembrich, for the assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 10, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck. Brahms' first symphony and Rimski-Korsakoff's oriental suite, "Scheherazade," are the chief items of his programme.

EVENING STAR
ss: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in the New National Theater this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now open at Droop's. These concerts have come to be an important function in the musical and social life of Washington. It is thirty years since they first were given here and, with the exception of an interim of a few years, they have been an annual fixture in this city.

The concerts will be given, as in the past, on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30, October 31, November 28, January 2, February 13 and March 13. Four soloists are announced. For October 31 the assisting artist will be Fritz Kreisler; November 28, Miss Susan Millar; January 2, Carl Friedberg, and March 13, Emmy Destinn. No soloist is yet scheduled for the concert of February 13.

rom ENQUIRER
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate Oct 15th

[illegible] favor.

The subscription sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in progress for the past week and is well up to the high average set by recent years. By the time the first concert arrives, October 30, there will be very few seats left of any kind. The dates of the concerts are: October 30, November 27, January 1, February 12 and March 12, and the soloists announced are: Fritz Kreisler, Susan Millar, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Carl Friedberg and Emmy Destinn. Of these, Susan Millar and Carl Friedberg are new to Philadelphia.

As usual, M. B. Swaab, violinist, of the Fuller Building, 10 South Eighteenth street, will award several free and part-free violin scholarships this season. Applicants, who must be deserving, may be of any age, either sex, beginner or advanced. This offer will be open from now on till November 11. Mr. Swaab received his musical education in Leipzig, Germany, obtaining his diploma from the famous Royal Conservatory there. He was for a long time violinist with the celebrated Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra, under the conductorship of Arthur Nikisch.

From NEWS
Address: Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts which has been in progress at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange since last Monday promises well for the series, as it is very large. The sale for the first concert, which comes next Tuesday evening, October 17, in Infantry hall, will open at Seddon's next Saturday morning, October 14. As already announced, the soloist at this concert will be Fritz Kreisler.

[28]

n NORTH AMERICAN
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music Monday night, October 30. He plans to play, for the first time in Philadelphia, a new concerto for violin and orchestra, which has been written especially for him by Ernest Schelling. His first recital in Philadelphia is set for Saturday afternoon, November 11, in the Academy of Music.

m REPUBLICAN
ress: Springfield, Mass.
te

THE SECOND ELLIS CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Booked for November 6

The second concert of the Ellis series will be given in the Auditorium of this city on Monday evening, November 6. This will be the first of the two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, which will bring its entire personnel for this purpose. The soloist will be Laeta Hartley, an American pianist, who in the past two years has had several appearances with the Boston symphony orchestra. Miss Hartley is a southern woman and a graduate of the New England conservatory of music. Her training has been entirely in this country. A young woman of much personal attraction, she plays interestingly, her work being praiseworthy for tonal beauty, crispness of touch and musicianship.

Dr Muck has made a very interesting program for this concert. It contains three numbers and will run rather more than an hour and three-quarters. The first number will be Schumann's beautiful "Third Symphony in E-flat," known as the "Rhenish" symphony. The second number will be the brilliant first pianoforte concerto of the Russian, Tschaikowsky, and the final number will be Liszt's thrilling and grandiloquent symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

Tickets for this concert will go on sale at Otto Baab's, Elm street, Monday, October 30, and advance orders will be filled in the order of their receipt.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Schelling's New Concerto to Be Played by Kreisler at Boston Symphony Concert.

The chief point of interest in the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto, by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote, last summer, specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at this concert, this being his only appearance here with orchestra in the coming season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston, Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony Concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes, two variations from his symphonic variations for piano and orchestra which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Kreisler's Coming Recital at the Academy.

An evening with Fritz Kreisler, master violinist, is always anticipated with keen interest in Brooklyn as elsewhere. Mr. Kreisler's personality, as well as his art, is attractive, and the two combined never fail to draw a capacity house. Brooklyn is fortunate in having two opportunities of hearing the violinist during November, as he is to be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 3, and will appear in retical under Institute auspices on Friday evening, November 17.

MUSICAL AMERICA
New York City
OCT 8 1916

THREATENS NON-UNIONISM OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

CAPITULATION of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to organized labor and a withdrawal from its non-union position are imminent, according to a story in the New York Evening Post under a Philadelphia date line. The cordon of union labor surrounding this orchestra was strengthened this week, says the article, by the unionizing of the stage hands of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia—the last non-union house in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its appearance.

Whether the labor unions associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will subtly issue their ultimatum this year, and force the houses in which the orchestra is scheduled to appear to cancel their contracts, or postpone pressure until the next season, will probably be decided at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, to be held next month at Baltimore.

The problem confronting the managers of the houses in which the Boston Symphony has contracted to appear is whether the union carpenters, electricians and stage men will continue to serve the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

m TRIBUNE
dress: Minneapolis, Minn.
e Oct. 15th

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is now carrying out what seems to be the cleverest grand opera idea that has occurred to anybody in a long time. The only grand opera, by artists of absolutely first rank, to be heard before March or April in this country, has been in New York and Chicago. At that time choruses, orchestras and soloists, fatigued from a season of hard work, have been sent out on limited road tours in performances that, in many ways, were not altogether satisfactory. To Mr. Ellis came the inspired thought of having an opera road tour early in the season instead of late, and before the New York and Chicago seasons instead of after. So he gathered together a number of the leading singers of the Metropolitan and Chicago opera companies, assembled a chorus of 60 and an orchestra of the same number, secured Campinini as artistic director and conductor, selected two box-office certainties for his repertoire and is sending this interesting aggregation out through the Middle West for a three weeks' tour in "Carmen" and "Ill Trovatore." The details of the affair will be found in another column on this page.

The results, it seems to me, will be keen musical pleasure at a time when everyone, performers and public alike, are eager and thirsty for music and a net little balance of profit for Mr. Ellis. Let us hope that this balance may be large enough to encourage him to make an annual feature of the autumn tour of the Ellis Opera company, which will appear in the St. Paul Auditorium next Friday and Saturday evenings.

n TIMES
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e

Kreisler at Boston Concert.

The great point of interest in the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote last summer specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler, of course, will play it at this concert, this being his only appearance here with orchestra the coming season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes two variations from his Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN GREAT BOSTON SEASON

Its Thirty-Sixth Year Finds the World-Famous Orchestra at Zenith of Its Power—Total of 110 Concerts to Be Given—An Imposing Array of Soloists—Opera by Boston-National and Ellis Companies—Princely Entertainment Promised by Local Concert Managers—Club and Choral Concerts of Every Variety in Prospect — In the Music Schools

Bureau of Musical America,
120 Boylston Street,
Boston, Oct. 7, 1916.

IF the coming musical season in Boston were confined to the fare announced from Symphony Hall alone, it would indeed be a season of princely entertainment, but in addition to the events in Symphony Hall, much of merit and interesting novelties and revivals are to be forthcoming from other musical centers of the city. It promises to be one of the most brilliant of many seasons in Boston.

Particularly noticeable is the imposing array of soloists to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. There will be nineteen soloists in all, the largest list in more than ten years.

The concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will usher in the thirty-sixth season of the orchestra. For the first time in almost a generation, the opening of the season will not be preceded by the auction sales of season tickets which in the past have filled four days of the week prior to the first concerts. Such sales have gone forever, for the good results and the general satisfaction coming from the new method of selling by subscription at fixed prices far surpass the highest expectations of C. A. Ellis, the manager, whose decision made the change possible. More than 75 per cent of the holders of seats last season renewed their subscriptions for 1916-1917, and, contrary to expectations, there has been practically no criticism either of the scale of prices or the division of the hall.

Not the least factor in the success of the new method of disposing of season tickets is found, so to say, in the proprietary interest in the institution it gives to the patrons. Heretofore they have had no assurance of retaining their seats, however desirable they might be.

Musical Spokes in the "Hub of the Universe"

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Season of Boston-National Grand Opera Company
Charles E. Ellis's Concert Enterprises and Opera Company
Mudgett, Macdonald, Steinert and Tremont Temple Concert Series
Six Leading Choral Societies
Some of the Country's Leading Music Clubs and Schools
Many Suburban Choral Societies

Now, seats once secured become, at will, a family possession, for the option on them from season to season works automatically. This alone must bring closer and more sympathetic contact between orchestra and public.

To Give 110 Concerts

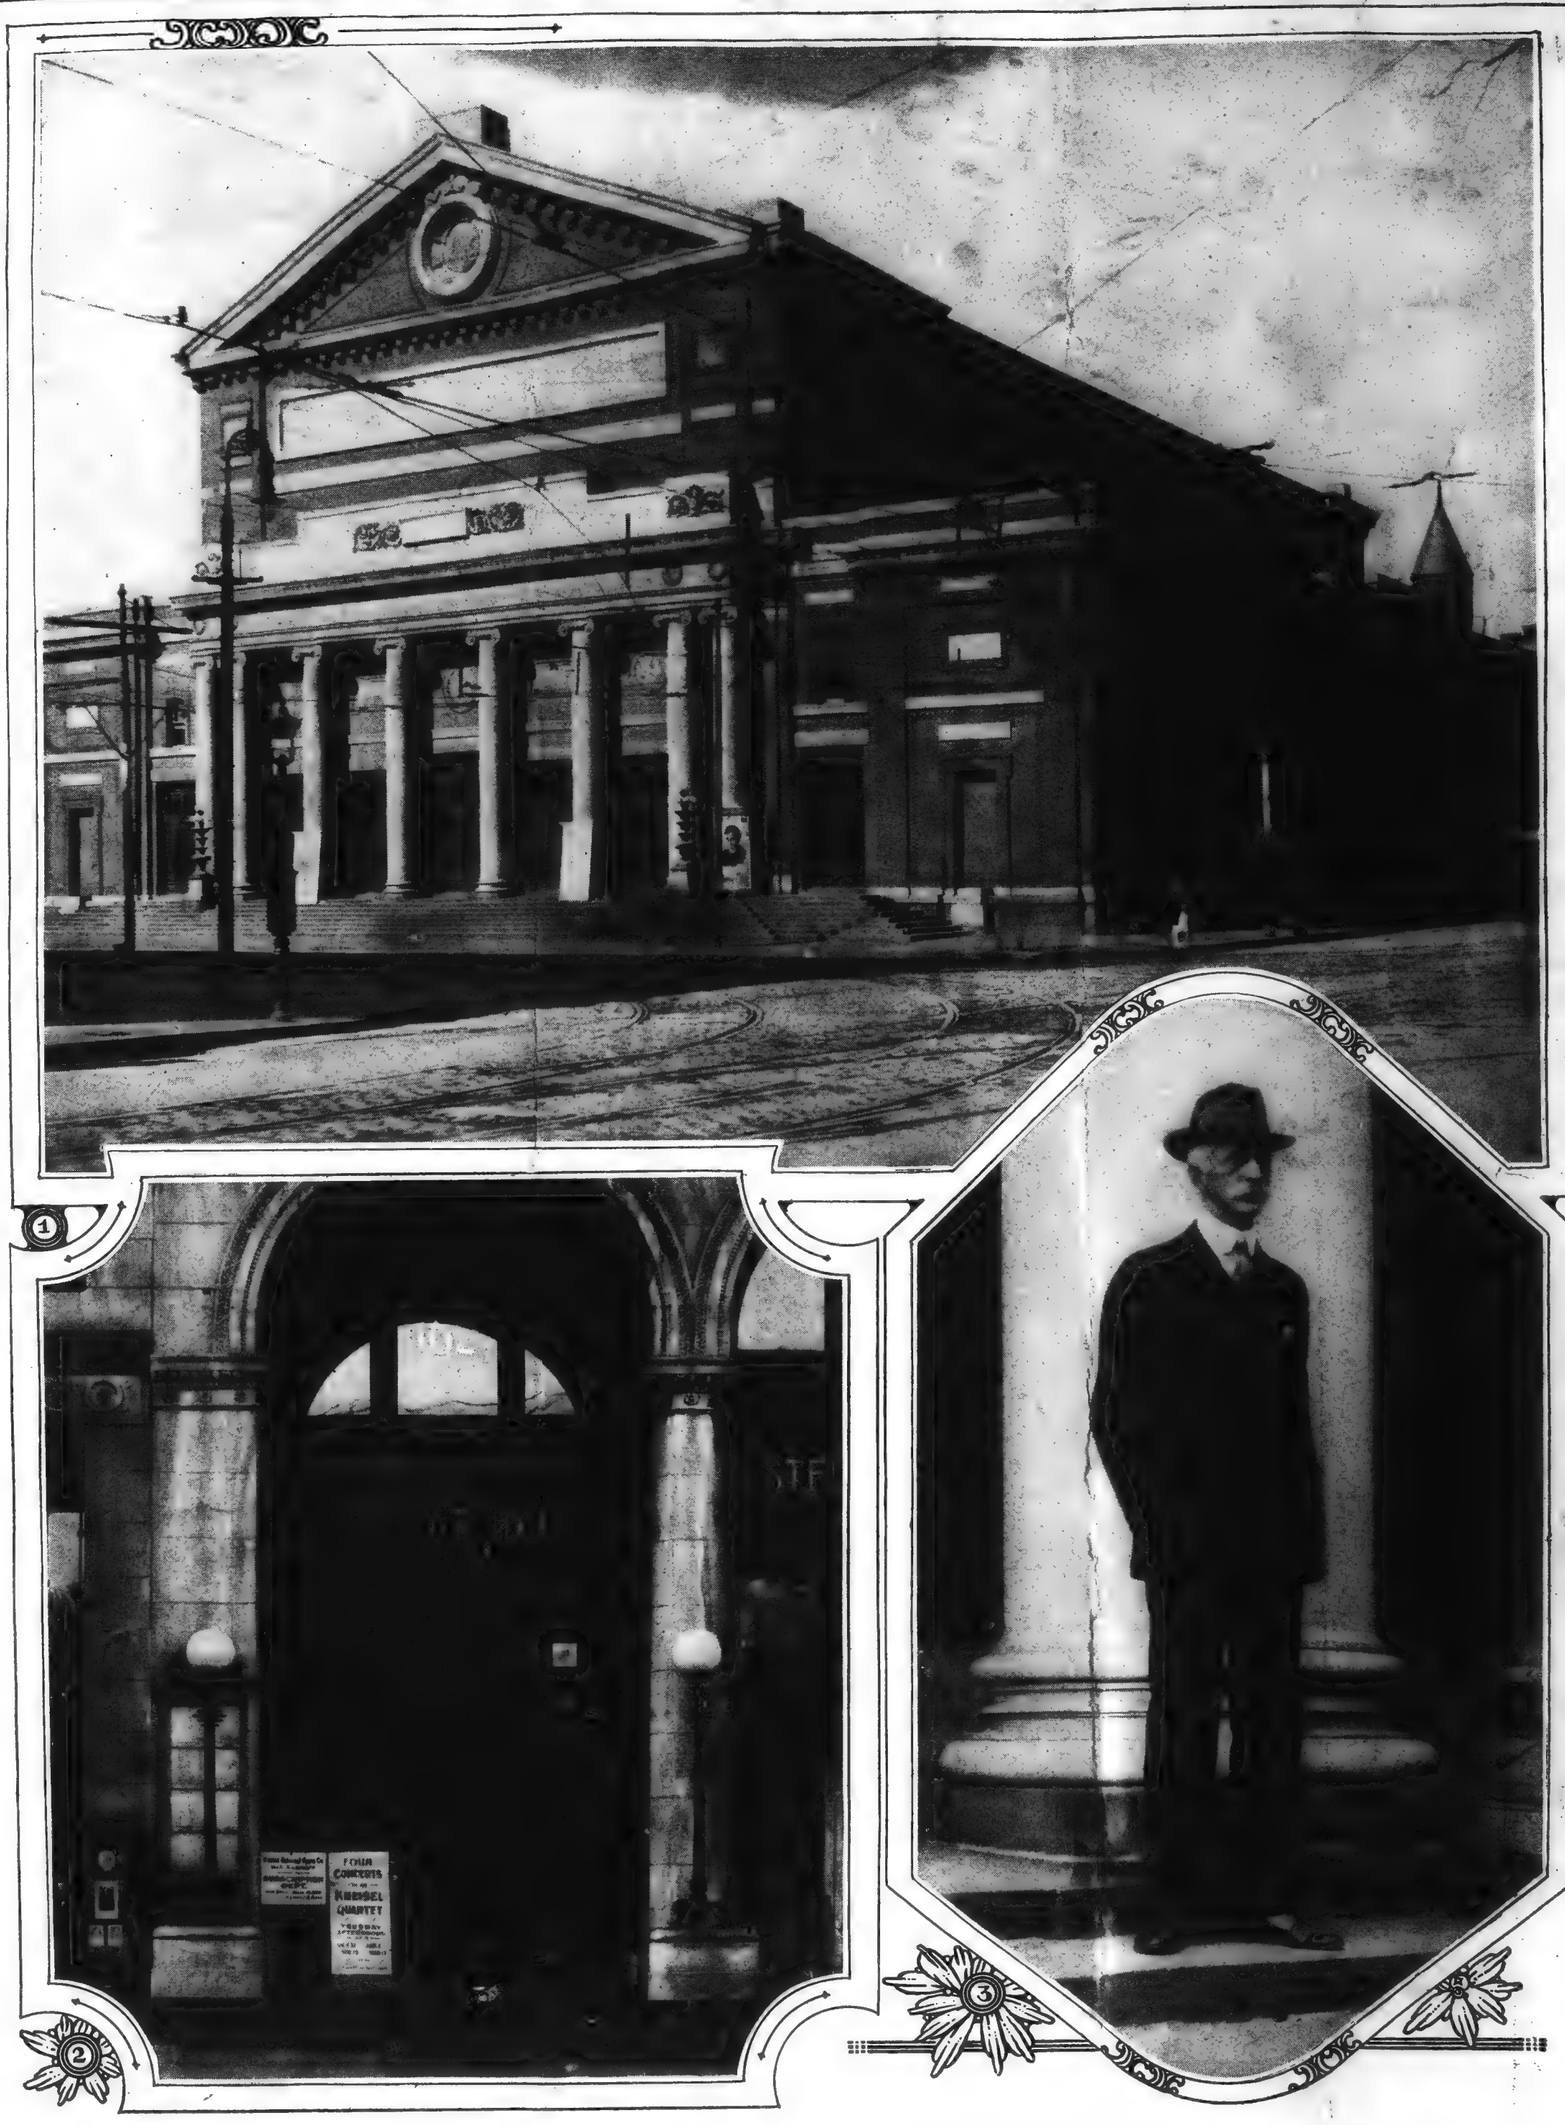
The full season of the orchestra, beginning Oct. 13-14, will run for thirty weeks, ending May 4-5, 1917. In this time a total of 110 concerts will be given, twenty-four pairs in Boston on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings; eight concerts in Cambridge at Sanders Theater; two each in Springfield and New Bedford, and the others to be given in New York City, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Worcester, Hartford and in other New England cities and cities of the Middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season when there will be no concerts in Boston are Nov. 3-4, Dec. 1-2, Jan. 5-6 and 26-27, Feb. 16-17, and March 16-17.

Last season was, in many respects, the most conspicuous in the history of the orchestra. The patronage it received was the largest on record, not only in Boston, but throughout the country. In brilliancy of performance it quite surpassed anything which it had before achieved. It is everybody's secret that when Dr. Muck returned in 1912 he found many things in the orchestra and its manner of playing not to his liking, and the following three seasons were in a sense disciplinary. Last year it was possible fully to realize what the conductor had accomplished not only in refining the work of the orchestra, but, at the same time in invigorating it. At last Dr. Muck expressed the satisfaction which had long since filled the public.

On the matter of programs, Dr. Muck again, as at the beginning of last year, warns the Symphony public not to look for too many novelties. Music printing is languishing during these war times and it is impossible to secure new music from Central Europe. None the less, it will be remembered that, despite his warning of last season, he presented during the winter no less than eleven works which were new to Boston, seven of these being by American composers. So lovers of the new and of the American need not despair. Moreover, he is planning the revival of several interesting works which have not been heard here for a long time.

Of the soloists, seven are singers. The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York will supply four of these, viz: Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The others are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt and John McCormack. All of these singers have sung with the Boston Symphony before except Mme. Kurt and John McCormack. There will be six pianists on the list, Paderewski, Mrs. Beach, Heinrich Gebhard, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Ernest Schelling. There will be a warm welcome for Mrs. Beach, the talented Boston composer-pianist, who returns after an absence from the Symphony concerts of sixteen years. She will play a concerto of her own which will be new to Symphony patrons. Then, for violinists, two will come out of the orchestra, Messrs. Witek and Noack. Kreisler will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the concerts of Oct. 20-21. The other assisting violinist will be that admirable

[Continued on page 25]



No. 1—Symphony Hall, Boston, the Home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the City's Principal Concert Auditorium. Charles A. Ellis, the Noted Musical Manager, Has His Offices in This Building. No. 2—Entrance to Steinert Hall, in Which Many of Boston's Finest Recitals Are Given. No. 3—L. H. Mudgett, Manager of Symphony Hall, on the Steps of That Building

SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN GREAT BOSTON SEASON

Its Thirty-Sixth Year Finds the World-Famous Orchestra at Zenith of Its Power—Total of 110 Concerts to Be Given—An Imposing Array of Soloists—Opera by Boston-National and Ellis Companies—Princely Entertainment Promised by Local Concert Managers—Club and Choral Concerts of Every Variety in Prospect — In the Music Schools

Bureau of Musical America,
120 Boylston Street,
Boston, Oct. 7, 1916.

IF the coming musical season in Boston were confined to the fare announced from Symphony Hall alone, it would indeed be a season of princely entertainment, but in addition to the events in Symphony Hall, much of merit and interesting novelties and revivals are to be forthcoming from other musical centers of the city. It promises to be one of the most brilliant of many seasons in Boston.

Particularly noticeable is the imposing array of soloists to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. There will be nineteen soloists in all, the largest list in more than ten years.

The concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will usher in the thirty-sixth season of the orchestra. For the first time in almost a generation, the opening of the season will not be preceded by the auction sales of season tickets which in the past have filled four days of the week prior to the first concerts. Such sales have gone forever, for the good results and the general satisfaction coming from the new method of selling by subscription at fixed prices far surpass the highest expectations of C. A. Ellis, the manager, whose decision made the change possible. More than 75 per cent of the holders of seats last season renewed their subscriptions for 1916-1917, and, contrary to expectations, there has been practically no criticism either of the scale of prices or the division of the hall.

Not the least factor in the success of the new method of disposing of season tickets is found, so to say, in the proprietary interest in the institution it gives to the patrons. Heretofore they have had no assurance of retaining their seats, however desirable they might be.

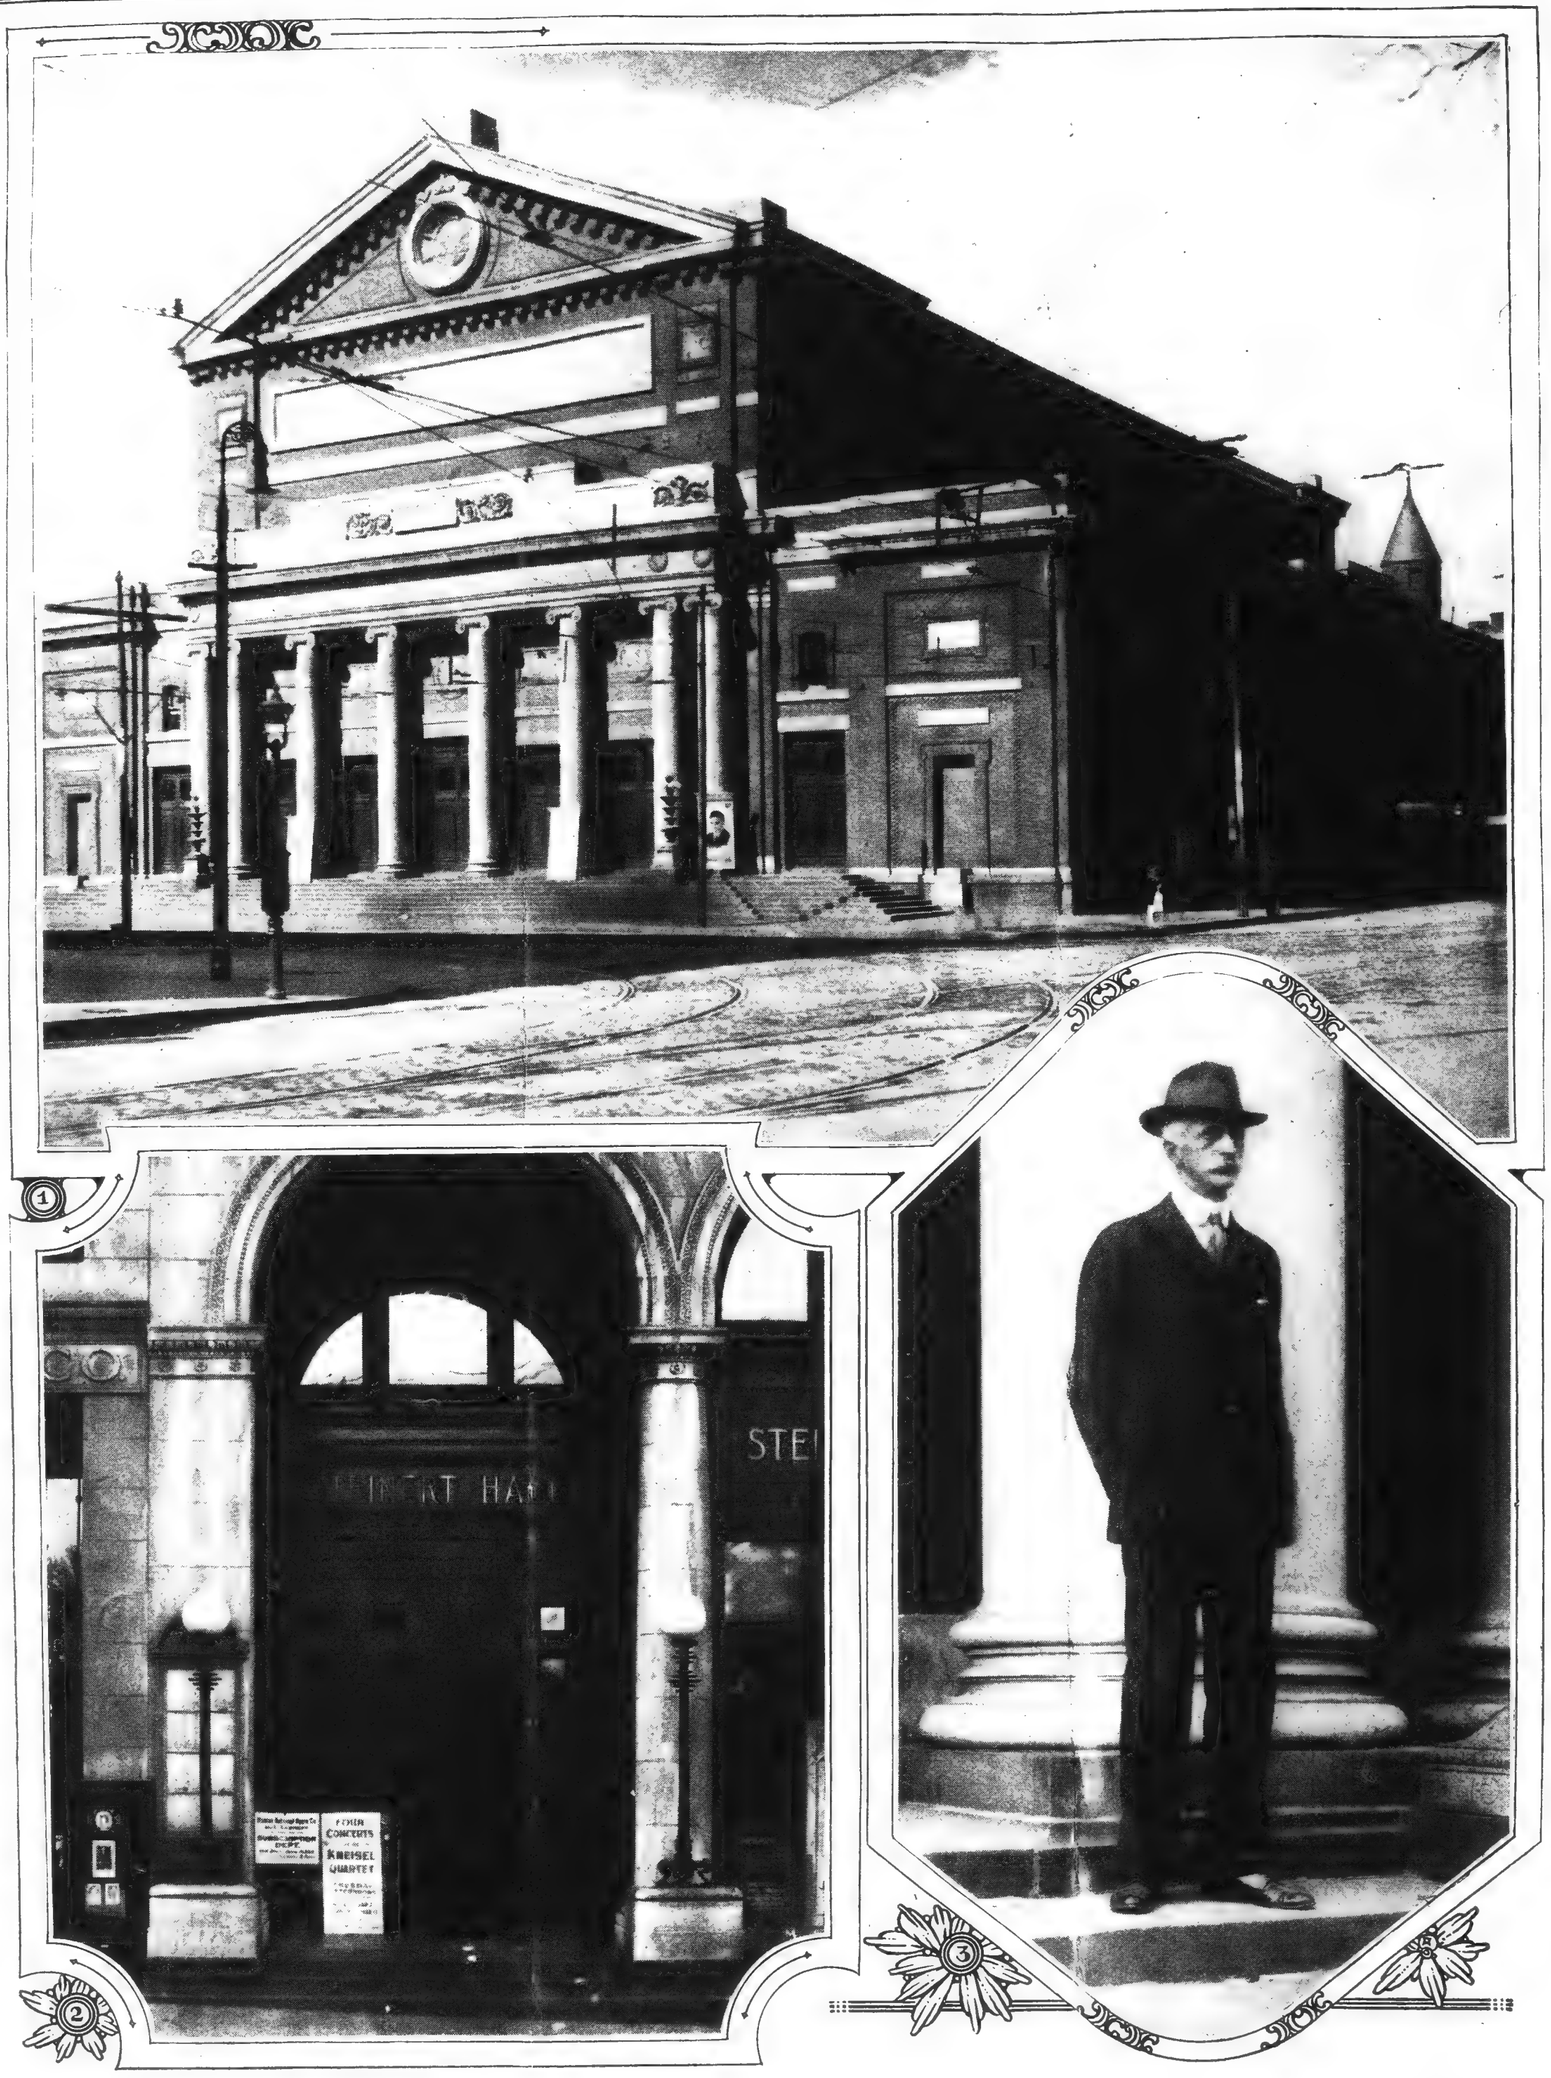
Musical Spokes in the "Hub of the Universe"

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Season of Boston-National Grand Opera Company
Charles E. Ellis's Concert Enterprises and Opera Company
Mudgett, Macdonald, Steinert and Tremont Temple Concert Series
Six Leading Choral Societies
Some of the Country's Leading Music Clubs and Schools
Many Suburban Choral Societies

Now, seats once secured become, at will, a family possession, for the option on them from season to season works automatically. This alone must bring closer and more sympathetic contact between orchestra and public.

To Give 110 Concerts

The full season of the orchestra, beginning Oct. 13-14, will run for thirty weeks, ending May 4-5, 1917. In this time a total of 110 concerts will be given, twenty-four pairs in Boston on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings; eight concerts in Cambridge at Sanders Theater; two each in Springfield and New Bedford, and the others to be given in New York City, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Worcester, Hartford and in other New England cities and cities of the Middle West. The Fridays and Saturdays in the season when there will be no concerts in Boston are Nov. 3-4, Dec. 1-2, Jan. 5-6 and 26-27, Feb. 16-17, and March 16-17.



No. 1—Symphony Hall, Boston, the Home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the City's Principal Concert Auditorium. Charles A. Ellis, the Noted Musical Manager, Has His Offices in This Building. No. 2—Entrance to Steinert Hall, in Which Many of Boston's Finest Recitals Are Given. No. 3—L. H. Mudgett, Manager of Symphony Hall, on the Steps of That Building

Last season was, in many respects, the most conspicuous in the history of the orchestra. The patronage it received was the largest on record, not only in Boston, but throughout the country. In brilliancy of performance it quite surpassed anything which it had before achieved. It is everybody's secret that when Dr. Muck returned in 1912 he found many things in the orchestra and its manner of playing not to his liking, and the following three seasons were in a sense disciplinary. Last year it was possible fully to realize what the conductor had accomplished not only in refining the work of the orchestra, but, at the same time in invigorating it. At last Dr. Muck expressed the satisfaction which had long since filled the public.

On the matter of programs, Dr. Muck again, as at the beginning of last year, warns the Symphony public not to look for too many novelties. Music printing is languishing during these war times and it is impossible to secure new music from Central Europe. None the less, it will be remembered that, despite his warning of last season, he presented during the winter no less than eleven works which were new to Boston, seven of these being by American composers. So lovers of the new and of the American need not despair. Moreover, he is planning the revival of several interesting works which have not been heard here for a long time.

Of the soloists, seven are singers. The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York will supply four of these, viz: Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt. The others are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt and John McCormack. All of these singers have sung with the Boston Symphony before except Mme. Kurt and John McCormack. There will be six pianists on the list, Paderewski, Mrs. Beach, Heinrich Gebhard, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Ernest Schelling. There will be a warm welcome for Mrs. Beach, the talented Boston composer-pianist, who returns after an absence from the Symphony concerts of sixteen years. She will play a concerto of her own which will be new to Symphony patrons. Then, for violinists, two will come out of the orchestra, Messrs. Witek and Noack. Kreisler will be the first soloist of the season, appearing at the concerts of Oct. 20-21. The other assisting violinist will be that admirable

[Continued on page 25]

From the TRANSCRIPT, Oct.30,1916.

Mme. Sembrich's First Pupil

Susan Millar, Mezzo-Soprano, Who Will Make Her Debut at the Concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on November 9

From the Globe
Oct.28,1916.

BEETHOVEN'S GRAND FUGUE REDISCOVERED

Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony Played

Mme Gadski Soloist in Two Excerpts From "Tristan and Isolda"

Remembering the orchestral character of Beethoven's later quartets, it is difficult to think of the overture: Grand fugue in B flat major, op. 133, originally the finale of the quartet op. 130, as performed by four stringed instruments. Placed upon the Symphony program by Dr Muck yesterday for the first time, the string orchestra of such size and quality seemed its appropriate means of expression.

The insatiable rhythmic figure, the sweeping breadth of the fugal subjects, holding within them a certain spirit of revolt as of triumphant aspiration would seem stifled and confined, if heard within a solo quartet, a dynamic force of threatening proportions.

The contrasted characters of the two subjects and the contemplative episode are the Beethoven of the later period in expanse of vision, thoughts toward which only the choral symphony had pointed. Criticism of performace by a string orchestra of works for quartet probably is based on lack of clearness, and this a matter of the abilities of the players. The performance yesterday was one of remarkable virtuosity. The precision of each figure kept its profile clean cut in the contrapuntal web, and there was superb dash and spirit.

Schumann's third symphony, intended, as he said, to denote the peasant life along the Rhine, is pervaded by a golden, mellow light. It is wholesome music, not slavishly of folk character, but of a universal simplicity. Nothing was lost in the sympathetic manner in which it was played, of the sunny exuberance of the first movement, the jovial merrymaking of the second, or the pomp and splendor of the scene of coronation in the cathedral.

Mme Gadski sang two excerpts from "Tristan"; the first, Isolda's narrative to Brangaena in Act 1 of the cause of her presence on Tristan's ship, how she had nursed him to health from his wound, had discovered him, through the nick in his sword, to have been Morald's murderer, how she had been stayed from vengeance by the light in his eyes. The second was the Love's death following a performance of the prelude to the opera.

Mme Gadski interpreted in a dramatic manner. There was regal scorn at the end of the first. The final scene touched [illegible] exaltation. No singer could [illegible] to inspiration of such an [illegible] performance. The prelude [illegible] manner more brilliant [illegible] Mme Gadski was [illegible] The orchestra will [illegible] horn trip next week.

From the News
Providence, R.I.
Oct 28 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With its full orchestra present at a Providence concert for the first time, with that supreme master of the violin, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its serits of six concerts in this city in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening October 17. The full roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one hundred, but rarely is the entire number used, for even in modern music few works demand eight horns, four trombones, two harps and an organ. In the past, owing to the limited size of the stage in Infantry Hall, the string section of the orchestra has greatly suffered, and therefore the orchestra has been built on a basis of twelve first violins and ten seconds. Now, with the extension which has been made to the stage for the use of the orchestra, it is possible to bring to Providence the entire personnel of one hundred men when needed, and the orchestra will always have as its foundation sixteen first violins, fourteen seconds, ten violas, ten cellos and eight double basses. In Beethoven and the great classic works the wood wind choir will be doubled as it is in Boston, and the chances are that before the end of the season Dr. Carl Muck will put some work on the programme which demands the entire orchestra.

However great and however attractive the soloists may be, wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert it is, in the end, the orchestra itself which is the star, and undoubtedly the announcement that the entire orchestra is being brought to Providence has had a decided influence on the subscription sale, which is unusually large. At the same time, it must be confessed that even a wonderful instrument like the Boston Symphony will have difficulty in dwarfing such a soloist as Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler is making here in Providence his first appearance of a series of eight with the orchestra, and he will play here a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling. To Providence falls the distinction of having the first hearing of this work about which Mr. Kreisler is more than enthusiastic. The final draft of the work was made by Mr. Schelling about a month ago, and it was put into rehearsal by the orchestra last week. It is short, lasting but nineteen minutes, difficult and brilliant, and contains, we are told, a wealth of melodic ideals. Mr. Kresler regards it as a most important contribution to the literature of the violin.

The first number on the program will be the great "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. This will take the first half of the concert. In the second part will be heard the Schelling Concerto, which will be followed as the final number by a Liszt brilliant and grandiloquent Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa." The program in its entirety is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony, No. 3, in E Flat Major, "Eroica," Opus. 55; Schelling, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," No. 6, (after Victor Hugo).

From the
Transcript
Oct.30,1916.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

MR. KREISLER, MR. GABRILOWITSCH AND DR. MUCK

A Vision of the Conductor in Wagnerian Opera—An Aside for Mme. Gadski—The Pianist from Schumann Through Ravel—The Violinist in an Ancient and a Modern Concerto — Of Audiences and Extra Pieces

FROM Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, after the prelude and the closing scene of "Tristan" had come from Dr. Muck, his orchestra and Mme. Gadski as never before, perhaps, in this town, many departed wondering whether they would ever receive the opportunity to hear him as an operatic conductor in the theatre, not in this or that fragment of a music-drama, but from beginning to end of it. For six years he has dwelt and worked in Boston; he began this month the seventh year of his stay; he is free to continue it for as many years more as he may elect. Often, when he has led in an operatic overture at the Symphony Concerts, his more imaginative hearers have seen an invisible curtain rise upon an invisible scene and heard, in fancy, the action of the piece continue under his hand—until his own beginning of the next number on the programme dissipated their vision. Above all, when in the regular course of the concerts or in the additional concerts for the Pension Fund, he has conducted in some fragment of Wagner's music-dramas that enlisted a singer also, he has born it to heights of power and beauty, and sustained it there, such as none but him has attained within long memory. Band, singer, audience have all been heated in the fires of his mastery of the music, his response to it, his conveyance of it.

On Saturday evening, for example, it was so—and as it seemed at the moment in greater degree than ever before—with the prelude and Isolde's rhapsody from "Tristan." A single voice—his—but as many-tongued as all the instruments in the orchestra, poured forth the music in the flood of tone that made phrase as inseparable from phrase and climacteric march as inevitable as are the waters of a wave and the advance and recession of the billow until it breaks luminous and sonorous upon the shore. On this flood rode the purport and the passion of the instant in the drama and there was no other sound in the ears of those that heard, no other thought in their minds, no other emotion in their hearts. With all the songful beauty and the intensifying power of Mme. Gadski's declamation, she seemed no more than the crest of the wave. At the end came the instant of tense silence before the surge of applause that signifies an audience translated for the time out of itself and the familiar circumstance of the concert-hall.

If Dr. Muck can work these wonders there, how many more, and in yet higher and ampler degree, might he not accomplish in the opera house? As he is with the music-dramas of Wagner, so is he—each opera according to its kind—with "Figaro" or "Don Juan," with "Carmen," "Manon," "Les Huguenots" or "Der Rosenkavalier." His range in opera, indeed, is no less wide, his penetration and revelation of every piece as complete, as it is with symphonic music. For Dr. Muck to undertake opera during the eight months in which he must lead in a hundred and more concerts of the Symphony Orchestra here and elsewhere is, of course, out of the question. But thereafter, two months remain in each year—May and June—in which an audience would not be lacking for three or four operatic performances were he to conduct in them. At that time, moreover, the German singers, for example, of the Metropolitan would be free from their duties there; its settings for German operas would be lying in the storehouse; its orchestra—an operatic orchestra of the first rank long versed in the routine of Wagner and ready to receive Dr. Muck's finishing hand—could be readily reassembled. (His own orchestra is nearly impossible for such purposes since months would be necessary to school it, say in the four "Ring" operas.)

With such forces seemingly available, is it merely a dream and a vision that Dr. Muck may some spring be heard in Boston in the four music-dramas of Siegfried and Brünnhilde or in "Tannhauser" and "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal?" Dreams have been fulfilled and visions realized within the eyes and the ear of men; and in the field of concerts and opera, the present manager of the Symphony Orchestra is a noted fulfiller and realizer of them. At the moment he is bearing opera with Mme. Farrar into darkest Oklahoma. Why should he not also bear opera under Dr. Muck—and Wagnerian opera in particular—into hungry Boston.

Mme. Gadski and Her Audiences

At both the Symphony Concerts—and in particular on that of Saturday evening—Mme. Gadski was generally and heartily applauded not only at the end of her numbers when she stood in the rich deserts of her singing, but also when she came first to her place beside Dr. Muck. Not so long ago as to be out of remembrance, when she was about to appear in a performance of "Die Walküre" at Yale, a singularly silly and impudent attempt was made to raise a prejudice against her because she had made no secret of her warm sympathies with her country beset by war and because her husband had not been altogether prudent in the practical application of his similar loyalties. The good sense and the good manners of Yale quickly puffed this nonsense away and laughed the protestants out of court. The public that listens to Mme. Gadski in opera house or concert-hall is in no respect concerned with Captain Tauscher, and, while it hears and applauds her as an eminent singer in the prime of her song, it might justly hold her in less esteem as a woman did she hide a sentiment she is bound by every honest human impulse to feel. She could hardly have appeared before any audiences in the United States where partisanship over the war—and a partisanship opposed to hers—runs higher or more bitter than it does in the companies that listen to the Symphony Concerts. Yet with one accord they welcomed her warmly and they applauded her as she has never before been clapped in Boston. There could hardly have been a happier sign of discrimination between the pleasures of the arts and the pains of politics.

From the
Herald
Oct.28,1916.

GADSKI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

Sings Selections from Tristan and Isodle—Orchestra Is Heard in Schumann's Symphony No. 3 and Beethoven's Grand Fugue op. 133, Played by All the Strings.

By PHILIP HALE.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish"; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative, Act I. of "Tristan and Isolde"; Beethoven, Grand Fugue, Op. 133 (originally for string quartet, played by all the strings); Wagner, Prelude and Isolde's Love-Death. Mme. Johanna Gadski was the singer.

The symphony had not been played at these concerts since 1910, when it was performed in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's birth. This music has not the buoyancy and exulting rush of Schumann's first symphony or the romantic spirit of the one in D minor. Nor are there pages equal in sheer beauty to those of the Adagio in the second symphony. The first movement and the last justify the remark of Vincent d'Indy: "While genius is shown in Schumann's works that are short and of simple construction, he found himself out of his depth when he attempted to rear a musical monument. Lack of thorough education left him to be guided by sentiment alone." The second movement expresses a sort of clumsy joviality. The third might be a pretty piano piece that had been orchestrated. The fourth movement, the "cathedral scene," is the most impressive portion of the symphony. Here we have lofty ideas and a solemn, ecclesiastical mood befitting a gorgeous ceremony of the holy church. But the peculiar genius of Schumann is found in his songs and piano pieces, not in his symphonies, not in his elaborate choral works.

Beethoven wrote a formidable fugue as the finale of his string quartet op. 130. When the quartet was first played in Vienna 90 years ago this fugue was condemned. The publisher, Artaria, prevailed upon Beethoven to write another finale. The fugue was performed here by the Kneisel quartet in 1907. It has been played by all the orchestral strings in New York at a Theodore Thomas concert, and in Chicago at a concert of the Chicago orchestra.

This music of Beethoven may interest students as a specimen of fugal writing. Played by a quartet it has little or no aesthetic charm. The greater number of pages are dull when they are not ugly. When the music is played by all the strings in an orchestra the inherent ugliness is intensified. The hearer's only enjoyment is in observing the precision of the players. He says to himself: "Here are between 50 and 60 men fiddling with all their might and main. How well they keep together!"

On the night of April 26, 1890, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, then conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," played, as the program stated, by 32 violins. The violinists stood in an imposing row. We remember the occasion well. The sight of 32 men doing the work of one excited the audience to frenzy. This clap-trap performance, which should have been accompanied by the illumination of Bengal lights, provoked the heartiest applause of the season of '89-'90. Yesterday the players, with the exception of the double basses, remained seated. The audience made no ardent demonstration of enjoyment or approval. Perhaps if the men had all stood there might have been an exhibition of at least moderate rapture.

It has often been said that Dr. Muck did not favor extracts from the Wagnerian music dramas at Symphony concerts. It was the more surprising to find on the program Isolde's story of her adventure with Tristan. The music loses much of its significance and effect when it is taken from the stage, without thought of the scenes that have gone before, without sight of the ship, without the appropriate dramatic action. Mme. Gadski was last heard at these concerts in 1905. During the 11 years she has gained in variety of expression, in tonal accuracy and in the art of tonal coloring. Yesterday she was vocally well disposed. Her performance on the whole was excellent. Only now and then did she indulge in the explosiveness so dear to the great majority of German singers that have visited us or been heard in German opera houses. Only now and then did she sing consonants instead of vowels. At a Symphony concert we prefer to hear Isolde's final scene played as an orchestral transcription, no matter how competent and emotional the singer may be who is chosen to impersonate the heroine in orthodox concert dress.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The programs for Nov. 10 and 11 will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

[illegible]

From the Journal
Oct.28,1916.

FRITZ KREISLER
SYMPHONY HALL

SYMPHONY HEARD IN RARE PROGRAM

Dr. Muck is presenting an unusual program at this week's Symphony concerts, with Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano, as soloist.

Two of the four numbers, Isolde's narrative, from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," and Beethoven's "Grand Fugue" for string orchestra, are being performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Of the other numbers, Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony has come again to performance for the first time since the Schumann centennial concert in 1910, while the prelude and "Love-Death," from the last act of "Tristan and Isolde," have not been given together at a Symphony concert for many years.

Mme. Gadski sang the "Love-Death" artistically and sympathetically. Her eloquence in the narrative scene, the first solo, was sufficiently megaphonic, but it was eloquence carried with a strain. The scene demands dramatic singing of the highest order. In this instance, the full dramatic effect was achieved only by the orchestra. Dr. Muck and his men also gave a masterly performance of the prelude and "Love-Death" music. It is always a rare musical treat to hear the Symphony Orchestra play Wagner music under Dr. Muck's direction. It is a question whether the Bayreuth devotees have ever been favored with any better performance of these splendid personages from the matchless lyric drama than the one given yesterday—or, it may be added, the one in store for those who will attend tonight's concert.

The Schumann symphony is quite charming, and the performance yesterday was worthy of it. The Beethoven fugue gave the string players an opportunity to display their virtuoso qualities. Otherwise it was out of place. Originally it was the finale of the string quartet in B flat major, op. 130, one of Beethoven's latest works.

Enthusiastic applause followed every number but the "Grand Fugue."

The orchestra will be out of town next week. On Nov. 10 and 11 it will play the Brahms symphony, No. 1, in C minor, and the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

From the Journal
Oct.26,1916.

GADSKI TO SING OPERATIC SOLOS

The presence of Mme. Gadski at this week's Symphony concerts has enabled Dr. Muck to put on his program two excerpts from "Tristan und Isolde." The first, Isolde's narrative to Brangaene, in the first act, has never been done at a Symphony concert, and the "Liebestod," which Mme. Gadski will sing at the conclusion of the prelude, has not been heard here in this form in many years. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchastra," which is to be heard at the Symphony concerts for the first time, are also offered.

At his recital in Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, will play the Beethoven sonata in E flat major, the Schumann sonata in G minor, Chopin's nocturne in E minor, etude in F major and waltz in A flat major, Ravel's "Jeu d'Eaux," and Debussy's "Clair de Terne" and "L'Isle Joyeuse."

Fritz Kreisler's first recital of the season will be given in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon. Bach's concerto in A minor, a concerto in E minor by Jules Conus, short pieces by Martini, Leclair, Couperin, Porpora, Wieniawski and Kreisler, and Kreisler's own transcriptions of pieces by Schubert and Dvorak comprise the program.

[30]

From the TRANSCRIPT, Oct.30,1916.

Mme. Sembrich's First Pupil

Susan Millar, Mezzo-Soprano, Who Will Make Her Debut at the Concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on November 9

From the Globe
Oct.28,1916.

BEETHOVEN'S GRAND FUGUE REDISCOVERED

Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony Played

Mme Gadski Soloist in Two Excerpts From "Tristan and Isolda"

Remembering the orchestral character of Beethoven's later quartets, it is difficult to think of the overture: Grand fugue in B flat major, op. 133, originally the finale of the quartet op. 130, as performed by four stringed instruments. Placed upon the Symphony program by Dr Muck yesterday for the first time, the string orchestra of such size and quality seemed its appropriate means of expression.

The insatiable rhythmic figure, the sweeping breadth of the fugal subjects, holding within them a certain spirit of revolt as of triumphant aspiration would seem stifled and confined, if heard within a solo quartet, a dynamic force of threatening proportions.

The contrasted characters of the two subjects and the contemplative episode are the Beethoven of the later period in expanse of vision, thoughts toward which only the choral symphony had pointed. Criticism of performace by a string orchestra of works for quartet probably is based on lack of clearness, and this a matter of the abilities of the players. The performance yesterday was one of remarkable virtuosity. The precision of each figure kept its profile clean cut in the contrapuntal web, and there was superb dash and spirit.

Schumann's third symphony, intended, as he said, to denote the peasant life along the Rhine, is pervaded by a golden, mellow light. It is wholesome music, not slavishly of folk character, but of a universal simplicity. Nothing was lost in the sympathetic manner in which it was played, of the sunny exuberance of the first movement, the jovial merrymaking of the second, or the pomp and splendor of the scene of coronation in the cathedral.

Mme Gadski sang two excerpts from "Tristan"; the first, Isolda's narrative to Brangaena in Act 1 of the cause of her presence on Tristan's ship, how she had nursed him to health from his wound, had discovered him, through the nick in his sword, to have been Morald's murderer, how she had been stayed from vengeance by the light in his eyes, and now this reward of disprizement. The second was the Love's death following a performance of the prelude to the opera.

Mme Gadski interpreted in a dramatic manner. There was regal scorn at the end of the first. The final scene touched a spiritual exaltation. No singer could be indifferent to inspiration of such an orchestral performance. The prelude was played in a manner more brilliant than impassioned. Mme Gadski was warmly applauded. The orchestra will [illegible] southern trip next week.

From the NEWS, Providence, R.I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With its full orchestra present at a Providence concert for the first time, with that supreme master of the violin, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its serits of six concerts in this city in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening October 17. The full roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one hundred, but rarely is the entire number used, for even in modern music few works demand eight horns, four trombones, two harps and an organ. In the past, owing to the limited size of the stage in Infantry Hall, the string section of the orchestra has greatly suffered, and therefore the orchestra has been built on a basis of twelve first violins and ten seconds. Now, with the extension which has been made to the stage for the use of the orchestra, it is possible to bring to Providence the entire personnel of one hundred men when needed, and the orchestra will always have as its foundation sixteen first violins, fourteen seconds, ten violas, ten cellos and eight double basses. In Beethoven and the great classic works the wood wind choir will be doubled as it is in Boston, and the chances are that before the end of the season Dr. Carl Muck will put some work on the programme which demands the entire orchestra.

However great and however attractive the soloists may be, wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert it is, in the end, the orchestra itself which is the star, and undoubtedly the announcement that the entire orchestra is being brought to Providence has had a decided influence on the subscription sale, which is unusually large. At the same time, it must be confessed that even a wonderful instrument like the Boston Symphony will have difficulty in dwarfing such a soloist as Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler is making here in Providence his first appearance of a series of eight with the orchestra, and he will play here a concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling. To Providence falls the distinction of having the first hearing of this work about which Mr. Kreisler is more than enthusiastic. The final draft of the work was made by Mr. Schelling about a month ago, and it was put into rehearsal by the orchestra last week. It is short, lasting but nineteen minutes, difficult and brilliant, and contains, we are told, a wealth of melodic ideals. Mr. Kresler regards it as a most important contribution to the literature of the violin.

The first number on the program will be the great "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. This will take the first half of the concert. In the second part will be heard the Schelling Concerto, which will be followed as the final number by a Liszt brilliant and grandiloquent Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa." The program in its entirety is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony, No. 3, in E Flat Major, "Eroica," Opus, 55; Schelling, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," No. 6, (after Victor Hugo).

From the Transcript Oct.30,1916.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

MR. KREISLER, MR. GABRILOWITSCH AND DR. MUCK

A Vision of the Conductor in Wagnerian Opera—An Aside for Mme. Gadski—The Pianist from Schumann Through Ravel—The Violinist in an Ancient and a Modern Concerto — Of Audiences and Extra Pieces

FROM Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, after the prelude and the closing scene of "Tristan" had come from Dr. Muck, his orchestra and Mme. Gadski as never before, perhaps, in this town, many departed wondering whether they would ever receive the opportunity to hear him as an operatic conductor in the theatre, not in this or that fragment of a music-drama, but from beginning to end of it. For six years he has dwelt and worked in Boston; he began this month the seventh year of his stay; he is free to continue it for as many years more as he may elect. Often, when he has led in an operatic overture at the Symphony Concerts, his more imaginative hearers have seen an invisible curtain rise upon an invisible scene and heard, in fancy, the action of the piece continue under his hand—until his own beginning of the next number on the programme dissipated their vision. Above all, when in the regular course of the concerts or in the additional concerts for the Pension Fund, he has conducted in some fragment of Wagner's music-dramas that enlisted a singer also, he has born it to heights of power and beauty, and sustained it there, such as none but him has attained within long memory. Band, singer, audience have all been heated in the fires of his mastery of the music, his response to it, his conveyance of it.

On Saturday evening, for example, it was so—and as it seemed at the moment in greater degree than ever before—with the prelude and Isolde's rhapsody from "Tristan." A single voice—his—but as many-tongued as all the instruments in the orchestra, poured forth the music in the flood of tone that made phrase as inseparable from phrase and climacteric march as inevitable as are the waters of a wave and the advance and recession of the billow until it breaks luminous and sonorous upon the shore. On this flood rode the purport and the passion of the instant in the drama and there was no other sound in the ears of those that heard, no other thought in their minds, no other emotion in their hearts. With all the songful beauty and the intensifying power of Mme. Gadski's declamation, she seemed no more than the crest of the wave. At the end came the instant of tense silence before the surge of applause that signifies an audience translated for the time out of itself and the familiar circumstance of the concert-hall.

If Dr. Muck can work these wonders there, how many more, and in yet higher and ampler degree, might he not accomplish in the opera house? As he is with the music-dramas of Wagner, so is he—each opera according to its kind—with "Figaro" or "Don Juan," with "Carmen," "Manon," "Les Huguenots" or "Der Rosenkavalier." His range in opera, indeed, is no less wide, his penetration and revelation of every piece as complete, as it is with symphonic music. For Dr. Muck to undertake opera during the eight months in which he must lead in a hundred and more concerts of the Symphony Orchestra here and elsewhere is, of course, out of the question. But thereafter, two months remain in each year—May and June—in which an audience would not be lacking for three or four operatic performances were he to conduct in them. At that time, moreover, the German singers, for example, of the Metropolitan would be free from their duties there; its settings for German operas would be lying in the storehouse; its orchestra—an operatic orchestra of the first rank long versed in the routine of Wagner and ready to receive Dr. Muck's finishing hand—could be readily reassembled. (His own orchestra is nearly impossible for such purposes since months would be necessary to school it, say in the four "Ring" operas.)

With such forces seemingly available, is it merely a dream and a vision that Dr. Muck may some spring be heard in Boston in the four music-dramas of Siegfried and Brünnhilde or in "Tannhauser" and "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal?" Dreams have been fulfilled and visions realized within the eyes and the ear of men; and in the field of concerts and opera, the present manager of the Symphony Orchestra is a noted fulfiller and realizer of them. At the moment he is bearing opera with Mme. Farrar into darkest Oklahoma. Why should he not also bear opera under Dr. Muck—and Wagnerian opera in particular—into hungry Boston.

Mme. Gadski and Her Audiences

At both the Symphony Concerts—and in particular on that of Saturday evening—Mme. Gadski was generally and heartily applauded not only at the end of her numbers when she stood in the rich deserts of her singing, but also when she came first to her place beside Dr. Muck. Not so long ago as to be out of remembrance, when she was about to appear in a performance of "Die Walküre" at Yale, a singularly silly and impudent attempt was made to raise a prejudice against her because she had made no secret of her warm sympathies with her country beset by war and because her husband had not been altogether prudent in the practical application of his similar loyalties. The good sense and the good manners of Yale quickly puffed this nonsense away and laughed the protestants out of court. The public that listens to Mme. Gadski in opera house or concert-hall is in no respect concerned with Captain Tauscher, and, while it hears and applauds her as an eminent singer in the prime of her song, it might justly hold her in less esteem as a woman did she hide a sentiment she is bound by every honest human impulse to feel. She could hardly have appeared before any audiences in the United States where partisanship over the war—and a partisanship opposed to hers—runs higher or more bitter than it does in the companies that listen to the Symphony Concerts. Yet with one accord they welcomed her warmly and they applauded her as she has never before been clapped in Boston. There could hardly have been a happier sign of discrimination between the pleasures of the arts and the pains of politics.

From the Herald Oct.28,1916.

GADSKI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

Sings Selections from Tristan and Isodle—Orchestra Is Heard in Schumann's Symphony No. 3 and Beethoven's Grand Fugue op. 133, Played by All the Strings.

By PHILIP HALE.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish"; Wagner, Isolde's Narrative, Act I. of "Tristan and Isolde"; Beethoven, Grand Fugue, Op. 133 (originally for string quartet, played by all the strings); Wagner, Prelude and Isolde's Love-Death. Mme. Johanna Gadski was the singer.

The symphony had not been played at these concerts since 1910, when it was performed in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's birth. This music has not the buoyancy and exulting rush of Schumann's first symphony or the romantic spirit of the one in D minor. Nor are there pages equal in sheer beauty to those of the Adagio in the second symphony. The first movement and the last justify the remark of Vincent d'Indy: "While genius is shown in Schumann's works that are short and of simple construction, he found himself out of his depth when he attempted to rear a musical monument. Lack of thorough education left him to be guided by sentiment alone." The second movement expresses a sort of clumsy joviality. The third might be a pretty piano piece that had been orchestrated. The fourth movement, the "cathedral scene," is the most impressive portion of the symphony. Here we have lofty ideas and a solemn, ecclesiastical mood befitting a gorgeous ceremony of the holy church. But the peculiar genius of Schumann is found in his songs and piano pieces, not in his symphonies, not in his elaborate choral works.

Beethoven wrote a formidable fugue as the finale of his string quartet op. 130. When the quartet was first played in Vienna 90 years ago this fugue was condemned. The publisher, Artaria, prevailed upon Beethoven to write another finale. The fugue was performed here by the Kneisel quartet in 1907. It has been played by all the orchestral strings in New York at a Theodore Thomas concert, and in Chicago at a concert of the Chicago orchestra.

This music of Beethoven may interest students as a specimen of fugal writing. Played by a quartet it has little or no aesthetic charm. The greater number of pages are dull when they are not ugly. When the music is played by all the strings in an orchestra the inherent ugliness is intensified. The hearer's only enjoyment is in observing the precision of the players. He says to himself: "Here are between 50 and 60 men fiddling with all their might and main. How well they keep together!"

On the night of April 26, 1890, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, then conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," played, as the program stated, by 32 violins. The violinists stood in an imposing row. We remember the occasion well. The sight of 32 men doing the work of one excited the audience to frenzy. This clap-trap performance, which should have been accompanied by the illumination of Bengal lights, provoked the heartiest applause of the season of '89-'90. Yesterday the players, with the exception of the double basses, remained seated. The audience made no ardent demonstration of enjoyment or approval. Perhaps if the men had all stood there might have been an exhibition of at least moderate rapture.

It has often been said that Dr. Muck did not favor extracts from the Wagnerian music dramas at Symphony concerts. It was the more surprising to find on the program Isolde's story of her adventure with Tristan. The music loses much of its significance and effect when it is taken from the stage, without thought of the scenes that have gone before, without sight of the ship, without the appropriate dramatic action. Mme. Gadski was last heard at these concerts in 1905. During the 11 years she has gained in variety of expression, in tonal accuracy and in the art of tonal coloring. Yesterday she was vocally well disposed. Her performance on the whole was excellent. Only now and then did she indulge in the explosiveness so dear to the great majority of German singers that have visited us or been heard in German opera houses. Only now and then did she sing consonants instead of vowels. At a Symphony concert we prefer to hear Isolde's final scene played as an orchestral transcription, no matter how competent and emotional the singer may be who is chosen to impersonate the heroine in orthodox concert dress.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Nov. 10 and 11 will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

From the Journal Oct.28,1916.

FRITZ KREISLER SYMPHONY HALL

SYMPHONY HEARD IN RARE PROGRAM

Dr. Muck is presenting an unusual program at this week's Symphony concerts, with Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano, as soloist.

Two of the four numbers, Isolde's narrative, from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," and Beethoven's "Grand Fugue" for string orchestra, are being performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Of the other numbers, Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony has come again to performance for the first time since the Schumann centennial concert in 1910, while the prelude and "Love-Death," from the last act of "Tristan and Isolde," have not been given together at a Symphony concert for many years.

Mme. Gadski sang the "Love-Death" artistically and sympathetically. Her eloquence in the narrative scene, the first solo, was sufficiently megaphonic, but it was eloquence carried with a strain. The scene demands dramatic singing of the highest order. In this instance, the full dramatic effect was achieved only by the orchestra. Dr. Muck and his men also gave a masterly performance of the prelude and "Love-Death" music. It is always a rare musical treat to hear the Symphony Orchestra play Wagner music under Dr. Muck's direction. It is a question whether the Bayreuth devotees have ever been favored with any better performance of these splendid personages from the matchless lyric drama than the one given yesterday—or, it may be added, the one in store for those who will attend tonight's concert.

The Schumann symphony is quite charming, and the performance yesterday was worthy of it. The Beethoven fugue gave the string players an opportunity to display their virtuoso qualities. Otherwise it was out of place. Originally it was the finale of the string quartet in B flat major, op. 130, one of Beethoven's latest works.

Enthusiastic applause followed every number but the "Grand Fugue."

The orchestra will be out of town next week. On Nov. 10 and 11 it will play the Brahms symphony, No. 1, in C minor, and the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

From the Journal Oct.26,1916.

GADSKI TO SING OPERATIC SOLOS

The presence of Mme. Gadski at this week's Symphony concerts has enabled Dr. Muck to put on his program two excerpts from "Tristan und Isolde." The first, Isolde's narrative to Brangaene, in the first act, has never been done at a Symphony concert, and the "Liebestod," which Mme. Gadski will sing at the conclusion of the prelude, has not been heard here in this form in many years. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra," which is to be heard at the Symphony concerts for the first time, are also offered.

At his recital in Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, will play the Beethoven sonata in E flat major, the Schumann sonata in G minor, Chopin's nocturne in E minor, etude in F major and waltz in A flat major, Ravel's "Jeu d'Eaux," and Debussy's "Clair de Terne" and "L'Isle Joyeuse."

Fritz Kreisler's first recital of the season will be given in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon. Bach's concerto in A minor, a concerto in E minor by Jules Conus, short pieces by Martini, Leclair, Couperin, Porpora, Wieniawski and Kreisler, and Kreisler's own transcriptions of pieces by Schubert and Dvorak comprise the program.

[30]

From the Advertiser
Oct.28,1916.

GERMAN SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Performance Most Virile—Fully Appreciated and Much Applauded

MME. GADSKI EFFECTIVE IN WAGNER NUMBERS

Dr. Muck, Orchestra and Soloist Fairly Surpassed Themselves, Says Prof. Elson

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Schumann—Third Symphony. "Rhenish."
Wagner—"Isolde's Narrative to Brangaene."
Mme. Gadski, soloist.
Beethoven—Fugue for String Orchestra. Op. 133.
Wagner—Prelude and Liebestod, "Tristan and Isolde."
Mme. Gadski, soloist.

Vincent D'Indy believes that we in America should discard German music and discharge German musicians, but we think that even he would have been converted by the concert of yesterday. It was German from top to toe, and it was performed in a manner that went even beyond our orchestra's standard. Schumann's E-flat symphony is a picture of the happy Rhine-life, and one searches in vain for any traces of "Boches," or "Huns," in its measures; on the contrary, there is healthy vigor, "Gemuethlichkeit," and innocent pleasure in almost every part.

The vigor and strength is in the first movement, which has something victorious in almost every division. Schumann could exult as few other composers, and here he is in his most triumphant vein. And Dr. Muck read this with a glory that apotheosized; his interpretation was absolutely wonderful.

The Scherzo is "Gemuethlichkeit" personified. It is not a conventional Scherzo, either in shape or spirit, but it has the real folk-song style that one associates with the sunny vineyards around Bingen and Rudesheim. Schumann was never merely jolly in a Scherzo. In the third movement there is a tenderness and sweetness that Mendelssohn sometimes tried for, in his slow movements, but never accomplished.

Then came the second slow movement, an extra one, picturing Cologne Cathedral and a great festival therein. Schumann, who was often very weak in orchestration, sometimes managed to get effects from the deep brasses that were almost inspired. Such an effect is in the trombone transition from the Larghetto to the Scherzo, in his first symphony, in his "Manfred Overture" and in "Genoveva," and such an effect is here in the suggestion of organ tones and "Feierlichkeit." The splendid contrast between this movement and the Finale, where the people are all coming out of the church and the chatter and bustle of out-door life begins, was finely caught up.

The performance was a most virile one and the work was fully appreciated and much applauded. It is the most typically "German" work that we know of in the whole symphonic repertoire and it will not be abolished, no, not on account of 50 wars.

But we were much less enthusiastic about the "Grand Fugue" by Beethoven. This work was written as the Finale of the string quartette, Opus 130. All the critics found it labored and crabbed, and unsuited to its place, and for once Beethoven agreed with them. Therefore, he wrote the finale of the Quartette in a new form, as it is played today, and that movement was the last composition of his life. The story about the "Farewell to the Piano," "Beethoven's Last Composition," is absolute nonsense and publisher's trickery.

The present fugue was, therefore, intended for a simple string quartette, but it is by no means wrong to magnify it into an orchestral composition. All of Beethoven's latest string quartette music is orchestral music in disguise. But as regards the beauty or worth of the fugue as counterpoint there may still be two opinions. The subject ieself is an awkward one, with its wide skips and brusque progressions. Beethoven was not at ease in sustained counterpoint. One may recall that his contarpuntal teacher, Albrechtsberger, warned other students not to associate with him, because of his musical eccentricities in the strict school. When one hears Bach's counterpoint one never thinks of the difficulties of construction which underlie it, but with Beethoven the case is different; one observes the composer perspiring, and struggling at the work, and continually asking himself—"What combination can I [illegible]

So it is with this [illegible]. It was wonderfully played, almost as if the orchestra had been a great solo string quartette, and it was interesting, because of its involved ingenuities, but it was not inspiring music. "Tantot libre, tantot recherchee," Beethoven marked it, but it is remarkably free for a string fugue. Such a wriggling bit of complexity Browning must have had in mind when he wrote "Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha."

Of course the long line of people waiting for "rush seats" was not attracted by these two compositions, but by the solo singer. We wish that solo singing could be abolished at these concerts, but if we must have the operatic element brought in it can never be better done than by such a singer as Mme. Gadski, and by such selections as she always gives. Her first number was, however, unusual.

We have never heard Isolde's story of how her acquaintance with Tristan began, given upon the concert stage before. There is no reason why it should not be, for it has scarcely any stage action when given in the opera. And we were glad to hear it thus, for the attention could be given more easily to the orchestral score, when not distracted by Miss Brannigan clasping her hands, or by the knowledge that the helmsman must have been in a very bad humor because Isolde's wide curtain hangings prevented him from steering his ship, or even seeing the bow at all.

And Mme. Gadski was in superb voice and is always a great artist. We were glad to see her receive a most cordial welcome, showing that Boston does not believe in any national boundaries of music. She immediately justified this welcome by her artistic work, and the subsequent applause was remarkably spontaneous.

Her two numbers were possibly the best Wagnerian singing that has ever been heard in Symphony Hall. And the orchestral support was perfection itself. Altogether then this was a memorable concert in which Dr. Muck, the orchestra, and Mme. Gadski fairly surpassed themselves.

From the Post
Oct.28,1916.

GADSKI AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Spirit of Wagner Predominates Great Concert

BY OLIN DOWNE'S

Mme. Johanna Gadski was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She sang Isolde's narrative from Act 1 of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and, following the orchestral performance of the prelude to that opera, the "Liebestod," which concludes the work.

The other orchestral compositions were Schumann's E flat symphony and Beethoven's fugue for strings, op. 133, performed for the first time at these concerts.

SCHUMANN'S CHARM

The Schumann Symphony was charmingly interpreted. It is a charming symphony. "Suite" might be a better term for "symphonic" is an adjective of which this "symphony" is somewhat undeserving.

Some find the fugue of Beethoven, originally a movement of one of the last of the string quartets, intricate and dull. For us it is a very dramatic composition, and with all the freedom of the polyphonic writing, an exceedingly clear and forceful and mighty exposition of the subject matter.

Yet the greatest music on the programme was without a doubt the music from "Tristan." Familiar as they are the Prelude and the "Love-death," under the inspired baton of Dr. Muck and Mme. Gadski's singing, seemed never more amazing.

The incomparable beauty and poignancy of the ideas, the wonder of each voice in the harmony and of each instrument in the orchestra, the utter magic of the orchestration—these things, thanks in part to Dr. Muck and Mme. Gadski, were realized again, so deeply as to make futile any effort to communicate the result.

The spirit of the great Richard Wagner cast its shadow over everything else on the programme and overwhelmed everybody in the audience. It is needless to say that there was applause, hearty and long continued. There always is applause at these concerts. But there were those who heard the music long after the applause had stopped.

SICAL AMERICA
New York City
OCT 21 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY YEAR INAUGURATED

Few Changes in Orchestra's Personnel and No Change in its Virtuosity

Bureau of Musical America,
120 Boylston Street,
Boston, Oct. 15, 1916.

TOUT Boston comes back to town for the season. Camp woodpile yields to furnace coal bin, bungalow apron is discarded for kolinsky fur, the "End of a Perfect Day" is silenced by "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," for the symphony concerts have begun! Ladies from the Back Bay, club women from Salem and Milton, eager-eyed students from the conservatory and music schools—yes, 500 "rush" seats are sold at 25 cents each—know what to do with their Friday afternoons now, and gentlemen who are capitalists by day and patrons of the arts by night know where to go on the Sabbath eve.

"House Sold Out" was the proud story of the first pair of concerts, and even the august correspondent of MUSICAL AMERICA had to take the first course or two of the feast standing up. This awkward position, however, had its advantages, for he alone of that vast audience heard the fatherly word of welcome and advice given by Mr. Higginson to his boys just as they were ready to walk upon the platform on Saturday night. His only word of regret was that Sadony, the popular bassoonist, had been called away by death. The place has been assigned to J. Mosbach, formerly contrabassoonist of the orchestra. The contrabassoonist's chair is now filled by M. Fuhrmann, formerly third bassoonist, whose place in turn has been taken by B. Piller. The only other change in personnel is due to the resignation of M. Koessler, first violin. S. Rosen has been engaged for the second-violin section, and Maurice Gruenberg has been transferred from second to first violin. Mr. Gruenberg is a graduate of Harvard College, a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler, and one of the most capable of the younger musicians of Boston.

The program traversed, as H. T. P. is wont to say in The Transcript, Beethoven's "Eroica," Berlioz's little-known overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's flamboyant "Mazeppa," and Strauss's masterly "Till Eulenspiegel." The excursion took all of two hours, at a pace ranging from funeral tread to the flight of a mad steed, but for the concerts of the 20th and 21st we have the official promise of better time.

Some of the audience wondered whether Dr. Muck had not used bad judgment in placing the Berlioz and the Liszt numbers in juxtaposition on the program; others supposed it was to show how much more convincingly Liszt had treated his theme. Others again expressed surprise at the absence from the program of an In Memoriam of Professor Royce, whose general knowledge of music and particular love of the German masters were second only to his superlative insight into philosophy. But no one marveled at the nobility of the interpretation of the "Eroica," the virtuosity of the execution of "The Corsair," or the poetry in the reading of the Strauss tone-poem. For were they not listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was not the orchestra obeying the will of Dr. Karl Muck?

The program book is fat with the promise of good things to come: Four Kneisel concerts, four Flonzaleys, Carreño (her only recital in Boston this season), Levitski (début), Kreisler (with that excellent Boston musician, Carl Lamson, as accompanist), Alda-deLuca-Pasternack, and a glittering array of singers, pianists and violinists.

Ethel Leginska gave the first of two Boston recitals at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, before an enthusiastic audience. Though austere in appearance, the program proved to be varied and not too "classic" for the taste of her hearers. Mme. Leginska was at her best in the less emotional numbers, executing the Brahms Variations on a theme by Paganini with a clearness and variety that made one wonder whether after all this art-form was really invented merely to show the learning and mathematical skill of the composer and the technique of the performer! Mme. Leginska strives hard for "atmosphere," pays much attention to stage lighting (or rather, darkening), pose at the piano, tossing of arms at the close of a movement. Would it not be wiser to put this striving into the musical interpretation of the work in hand?

HENRY L. GIDEON.

From Bulletin
Address: Providenc
Date OCT 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND KREISLER HERE IN FINE CONCERT

105 Players Work in Programme Which Opens 36th Season in This City.—Violinist Gives New Concerto by Schelling. — Solo Part Difficult.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 36th season in Providence last evening in Infantry Hall. There were many new faces to be seen, the reason being that for the first time in the history of the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city they brought their full number of players. To be exact, there were 105 men playing under Dr. Muck last evening which is about 25 more than ordinarily has been the case in seasons past. An enlargement of the stage was necessary in order to accommodate the extra number.

Although the programme contained but three numbers, the concert was a little longer than is usual, because of the length of the "Eroica" symphony.

Fritz Kreisler appeared as soloist, playing a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished piano virtuoso. The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler during the past summer, while the composer was at Bar Harbor, Me. This was the first public performance of the work and Mr. Schelling sat among the audience.

The programme follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Concerto for violin and orchestra..... Schelling
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6..... Liszt

Kreisler's playing of the new Schelling concerto was an interesting event. The concerto, which is in one movement, is unlike any violin work of its kind that we have ever heard. In character it is extremely modern. Many and violent are its changes of key. Its orchestration glitters with strange and bizarre coloring. The solo instrument is not given the prominence one expects to hear in a violin concerto. It is but a restless voice in the orchestral ensemble. Melodies are few, but in that portion of the work that serves for a slow movement there is a few measures of legato for the soloist, accompanied by harp and wood wind. At the end is a bright dance movement, which, however, is more rythmical than melodious.

The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," which is a tone picture of the frightful ride so graphically told by Victor Hugo and Byron. The orchestra played it in stirring fash-

rom NORTH AMERICAN
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate OCT 20 1916

NON-UNION ORCHESTRA MAY MEET LABOR SNAG

Organized Stage Workers of Academy a Danger to Boston Symphony Schedule

SERIES OPENS OCT. 30

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this city October 30 for the first of its series of five concerts, it may encounter a serious snag in the recently unionized stage hands of the Academy of Music.

The Boston organization is the only big orchestra in the country which is still non-union. By importing a number of its players, and offering musicians in this country large salaries and the advantages of an old-age pension, it has been able to keep its men outside the ranks of organized musicians. It also maintains non-union stage hands in Symphony Hall, its Boston home, and has found auditoriums employing non-union men for all of its concert tours.

What action the officers of the local stage hands union will take with respect to its concerts here this season has not been determined. There is talk of a temporary agreement which will postpone the issue until next year. But the International Alliance of Stage Employes has been considerably strengthened in the last year, and the Boston organization is gradually being put in a position where its men and Doctor Muck, its conductor, must either join the union or confine their operations to their home city.

Union men said yesterday that they had no desire to embarrass either the management of the Academy or its employes, some of whom have held their places for a score of years. The whole matter, they said, may finally be decided by the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor at Baltimore next month.

From HERALD BROOKLYN
Address: New York City
Date Oct 22/16 OCT

The great point of interest in the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote last summer specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler, of course, will play it at this concert. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening and in Boston Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes two variations from his symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

[illegible] will give another of

rom HERALD BROOKLYN EDI
ddress: New York City
Oct 29, 1916 OCT

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The orchestra returns with almost unchanged personnel. Last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach. The orchestra began its season's work in Boston on October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for the first concert. It contains two novelties, one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler at his request last summer while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra October 10, the second rehearsal of the season. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement, which might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulations; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra," played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modelled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critic and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm, and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and thus established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson. The other numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richards Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The programme in its proper order is as follows:—Chausson—Symphony in B flat; Wagner—A Faust Overture; Schelling—Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time here); R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

[illegible]
EVENING NEWS,
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 22

On November 1 Fritz Kreisler, a supreme artist if there be one living, will pay his premier visit of the season to the city.

He will play at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric and it is a foregone conclusion that he will be greeted by a tremendous audience.

The number he is to play is a new Concerto by Ernest Schelling, the American composer-pianist, whose symphonic suite for orchestra and piano, "Impressions from an Artist's Life," it was the good fortune of Baltimoreans to hear last winter.

It was played by the Boston Symphony and the composer, and proved one of the most vitally interesting and individual new works that has been heard here in a long time.

The violin Concerto was written especially for Kreisler and is based on themes from the "Impressions." It is a short work, requiring only about a quarter of an hour. Dr. Muck will present as the principal orchestral number Schumann's seldom-heard "Rhenish" Symphony.

[31]

From the Advertiser
Oct.28,1916.

GERMAN SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Performance Most Virile—Fully Appreciated and Much Applauded

MME. GADSKI EFFECTIVE IN WAGNER NUMBERS

Dr. Muck, Orchestra and Soloist Fairly Surpassed Themselves, Says Prof. Elson

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Schumann—Third Symphony, "Rhenish."
Wagner—"Isolde's Narrative to Brangaene." Mme. Gadski, soloist.
Beethoven—Fugue for String Orchestra. Op. 133.
Wagner—Prelude and Liebestod, "Tristan and Isolde." Mme. Gadski, soloist.

Vincent D'Indy believes that we in America should discard German music and discharge German musicians, but we think that even he would have been converted by the concert of yesterday. It was German from top to toe, and it was performed in a manner that went even beyond our orchestra's standard. Schumann's E-flat symphony is a picture of the happy Rhine-life, and one searches in vain for any traces of "Boches," or "Huns," in its measures; on the contrary, there is healthy vigor, "Gemuethlichkeit," and innocent pleasure in almost every part.

The vigor and strength is in the first movement, which has something victorious in almost every division. Schumann could exult as few other composers, and here he is in his most triumphant vein. And Dr. Muck read this with a glory that apotheosized; his interpretation was absolutely wonderful.

The Scherzo is "Gemuethlichkeit" personified. It is not a conventional Scherzo, either in shape or spirit, but it has the real folk-song style that one associates with the sunny vineyards around Bingen and Rudesheim. Schumann was never merely jolly in a Scherzo. In the third movement there is a tenderness and sweetness that Mendelssohn sometimes tried for, in his slow movements, but never accomplished.

Then came the second slow movement, an extra one, picturing Cologne Cathedral and a great festival therein. Schumann, who was often very weak in orchestration, sometimes managed to get effects from the deep brasses that were almost inspired. Such an effect is in the trombone transition from the Larghetto to the Scherzo, in his first symphony, in his "Manfred Overture" and in "Genoveva," and such an effect is here in the suggestion of organ tones and "Feierlichkeit." The splendid contrast between this movement and the Finale, where the people are all coming out of the church and the chatter and bustle of out-door life begins, was finely caught up.

The performance was a most virile one and the work was fully appreciated and much applauded. It is the most typically "German" work that we know of in the whole symphonic repertoire and it will not be abolished, no, not on account of 50 wars.

But we were much less enthusiastic about the "Grand Fugue" by Beethoven. This work was written as the Finale of the string quartette, Opus 130. All the critics found it labored and crabbed, and unsuited to its place, and for once Beethoven agreed with them. Therefore, he wrote the finale of the Quartette in a new form, as it is played today, and that movement was the last composition of his life. The story about the "Farewell to the Piano," "Beethoven's Last Composition," is absolute nonsense and publisher's trickery.

The present fugue was, therefore, intended for a simple string quartette, but it is by no means wrong to magnify it into an orchestral composition. All of Beethoven's latest string quartette music is orchestral music in disguise. But as regards the beauty or worth of the fugue as counterpoint there may still be two opinions. The subject ieself is an awkward one, with its wide skips and brusque progressions. Beethoven was not at ease in sustained counterpoint. One may recall that his contarpuntal teacher, Albrechtsberger, warned other students not to associate with him, because of his musical eccentricities in the strict school. When one hears Bach's counterpoint one never thinks of the difficulties of construction which underlie it, but with Beethoven the case is different; one imagines the composer perspiring, and straining at the work, and continually thinking—"What combination can I make next?"

So it is with this difficult fugue. It was wonderfully played, almost as if the orchestra had been a great solo string quartette, and it was interesting, because of its involved ingenuities, but it was not inspiring music. "Tantot libre, tantot recherchee," Beethoven marked it, but it is remarkably free for a string fugue. Such a wriggling bit of complexity Browning must have had in mind when he wrote "Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha."

Of course the long line of people waiting for "rush seats" was not attracted by these two compositions, but by the solo singer. We wish that solo singing could be abolished at these concerts, but if we must have the operatic element brought in it can never be better done than by such a singer as Mme. Gadski, and by such selections as she always gives. Her first number was, however, unusual.

We have never heard Isolde's story of how her acquaintance with Tristan began, given upon the concert stage before. There is no reason why it should not be, for it has scarcely any stage action when given in the opera. And we were glad to hear it thus, for the attention could be given more easily to the orchestral score, when not distracted by Miss Brannigan clasping her hands, or by the knowledge that the helmsman must have been in a very bad humor because Isolde's wide curtain hangings prevented him from steering his ship, or even seeing the bow at all.

And Mme. Gadski was in superb voice and is always a great artist. We were glad to see her receive a most cordial welcome, showing that Boston does not believe in any national boundaries of music. She immediately justified this welcome by her artistic work, and the subsequent applause was remarkably spontaneous.

Her two numbers were possibly the best Wagnerian singing that has ever been heard in Symphony Hall. And the orchestral support was perfection itself. Altogether then this was a memorable concert in which Dr. Muck, the orchestra, and Mme. Gadski fairly surpassed themselves.

From the Post
Oct.28,1916.

GADSKI AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Spirit of Wagner Predominates Great Concert

BY OLIN DOWNE'S

Mme. Johanna Gadski was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She sang Isolde's narrative from Act 1 of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and, following the orchestral performance of the prelude to that opera, the "Liebestod," which concludes the work.

The other orchestral compositions were Schumann's E flat symphony and Beethoven's fugue for strings, op. 133, performed for the first time at these concerts.

SCHUMANN'S CHARM

The Schumann Symphony was charmingly interpreted. It is a charming symphony. "Suite" might be a better term for "symphonic" is an adjective of which this "symphony" is somewhat undeserving.

Some find the fugue of Beethoven, originally a movement of one of the last of the string quartets, intricate and dull. For us it is a very dramatic composition, and with all the freedom of the polyphonic writing, an exceedingly clear and forceful and mighty exposition of the subject matter.

Yet the greatest music on the programme was without a doubt the music from "Tristan." Familiar as they are the Prelude and the "Love-death," under the inspired baton of Dr. Muck and Mme. Gadski's singing, seemed never more amazing.

The incomparable beauty and poignancy of the ideas, the wonder of each voice in the harmony and of each instrument in the orchestra, the utter magic of the orchestration — these things, thanks in part to Dr. Muck and Mme. Gadski, were realized again, so deeply as to make futile any effort to communicate the result.

The spirit of the great Richard Wagner cast its shadow over everything else on the programme and overwhelmed everybody in the audience. It is needless to say that there was applause, hearty and long continued. There always is applause at these concerts. But there were those who heard the music long after the applause had stopped.

SICAL AMERICA
New York City
OCT 21 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY YEAR INAUGURATED

Few Changes in Orchestra's Personnel and No Change in its Virtuosity

Bureau of Musical America,
120 Boylston Street,
Boston, Oct. 15, 1916.

TOUT Boston comes back to town for the season. Camp woodpile yields to furnace coal bin, bungalow apron is discarded for kolinsky fur, the "End of a Perfect Day" is silenced by "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," for the symphony concerts have begun! Ladies from the Back Bay, club women from Salem and Milton, eager-eyed students from the conservatory and music schools —yes, 500 "rush" seats are sold at 25 cents each—know what to do with their Friday afternoons now, and gentlemen who are capitalists by day and patrons of the arts by night know where to go on the Sabbath eve.

"House Sold Out" was the proud story of the first pair of concerts, and even the august correspondent of MUSICAL AMERICA had to take the first course or two of the feast standing up. This awkward position, however, had its advantages, for he alone of that vast audience heard the fatherly word of welcome and advice given by Mr. Higginson to his boys just as they were ready to walk upon the platform on Saturday night. His only word of regret was that Sadony, the popular bassoonist, had been called away by death. The place has been assigned to J. Mosbach, formerly contrabassoonist of the orchestra. The contrabassoonist's chair is now filled by M. Fuhrmann, formerly third bassoonist, whose place in turn has been taken by B. Piller. The only other change in personnel is due to the resignation of M. Koessler, first violin. S. Rosen has been engaged for the second-violin section, and Maurice Gruenberg has been transferred from second to first violin. Mr. Gruenberg is a graduate of Harvard College, a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler, and one of the most capable of the younger musicians of Boston.

The program traversed, as H. T. P. is wont to say in The Transcript, Beethoven's "Eroica," Berlioz's little-known overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's flamboyant "Mazeppa," and Strauss's masterly "Till Eulenspiegel." The excursion took all of two hours, at a pace ranging from funeral tread to the flight of a mad steed, but for the concerts of the 20th and 21st we have the official promise of better time.

Some of the audience wondered whether Dr. Muck had not used bad judgment in placing the Berlioz and the Liszt numbers in juxtaposition on the program; others supposed it was to show how much more convincingly Liszt had treated his theme. Others again expressed surprise at the absence from the program of an In Memoriam of Professor Royce, whose general knowledge of music and particular love of the German masters were second only to his superlative insight into philosophy. But no one marveled at the nobility of the interpretation of the "Eroica," the virtuosity of the execution of "The Corsair," or the poetry in the reading of the Strauss tone-poem. For were they not listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was not the orchestra obeying the will of Dr. Karl Muck?

The program book is fat with the promise of good things to come: Four Kneisel concerts, four Flonzaleys, Carreño (her only recital in Boston this season), Levitski (début), Kreisler (with that excellent Boston musician, Carl Lamson, as accompanist), Alda-deLuca-Pasternack, and a glittering array of singers, pianists and violinists.

Ethel Leginska gave the first of two Boston recitals at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, before an enthusiastic audience. Though austere in appearance, the program proved to be varied and not too "classic" for the taste of her hearers. Mme. Leginska was at her best in the less emotional numbers, executing the Brahms Variations on a theme by Paganini with a clearness and variety that made one wonder whether after all this art-form was really invented merely to show the learning and mathematical skill of the composer and the technique of the performer! Mme. Leginska strives hard for "atmosphere," pays much attention to stage lighting (or rather, darkening), pose at the piano, tossing of arms at the close of a movement. Would it not be wiser to put this striving into the musical interpretation of the work in hand?

HENRY L. GIDEON.

From Bulletin
Address: Providenc
Date OCT 2 5 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND KREISLER HERE IN FINE CONCERT

105 Players Work in Programme Which Opens 36th Season in This City.—Violinist Gives New Concerto by Schelling. — Solo Part Difficult.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 36th season in Providence last evening in Infantry Hall. There were many new faces to be seen, the reason being that for the first time in the history of the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city they brought their full number of players. To be exact, there were 105 men playing under Dr. Muck last evening which is about 25 more than ordinarily has been the case in seasons past. An enlargement of the stage was necessary in order to accommodate the extra number.

Although the programme contained but three numbers, the concert was a little longer than is usual, because of the length of the "Eroica" symphony.

Fritz Kreisler appeared as soloist, playing a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished piano virtuoso. The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler during the past summer, while the composer was at Bar Harbor, Me. This was the first public performance of the work and Mr. Schelling sat among the audience.

The programme follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Concerto for violin and orchestra..... Schelling
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6..... Liszt

Kreisler's playing of the new Schelling concerto was an interesting event. The concerto, which is in one movement, is unlike any violin work of its kind that we have ever heard. In character it is extremely modern. Many and violent are its changes of key. Its orchestration glitters with strange and bizarre coloring. The solo instrument is not given the prominence one expects to hear in a violin concerto. It is but a restless voice in the orchestral ensemble. Melodies are few, but in that portion of the work that serves for a slow movement there is a few measures of legato for the soloist, accompanied by harp and wood wind. At the end is a bright dance movement, which, however, is more rythmical than melodious.

The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," which is a tone picture of the frightful ride so graphically told by Victor Hugo and Byron. The orchestra played it in stirring fash-

rom NORTH AMERICAN
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 2 0
ate OCT 2 0 1916

NON-UNION ORCHESTRA MAY MEET LABOR SNAG

Organized Stage Workers of Academy a Danger to Boston Symphony Schedule

SERIES OPENS OCT. 30

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this city October 30 for the first of its series of five concerts, it may encounter a serious snag in the recently unionized stage hands of the Academy of Music.

The Boston organization is the only big orchestra in the country which is still non-union. By importing a number of its players, and offering musicians in this country large salaries and the advantages of an old-age pension, it has been able to keep its men outside the ranks of organized musicians. It also maintains non-union stage hands in Symphony Hall, its Boston home, and has found auditoriums employing non-union men for all of its concert tours.

What action the officers of the local stage hands union will take with respect to its concerts here this season has not been determined. There is talk of a temporary agreement which will postpone the issue until next year. But the International Alliance of Stage Employes has been considerably strengthened in the last year, and the Boston organization is gradually being put in a position where its men and Doctor Muck, its conductor, must either join the union or confine their operations to their home city.

Union men said yesterday that they had no desire to embarrass either the management of the Academy or its employes, some of whom have held their places for a score of years. The whole matter, they said, may finally be decided by the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor at Baltimore next month.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date Oct 22/16 OCT

The great point of interest in the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, November 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which this distinguished American composer wrote last summer specifically for Fritz Kreisler and at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler, of course, will play it at this concert. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening, was played again in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening and in Boston Friday and Saturday. It will be played by Mr. Kreisler at the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The concerto is short, consuming only sixteen minutes. It is in one movement and is extraordinarily melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for two of his themes two variations from his symphonic variations for piano and orchestra which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

rom HERALD
ddress: New York City
Oct 29, 19

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The orchestra returns with almost unchanged personnel. Last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach. The orchestra began its season's work in Boston on October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for the first concert. It contains two novelties, one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This is the only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler at his request last summer while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra October 10, the second rehearsal of the season. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement, which might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulations; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra," played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modelled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critic and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm, and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and thus established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson. The other numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richards Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The programme in its proper order is as follows:—Chausson—Symphony in B flat; Wagner—A Faust Overture; Schelling—Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time here); R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

EVENING NEWS.
Baltimore, Md.
OCT

On November 1 Fritz Kreisler, a supreme artist if there be one living, will pay his premier visit of the season to the city.

He will play at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric and it is a foregone conclusion that he will be greeted by a tremendous audience.

The number he is to play is a new Concerto by Ernest Schelling, the American composer-pianist, whose symphonic suite for orchestra and piano, "Impressions from an Artist's Life," it was the good fortune of Baltimoreans to hear last winter.

It was played by the Boston Symphony and the composer, and proved one of the most vitally interesting and individual new works that has been heard here in a long time.

The violin Concerto was written especially for Kreisler and is based on themes from the "Impressions." It is a short work, requiring only about a quarter of an hour. Dr. Muck will present as the principal orchestral number Schumann's seldom-heard "Rhenish" Symphony.

(Record Staff Photographer)

Waiting to Purchase Concert Tickets

A typical scene outside Symphony Hall on a big soloist day at the Symphony concert. Gadski sang this time. Women brought their knitting and also their lunches as they came to get a good place in the line for the "rush seats." It is a typical Boston scene.

From MUSICAL COURIER
Address: New York City
Date OCT 19 1916

Marcia van Dresser's New York and Boston Appearances

Marcia van Dresser, soprano of the Chicago Opera Association, who appeared successfully with the New York Symphony Orchestra and in her own recitals last year, will be heard for the first time this season at Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon, October 21. Miss van Dresser has prepared a new and interesting program for that date. Richard Epstein, who has previously appeared with Miss van Dresser, will again be accompanist at this recital.

Miss van Dresser also has been engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at one of its concerts in Hartford. This artist achieved much popularity at her recital last season in Boston, when she replaced Mme. Schumann-Heink at one of the Ellis Sunday afternoon concerts. She was immediately re-engaged for a recital, and will be heard in Boston November 6, before she starts for her second Chicago opera season.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 26 1916

WHET YOUR MUSICAL APPETITE WITH A FORETASTE OF KREISLER

Beautiful Records Offered Concertgoers of the Violinist's Own Compositions and Solo Numbers in Phonographic Form

By the Phonograph Editor

One of the inestimable advantages of owning a phonograph is that you can whet your musical appetite, at comparatively small cost and with little trouble, when famous artists are coming to town in opera, or recital, or as soloists with the visiting orchestras, or the Philadelphia organization, under Mr. Stokowski.

Fritz Kreisler, without question the most admired violinist of these times, now that Eugen Ysaye is out of the public eye, will be here soon, first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night in the Academy, and again on November 11 in a recital. Perhaps you have in your cabinet some of Kreisler's best records, and haven't played them for a long time, because you were busy keeping up with the new stuff offered you by the companies monthly. If so, why not get out the offerings of this artist and refresh your memory before you go to hear him play with Doctor Muck or at the recital? Or, perhaps, you haven't any Kreisler records in your collection. It might be a good idea to have some of them played for you. We think you will find that a comparison between the disc-reproduction and the reality throws no dijsteem on the former.

Besides being a great interpreter, Kreisler is a composer of decided merits, and one of his most beloved trifles has, curiously enough, been recorded by another artist of towering artistic stature—Ysaye. The effervescent "Caprice Viennois" is a Columbia feature of unusual merit, combining, as it does, the Austrian's composition with the Belgian's "reading" of it. It is a strange conjunction of nationalities, but quite fitting. In music there are no wars, only talents, as someone has said.

Kathleen Parlow, well known to Philadelphia concert frequenters, has recorded for the Columbia Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Her method and technique make a pertinent study in relation to Ysaye and the composer. That is still another thing your phonograph can do for you—teach you the differences and likenesses of violinists, for you can have a threefold concert all to yourself, whereas, were you to wait for the appearances here of Miss Parlow, Ysaye and Kreisler, you might have had your critical sense blunted by the week-long stretches between their various engagements.

The Victor has a long list of records made by Kreisler, varying in mood and length from the airy bits of melodic fluff such as the "Caprice Viennois" and his own "Tambourin Chinois" to Haydn's Austrian hymn and the big Bach concerto for two violins, in which Efrem Zimbalist is the other player. Some of the loveliest pieces of Kreisler violinistic work, from the purely melodic viewpoint, are the "Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane," a re-creation from Couperin; Brahms's fifth Hungarian dance; the exquisite and touching "Indian Lament," of Dvorak; Schubert's "Moment Musical" and "The Swanee River." There are several others of equal merit and more elaboration to choose from.

Incidentally it may be mentioned that novelties are promised by Mr. Kreisler for his appearances with the Boston and by himself. Probably it will not be many weeks before the astute phonograph men, who are not slow in sensing popular trends, are offering their public these new numbers. Be on the lookout for them.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Oct. 29, 1916

the eminent character of his work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect. It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, that very gifted composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 29 191

NEW CONCERTO TO BE HEARD.

Composed by Schelling at Request of Kreisler.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music the evening of Nov. 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which he wrote last summer at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at the concert. This will be his only appearance here with orchestra this season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening. It was played in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday evenings.

The concerto is short, requiring only 16 minutes. It is in one movement, and is uncommonly melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for his themes two variations from his "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From the Globe
Oct. 29, 1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson Symphony.

m EVENING JOURNAL
ress: New York City
Oct 30, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." At the matinee concert the programme will consist of Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Faust Ouverture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra" and Brahms's Variations on a Theme

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N.Y.
OCT 29 1916

FRITZ KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Will Be Soloist Friday Evening at Its First Concert of the Season—Will Play Concerto Written Last Summer by Ernest Schelling—An Attractive Programme Arranged.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices gives the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years it first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, Oct. 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This, it is almost needless to say, will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with the orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kriesler, at his request, last summer, while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 10, at the second rehearsal of the season. It had its first performance in Providence, R. I., Oct. 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, and its third and fourth, in Boston, Oct. 20 and 21. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critics and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in Z flat by Ernest Chausson that very gifted French composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first to play this symphony in America in November, 1904, in Philadelphia, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, who was in this country conducting a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest. Later it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a fine work, one of really great ideas and brilliantly orchestrated.

The other numbers on the programme will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat (Chausson); "A Faust Overture" (Wagner); concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling); "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date OCT 28

Orchestral Concerts

MR. MUCK, who is recent years has been astonishing and delighting the Bostonians with his splendid interpretations of the masterworks of Liszt (just as Josef Stransky has the Philharmonic audiences in this city), will bring to Carnegie Hall next Thursday Liszt's "Mazeppa," which Professor Spaeth, in his excellent "History of Programme Music," justly calls "the most daring piece of tone-painting in existence." The same programme will include Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Saturday afternoon programme will include Chausson's B-flat Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," Beethoven's Grand Fugue for String Orchestra, and Brahms's Variations on a Haydn Choral.

m HERALD
dress: New York City

NOW that the Ballet Russe has gone and a week intervenes before the Boston National Opera Company comes to open the operatic season, those who give concerts are putting in their best efforts, and the number of musical entertainments for this week surpasses all records for October.

On Thursday night and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Carnegie Hall for its first pair of concerts. Dr. Karl Muck still is the director. There will be no soloist at either concert. Thursday's programme includes Beethoven's symphony No. 3, Liszt's symphony poem, "Mazeppa;" Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." On Saturday Chausson's symphony in B flat, Wagner's "Faust" overture, Beethoven's grand fugue for string orchestra, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn will be played.

* * *

Newspaper
om AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDITI
ddress: New York City
te OCT 29 1916

Boston Symphony Has Two New Members

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives, under Institute auspices, the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins, and last month the orchestra lost by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

From the Post
Oct. 29, 1916.

Symphony Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight (Sunday) on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson symphony.

n TIMES
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 28 19

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The Orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

Dr. Muck has arranged two novelties; one a very interesting Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play.

From the Record
Oct. 27, 1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Sunday night on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist.

[32]

(Record Staff Photographer)

Waiting to Purchase Concert Tickets

A typical scene outside Symphony Hall on a big soloist day at the Symphony concert. Gadski sang this time. Women brought their knitting and also their lunches as they came to get a good place in the line for the "rush seats." It is a typical Boston scene.

From MUSICAL COURIER
Address: New York City
Date OCT 19 1916

Marcia van Dresser's New York and Boston Appearances

Marcia van Dresser, soprano of the Chicago Opera Association, who appeared successfully with the New York Symphony Orchestra and in her own recitals last year, will be heard for the first time this season at Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon, October 21. Miss van Dresser has prepared a new and interesting program for that date. Richard Epstein, who has previously appeared with Miss van Dresser, will again be accompanist at this recital.

Miss van Dresser also has been engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at one of its concerts in Hartford. This artist achieved much popularity at her recital last season in Boston, when she replaced Mme. Schumann-Heink at one of the Ellis Sunday afternoon concerts. She was immediately re-engaged for a recital, and will be heard in Boston November 6, before she starts for her second Chicago opera season.

Newspaper
om AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDITI
ddress: New York City
te OCT 29 1916

Boston Symphony Has Two New Members

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives, under Institute auspices, the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins, and last month the orchestra lost by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 30 1916

WHET YOUR MUSICAL APPETITE WITH A FORETASTE OF KREISLER

Beautiful Records Offered Concertgoers of the Violinist's Own Compositions and Solo Numbers in Phonographic Form

By the Phonograph Editor

One of the inestimable advantages of owning a phonograph is that you can whet your musical appetite, at comparatively small cost and with little trouble, when famous artists are coming to town in opera, or recital, or as soloists with the visiting orchestras, or the Philadelphia organization, under Mr. Stokowski.

Fritz Kreisler, without question the most admired violinist of these times, now that Eugen Ysaye is out of the public eye, will be here soon, first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night in the Academy, and again on November 11 in a recital. Perhaps you have in your cabinet some of Kreisler's best records, and haven't played them for a long time, because you were busy keeping up with the new stuff offered you by the companies monthly. If so, why not get out the offerings of this artist and refresh your memory before you go to hear him play with Doctor Muck or at the recital? Or, perhaps, you haven't any Kreisler records in your collection. It might be a good idea to have some of them played for you. We think you will find that a comparison between the disc-reproduction and the reality throws no disteem on the former.

Besides being a great interpreter, Kreisler is a composer of decided merits, and one of his most beloved trifles has, curiously enough, been recorded by another artist of towering artistic stature—Ysaye. The effervescent "Caprice Viennois" is a Columbia feature of unusual merit, combining, as it does, the Austrian's composition with the Belgian's "reading" of it. It is a strange conjunction of nationalities, but quite fitting. In music there are no wars, only talents, as someone has said.

Kathleen Parlow, well known to Philadelphia concert frequenters, has recorded for the Columbia Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Her method and technique make a pertinent study in relation to Ysaye and the composer. That is still another thing your phonograph can do for you—teach you the differences and likenesses of violinists, for you can have a threefold concert all to yourself, whereas, were you to wait for the appearances here of Miss Parlow, Ysaye and Kreisler, you might have had your critical sense blunted by the week-long stretches between their various engagements.

The Victor has a long list of records made by Kreisler, varying in mood and length from the airy bits of melodic fluff such as the "Caprice Viennois" and his own "Tambourin Chinois" to Haydn's Austrian hymn and the big Bach concerto for two violins, in which Efrem Zimbalist is the other player. Some of the loveliest pieces of Kreisler violinistic work, from the purely melodic viewpoint, are the "Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane," a re-creation from Couperin; Brahms's fifth Hungarian dance; the exquisite and touching "Indian Lament," of Dvorak; Schubert's "Moment Musical" and "The Swanee River." There are several others of equal merit and more elaboration to choose from.

Incidentally it may be mentioned that novelties are promised by Mr. Kreisler for his appearances with the Boston and by himself. Probably it will not be many weeks before the astute phonograph men, who are not slow in sensing popular trends, are offering their public these new numbers. Be on the lookout for them.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT. 29, 1916

the eminent character of his work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect. It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, that very gifted composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 29 191

NEW CONCERTO TO BE HEARD.

Composed by Schelling at Request of Kreisler.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music the evening of Nov. 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which he wrote last summer at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at the concert. This will be his only appearance here with orchestra this season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening. It was played in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday evenings.

The concerto is short, requiring only 16 minutes. It is in one movement, and is uncommonly melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for his themes two variations from his "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

m EVENING JOURNAL
ress: New York City
Oct 30, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." At the matinee concert the programme will consist of Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra" and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

From the Globe
Oct.29,1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson Symphony.

CITIZEN
: Brooklyn, N.Y.
OCT 29 1916

FRITZ KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Will Be Soloist Friday Evening at Its First Concert of the Season—Will Play Concerto Written Last Summer by Ernest Schelling—An Attractive Programme Arranged.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices gives the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years it first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, Oct. 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This, it is almost needless to say, will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with the orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler, at his request, last summer, while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 10, at the second rehearsal of the season. It had its first performance in Providence, R. I., Oct. 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, and its third and fourth, in Boston, Oct. 20 and 21. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critics and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in Z flat by Ernest Chausson that very gifted French composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first to play this symphony in America in November, 1904, in Philadelphia, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, who was in this country conducting a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest. Later it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a fine work, one of really great ideas and brilliantly orchestrated.

The other numbers on the programme will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat (Chausson); "A Faust Overture" (Wagner); concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling); "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Orchestral Concerts

MR. MUCK, who is recent years has been astonishing and delighting the Bostonians with his splendid interpretations of the masterworks of Liszt (just as Josef Stransky has the Philharmonic audiences in this city), will bring to Carnegie Hall next Thursday Liszt's "Mazeppa," which Professor Krehbiel, in his excellent "History of Programme Music," justly calls "the most daring piece of tone-painting in existence." The same programme will include Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Saturday afternoon programme will include Chausson's B-flat Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," Beethoven's Grand Fugue for String Orchestra, and Brahms's Variations on a Haydn Choral.

From the Post Oct.29,1916.

Symphony Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight (Sunday) on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson symphony.

m HERALD
ress: New York City

n TIMES
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOW that the Ballet Russe has gone and a week intervenes before the Boston National Opera Company comes to open the operatic season, those who give concerts are putting in their best efforts, and the number of musical entertainments for this week surpasses all records for October.

On Thursday night and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Carnegie Hall for its first pair of concerts. Dr. Karl Muck still is the director. There will be no soloist at either concert. Thursday's programme includes Beethoven's symphony No. 3, Liszt's symphony poem, "Mazeppa;" Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." On Saturday Chausson's symphony in B flat, Wagner's "Faust" overture, Beethoven's grand fugue for string orchestra, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn will be played.

* * *

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The Orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

Dr. Muck has arranged two novelties; one a very interesting Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play.

From the Record Oct.27,1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Sunday night on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist.

[32]

(Record Staff Photographer)

Waiting to Purchase Concert Tickets

A typical scene outside Symphony Hall on a big soloist day at the Symphony concert. Gadski sang this time. Women brought their knitting and also their lunches as they came to get a good place in the line for the "rush seats." It is a typical Boston scene.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

WHET YOUR MUSICAL APPETITE WITH A FORETASTE OF KREISLER

Beautiful Records Offered Concertgoers of the Violinist's Own Compositions and Solo Numbers in Phonographic Form

By the Phonograph Editor

One of the inestimable advantages of owning a phonograph is that you can whet your musical appetite at comparatively small cost and with little trouble, when famous artists are coming to town in opera, or recital, or as soloists with the visiting orchestras, or the Philadelphia organization, under Mr. Stokowski.

Fritz Kreisler, without question the most admired violinist of these times, now that Eugen Ysaye is out of the public eye, will be here soon, first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night in the Academy, and again on November 11 in a recital. Perhaps you have in your cabinet some of Kreisler's best records, and haven't played them for a long time, because you were busy keeping up with the new stuff offered you by the companies monthly. If so, why not get out the offerings of this artist and refresh your memory before you go to hear him play with Doctor Muck or at the recital? Or, perhaps, you haven't any Kreisler records in your collection. It might be a good idea to have some of them played for you. We think you will find that a comparison between the disc-reproduction and the reality throws no disteem on the former.

Besides being a great interpreter, Kreisler is a composer of decided merits, and one of his most beloved trifles has, curiously enough, been recorded by another artist of towering artistic stature—Ysaye. The effervescent "Caprice Viennois" is a Columbia feature of unusual merit, combining, as it does, the Austrian's composition with the Belgian's "reading" of it. It is a strange conjunction of nationalities, but quite fitting. In music there are no wars, only talents, as someone has said.

Kathleen Parlow, well known to Philadelphia concert frequenters, has recorded for the Columbia Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Her method and technique make a pertinent study in relation to Ysaye and the composer. That is still another thing your phonograph can do for you—teach you the differences and likenesses of violinists, for you can have a threefold concert all to yourself, whereas, were you to wait for the appearances here of Miss Parlow, Ysaye and Kreisler, you might have had your critical sense blunted by the week-long stretches between their various engagements.

The Victor has a long list of records made by Kreisler, varying in mood and length from the airy bits of melodic fluff such as the "Caprice Viennois" and his own "Tambourin Chinois" to Haydn's Austrian hymn and the big Bach concerto for two violins, in which Efrem Zimbalist is the other player. Some of the loveliest pieces of Kreisler violinistic work, from the purely melodic viewpoint, are the "Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane," a re-creation from Couperin; Brahms's fifth Hungarian dance; the exquisite and touching "Indian Lament," of Dvorak; Schubert's "Moment Musical" and "The Swanee River." There are several others of equal merit and more elaboration to choose from.

Incidentally it may be mentioned that novelties are promised by Mr. Kreisler for his appearances with the Boston and by himself. Probably it will not be many weeks before the astute phonograph men, who are not slow in sensing popular trends, are offering their public these new numbers. Be on the lookout for them.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress: New York City
Oct 30, 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." At the matinee concert the programme will consist of Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra" and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

the eminent character of his work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect. It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, that very gifted composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago.

From WORLD
ddress: New York City
Date

NEW CONCERTO TO BE HEARD.

Composed by Schelling at Request of Kreisler.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music the evening of Nov. 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which he wrote last summer at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at the concert. This will be his only appearance here with orchestra this season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening. It was played in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday evenings.

The concerto is short, requiring only 16 minutes. It is in one movement, and is uncommonly melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for his themes two variations from his "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From the Globe
Oct.29,1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson Symphony.

CITIZEN
: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRITZ KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Will Be Soloist Friday Evening at Its First Concert of the Season—Will Play Concerto Written Last Summer by Ernest Schelling—An Attractive Programme Arranged.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices gives the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years it first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, Oct. 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This, it is almost needless to say, will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with the orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler, at his request, last summer, while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 10, at the second rehearsal of the season. It had its first performance in Providence, R. I., Oct. 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, and its third and fourth, in Boston, Oct. 20 and 21. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critics and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in Z flat by Ernest Chausson that very gifted French composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first to play this symphony in America in November, 1904, in Philadelphia, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, who was in this country conducting a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest. Later it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a fine work, one of really great ideas and brilliantly orchestrated.

The other numbers on the programme will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat (Chausson); "A Faust Overture" (Wagner); concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling); "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

orchestral concert

MR. MUCK, who [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a special Programme of the masterworks of Liszt. Gust as Stransky has the Philharmonic [illegible] this week, will [illegible] Carnegie Hall [illegible] Mozart's Abbey Professor [illegible] his ex[illegible] Mass [illegible] the most [illegible] piece [illegible] his existence." The same [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] "Eroica." Liszt's "Mazeppa," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Saturday afternoon programme will include Chausson's B-flat Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," Beethoven's Grand Fugue for String Orchestra, and Brahms's Variations on a Haydn Choral.

m HERALD
lress: New York City

Next week's [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] in October. [illegible] Thursday night and Saturday afternoon [illegible] Karl Muck still is the director. [illegible] will be no soloist at either [illegible] Mozart's "Abbey Professor," Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" will [illegible] symphony in B flat, Wagner's "Faust" overture, Beethoven's grand fugue for string orchestra, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn will be played.

* * *

From the Post
Oct.23,1916.

Symphony Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight (Sunday) on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson symphony.

n TIMES
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The Orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

Dr. Muck has arranged two novelties; one a very interesting Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play.

From the Record
Oct.27,1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Sunday night on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Has Two New Members

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] under Institute auspices, the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins, and last month the orchestra lost by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home

Marcia van Dresser's New York and Boston Appearances

Marcia van Dresser, soprano of the Chicago Opera Association, who appeared successfully with the New York Symphony Orchestra and in her own recitals last year, will be heard for the first time this season at Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon, October 21. Miss van Dresser has prepared a new and interesting program for that date. Richard Epstein, who has previously appeared with Miss van Dresser, will again be accompanist at this recital.

Miss van Dresser also has been engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at one of its concerts in Hartford. This artist achieved much popularity at her recital last season in Boston, when she replaced Mme. Schumann-Heink at one of the Ellis Sunday afternoon concerts. She was immediately re-engaged for a recital, and will be heard in Boston November 6, before she starts for her second Chicago opera season.

Newspaper
om AMERICAN
dress: New York City
ite

(Record Staff Photographer)

Waiting to Purchase Concert Tickets

A typical scene outside Symphony Hall on a big soloist day at the Symphony concert. Gadski sang this time. Women brought their knitting and also their lunches as they came to get a good place in the line for the "rush seats." It is a typical Boston scene.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 26 1916

WHET YOUR MUSICAL APPETITE WITH A FORETASTE OF KREISLER

Beautiful Records Offered Concertgoers of the Violinist's Own Compositions and Solo Numbers in Phonographic Form

By the Phonograph Editor

One of the inestimable advantages of owning a phonograph is that you can whet your musical appetite, at comparatively small cost and with little trouble, when famous artists are coming to town in opera, or recital, or as soloists with the visiting orchestras, or the Philadelphia organization, under Mr. Stokowski.

Fritz Kreisler, without question the most admired violinist of these times, now that Eugen Ysaye is out of the public eye, will be here soon, first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night in the Academy, and again on November 11 in a recital. Perhaps you have in your cabinet some of Kreisler's best records, and haven't played them for a long time, because you were busy keeping up with the new stuff offered you by the companies monthly. If so, why not get out the offerings of this artist and refresh your memory before you go to hear him play with Doctor Muck or at the recital? Or, perhaps, you haven't any Kreisler records in your collection. It might be a good idea to have some of them played for you. We think you will find that a comparison between the disc-reproduction and the reality throws no disteem on the former.

Besides being a great interpreter, Kreisler is a composer of decided merits, and one of his most beloved trifles has, curiously enough, been recorded by another artist of towering artistic stature—Ysaye. The effervescent "Caprice Viennois" is a Columbia feature of unusual merit, combining, as it does, the Austrian's composition with the Belgian's "reading" of it. It is a strange conjunction of nationalities, but quite fitting. In music there are no wars, only talents, as someone has said.

Kathleen Parlow, well known to Philadelphia concert frequenters, has recorded for the Columbia Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Her method and technique make a pertinent study in relation to Ysaye and the composer. That is still another thing your phonograph can do for you—teach you the differences and likenesses of violinists, for you can have a threefold concert all to yourself, whereas, were you to wait for the appearances here of Miss Parlow, Ysaye and Kreisler, you might have had your critical sense blunted by the week-long stretches between their various engagements.

The Victor has a long list of records made by Kreisler, varying in mood and length from the airy bits of melodic fluff such as the "Caprice Viennois" and his own "Tambourin Chinois" to Haydn's Austrian hymn and the big Bach concerto for two violins, in which Efrem Zimbalist is the other player. Some of the loveliest pieces of Kreisler violinistic work, from the purely melodic viewpoint, are the "Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane," a re-creation from Couperin; Brahms's fifth Hungarian dance; the exquisite and touching "Indian Lament," of Dvorak; Schubert's "Moment Musical" and "The Swanee River." There are several others of equal merit and more elaboration to choose from.

Incidentally it may be mentioned that novelties are promised by Mr. Kreisler for his appearances with the Boston and by himself. Probably it will not be many weeks before the astute phonograph men, who are not slow in sensing popular trends, are offering their public these new numbers. Be on the lookout for them.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Oct. 29, 1916

the eminent character of his work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect. It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, that very gifted composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 29 191

NEW CONCERTO TO BE HEARD.

Composed by Schelling at Request of Kreisler.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music the evening of Nov. 3, will be a new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which he wrote last summer at Mr. Kreisler's request. Mr. Kreisler will play it at the concert. This will be his only appearance here with orchestra this season. The concerto had its first performance in Providence, R. I., last Tuesday evening. It was played in Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evening, and in Boston Friday and Saturday evenings.

The concerto is short, requiring only 16 minutes. It is in one movement, and is uncommonly melodious. Mr. Schelling has used for his themes two variations from his "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," which he played here a year ago. The symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From the Globe
Oct. 29, 1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson Symphony.

m EVENING JOURNAL
ress: New York City
Oct 30, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." At the matinee concert the programme will consist of Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture," Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra" and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

CITIZEN
: Brooklyn, N.Y.
OCT 29 1916

FRITZ KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Will Be Soloist Friday Evening at Its First Concert of the Season—Will Play Concerto Written Last Summer by Ernest Schelling—An Attractive Programme Arranged.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices gives the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, Oct. 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties; one a very interesting concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This, it is almost needless to say, will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with the orchestra in Brooklyn.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kriesler, at his request, last summer, while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 10, at the second rehearsal of the season. It had its first performance in Providence, R. I., Oct. 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, and its third and fourth, in Boston, Oct. 20 and 21. The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto has been received with much favor. Critics and lay public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the remarkably beautiful symphony in Z flat by Ernest Chausson, that very gifted French composer who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first to play this symphony in America in November, 1904, in Philadelphia, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, who was in this country conducting a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest. Later it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a fine work, one of really great ideas and brilliantly orchestrated.

The other numbers on the programme will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat (Chausson); "A Faust Overture" (Wagner); concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling); "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date OCT 29

Orchestral Concerts

MR. MUCK, who is recent years has been astonishing and delighting the Bostonians with his splendid interpretations of the masterworks of Liszt (just as Josef Stransky has the Philharmonic audiences in this city), will bring to Carnegie Hall next Thursday Liszt's "Mazeppa," which Professor Krehbiel, in his excellent "History of Programme Music," justly calls "the most daring piece of tone-painting in existence." The same programme will include Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Saturday afternoon programme will include Chausson's B-flat Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," Beethoven's Grand Fugue for String Orchestra, and Brahms's Variations on a Haydn Choral.

m HERALD
ress: New York City

NOW that the Ballet Russe has gone and a week intervenes before the Boston National Opera Company comes to open the operatic season, those who give concerts are putting in their best efforts, and the number of musical entertainments for this week surpasses all records for October.

On Thursday night and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Carnegie Hall for its first pair of concerts. Dr. Karl Muck still is the director. There will be no soloist at either concert. Thursday's programme includes Beethoven's symphony No. 3, Liszt's symphony poem, "Mazeppa;" Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." On Saturday Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Beethoven's grand fugue for string orchestra, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn will be played.

* * *

From Marcia van Dresser's New York and Boston Appearances

Marcia van Dresser, soprano of the Chicago Opera Association, who appeared successfully with the New York Symphony Orchestra and in her own recitals last year, will sing for the first time this season at Aeolian Hall this afternoon, October 21. Miss van Dresser has arranged an interesting program for that date. She has frequently appeared with Miss [illegible] as accompanist at this recital.

[illegible] been engaged as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, at one of its concerts in Carnegie Hall, and achieved much popularity at that time. Miss van Dresser was also heard in Boston, when she replaced Mme. Gadski as soloist with the Ellis Sunday afternoon concerts, and was immediately re-engaged for a recital, which she will give November 6, before she starts on the Chicago Opera season.

Newspaper [illegible]

From the Post Oct. 29, 1916.

Symphony Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight (Sunday) on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Fritz Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist. The symphonies played will be the "Eroica," of Beethoven, the "Rhenish" of Schumann and the Chausson symphony.

om AMERICAN
ddress: New York City
BROOKLYN EDITI
OCT 29 1916

te.....

Boston Symphony Has Two New Members

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives, under Institute auspices, the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins, and last month the orchestra lost by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, October 13, and for thirty weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, forty-eight of which will be in its home city.

n TIMES
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The Orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

Dr. Muck has arranged two novelties; one a very interesting Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play.

From the Record Oct. 27, 1916.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Sunday night on its first Southern trip, giving its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Kreisler, playing the new Schelling Concerto, will appear at all of the concerts except the two in New York, where there will be no soloist.

[32]

From NEWS
Providence, R.
Address:
OCT 1 7 19
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this (Tuesday) evening beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler who has not been heard here with the orchestra for two years. Mr. Kreisler is giving the first performance of Ernest Schelling's new Concerto for violin and orchestra. Musically speaking, this, in itself, is a most important event and matter of record.

The entire orchestra will come to Providence for the first time. The program is as follows:

Beethoven—Syhphony, No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 56.
Schelling—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," No. 6 (after Victor Hugo).

Soloist, Fritz Kreisler

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert for the season before a crowded and brilliant house at the Academy of Music last evening when the new feature of the programme was a concerto for violin and orchestra by Mr. Ernest Schelling which had not previously been performed in this city.

It proved to be a composition of singular originality and unquestionable interest. It is played without interruption in a single movement and alike in its spirit and in its construction it is suggestive rather of the fantasia than of the concerto, but its attentive listener can readily discern its conformity, at least in substance, to the classic model and the appealing contrasts of allegro and andante are liberally and effectively provided. Much of the melodic material which it employs is of peculiar beauty and ingratiating charm, while its harmonic structure is to a marked degree unusual and impressive.

Yet that it furnishes a grateful medium for the exhibition of the solo instrument which it engages, is more than can rightfully be said. The acompaniment is preponderantly supplied by the brasses and the wood wind, the strings being scored for very sparingly and largely pizzicato, but if it was the composer's thought that the violin would thereby attain to a greater prominence, his expectations have not been realized. As a matter of fact, the violin part is to a regrettable measure obscured or hidden by what should have ben the background against which it is projected, and although Fritz Kreisler was the assisting artist, it was only intermittently that he had an opportunity to gratify the audience by an effectual and commensurate exercise of his powers. Too much of the time, even his sonorous tone, was with difficulty distinguishable from the orchestra with which it was too completely blended and combined. In the comparatively few passages where he was heard alone, or virtually so, the consummate perfection of Mr. Kreisler's art was once more impresively exemplified, and the enthusiastic applause which his playing elicited bespoke the admiration of a delighted audience.

The symphony was Schumann's "Rhenish," perhaps the most enjoyable of the four, which received such a highly finished rendition that at the close Dr. Muck felt constrained to call his men to their feet to acknowledge the plaudits of the house. Other numbers on the list were Wagner's somewhat perfunctory "Faust" overture and the "Academic" overture of Brahms. The next of these concerts is announced for Monday evening, November 27, when the symphony will be Brahms' first in C minor and Susan Miller, mezzo-soprano will be the soloist.

From REPUBLICAN
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date OCT 31

[illegible] he was asleep.

Tickets for the Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Auditorium Monday evening, the second of the Ellis series, went on sale at Otto Baab's music house yesterday morning, and there was a good demand for them. It is interesting to note that this year there are but two changes in the personnel of the orchestra. One of these was occasioned by the death of one of its older members and the other by the appointment of another member to a position as a professor of music in a leading university of the middle West.

A meeting of the Beth-El girls' club was held at their room in the Odd Fellows' building Sunday afternoon. Among other important matters was discussed the play, "The Mishaps of Minerva," which the club is to produce soon. A program committee was elected as follows: Miss Sadie Schreiber, Miss Ethel Cohen, Miss Celia Cohen. The ticket committee are: Miss Esther Lasker, Miss Anna [illegible], Miss Lillian Reiner. The club will give a Hallowean banquet for its own members some evening next week.

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1 1916

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra Will Play Beethoven's "Eroica."

Famous Organization Will Give First Local Concert Of The Season At Lyric.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55), which will be given at the Lyric tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when that famous organization will give its first local concert of the year, is a gloriously expressive work.

It was commenced in 1803 and finished in 1804. At that time Beethoven's deafness, which had first been noticed in 1796, was growing worse, and he had learned of the hopelessness of his love for Giulietta Guicciardi, afterward Countess von Gallenberg.

It was, as everybody knows, his passion for Giulietta that inspired what may be termed his first autobiographical work—the Sonata in C sharp minor, Op. 27 No. 2—that some editor, in a fit of supreme banality, labeled the "Moonlight."

At this stage of his career he also fell victim of another malady, having been seized with a violent attack of republicanitis.

He came under the spell of that epidemic madness that resulted in the apotheosis of Napoleon Bonaparte.

—✣—

It was this outburst of hero-worship that gave birth to the Third Symphony. Across the title page Beethoven wrote the despot's name, and it is said sent him a copy of the score.

Before it was received, however, Bonaparte had become Napoleon, l'Empereur. This fact, of course, was enough to knock the republican props from under anybody. Beethoven tore the title from his symphony, and has come down the "Eroica" instead of the "Napoleon Bonaparte."

—✣—

Another work on tonight's program is Strauss' splendid tone poem in the nature of a mighty Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Dr. Muck reads Strauss delightfully and it is probable that the performance of this will be as notable as formance of the sublime "Tod Und Verklarung" and "Don Quixote" last season.

Even the most stolid of the conservatives admitted of the latter that they could "make out" the bleating of sheep in the episode describing the Knight's furious onslaught on the peaceful flock.

What a pity it is Strauss has not seen fit to delineate the wagging of long ears and devise a motif for the accompanying brays! He is sufficiently astute and of all musicians living he has most cause to yield to such a delicious temptation.

—✣—

But getting back. "Till" has a program drawn from a mediaeval German jokebook. The hero is a clownish rascal who pokes all manner of fun at his contemporaries in the most irreverant manner.

His antics, especially when disguised by the cloth, are as ridiculous as those of some privileged buffoon of modern times, say a Billy Sunday. He is finally convicted and condemned to death, but at the moment of execution he miraculously escapes.

Strauss, however, kills him off and we have him reappearing, a particularly impish spook that assures all fellow-spirits that he will live forever in their hearts.

—✣—

The remaining number tonight is the new Concerto for violin and orchestra written by Ernest Schelling and dedicated to the great artist who will play it here for the first time, Fritz Kreisler. JACK DAW.

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 31, OCT

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Will Start Season Here Next Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert of its thirty-second season in Baltimore in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. It is an exceptionally attractive program that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains a very interesting novelty in a concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. The concerto is short and is in one movement. The symphony will be the immortal "Eroica" of Beethoven.

[33]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 31 19

FRITZ KREISLER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brings Forward a Disappointing Concerto in One Movement by Ernest Schelling

PROGRAM
Schumann—Third ("Rhenish") Symphony.
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Schelling—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Brahms—Academic Festival Overture.

A distinguished audience packed the Academy of Music last night to hear the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season—its thirty-second in this city. Many of those present had waited on the sidewalk for several hours, entered expecting a feast, and went away disappointed. The trouble with the concert chiefly was that those who were eager to hear Fritz Kreisler, heard instead a chromatic tour de farce of Ernest Schelling, lasting for twenty-two minutes, which recommended itself only to the extremists of the Gorgonzola school of musical art. Queerer music has been played, and that, too, in the Academy. Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, performed by our own Orchestra last year, is queerer. Mr. Schelling, not quite daring to scale the barrier, has been making faces over the fence at Schoenberg. He tried to be impossible in his scoring for the orchestra, and nearly succeeded. There was a fine Indo-Aryan race riot of clashings and brayings at the start, obviously intensely difficult to play. For the first nine minutes the idiom is pure Jabberwock, to the uninitiated who would (or would not) like to be let in on the secret. Then two harps became industriously important, while the violin embarks upon a lonesome ditty, and then the alleged solo instrument skedaddles through a sequence of dancing tunes of a kind. One was grateful for the thinning out of the briar patch of acrid dissonances.

No one particularly cared to be reminded that two of the episodes were lifted from Mr. Schelling's "Impressions," which the Boston Orchestra played with Mr. Schelling a year ago. It made no difference where they came from. The "Impressions" interested and appealed. There was a great deal of noble music in them. The concerto was at its best in its snatches from the "Impressions." All of which sounds brutally Philistine, and may bring down the wrath of the cognoscenti. But it can't be helped. Mr. Kreisler had no business to play that music to the hungry expectancy of that audience.

The applause that followed for eight minutes might easily have been misinterpreted by the beloved recipient. It was at first in the main a personal tribute to the artist and the man that Kreisler is. It degenerated through campaign-applause into what was close to rowdyism on the part of a few youths in the gallery who thought it funny to see how long they could keep it going.

Doctor Muck, debonair and continent in gesture as ever, ruled the happy lyric moods of Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," which was followed by Wagner's "A Faust Overture." After the concerto the German student tunes jubilated in the "Academic Festival Overture" of Brahms. The personnel of the orchestra this year is very slightly altered. Only a few weeks ago death removed from his post the veteran first bassoonist, Peter Sadony. Joseph Mosbach, his nephew, has taken his place. There is one change among the first violins. The old stage setting of last year appeared, and looked archaic; the arrangement of high terraces was set aside, and the instruments were spread far out toward the uadience, upon the "apron" of the stage. There was a gain in clearness and volume of sound thereby.

The technical distinction of the Boston players may at this date be taken for granted. The audience behaved handsomely in the bestowal of its applause throughout a concert which for all the wonder-work of strings and brasses somehow missed fire and left a sad sense of something wanting.

F. L. W.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
NOV. 2, 1916

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first bow at Carnegie Hall both to-night and Saturday, Karl Muck was departing from his highly specialized repertory of recent years by mixing German composers with French. Last season's newly bound "Boston Symphony Programmes" had fifty-one productions of music from Muck's countrymen, compared to eleven Americans, ten French, nine Russian and four Rumanians, Italians and Poles. This evening Berlioz followed Beethoven, and on Saturday's bill Chausson, like Abou Ben Adhem, "led all the rest."

To-night brought the first of four extra performances of Mozart's two little operas, "Bastien and Bastienne" and "The Impresario," to be given at the Garrick Theatre. The same grand opera cast that carried the productions to a Broadway success last week at the Empire again filled the roles, including Mabel Garrison, Lucy Gates, Albert Reiss and David Bispham. A real harpsichord was promised and the orchestra was led by Sam Franko.

While the Russian Ballet was returning to the Brooklyn Academy to-night, Manhattan had a full concert list besides. Robert Lortat, soldier of France and pianist with Thibaud, was making a matinee bow at Aeolian Hall, followed by William Wheeler, tenor, to-night. Ethel Leginska, pianist, had the day at Carnegie Hall, and Myrtle Moses, mezzo-soprano of the Chicago Opera, was a newcomer this afternoon at the Cort.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date Oct. 31, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY, KREISLER SOLOIST

Eminent Violinist Plays Ernest Schelling's New Concerto. Audience Delighted.

PROGRAM.
Schumann..Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Wagner.....A Faust Overture"
Schelling..Concerto for violin and orchestra (in one movement.)
(New Mss. First time here.)
Brahms.....Overture, "Academic Festival"
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist .....Fritz Kreisler

By Warren C. Cawley.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the thirty-one years that it has been playing in Philadelphia, has had many large audiences, but none to compare with that of last night, when hundreds were unable to gain admission, and the spacious Academy was filled with as large and as fashionable an attendance as ever assembled in that building. It was the first of its unequalled musical treats of the beginning of the thirty-second season.

The real Philadelphia musical lovers were there in full force, and they gave Dr. Muck such a reception as has been rarely accorded even to the eminent conductor of the Orchestra. Following Fritz Kreisler's playing he was recalled so many times that even this greatest of all violin favorites in this city must have been astonished at the show of cordiality that was displayed.

There has been practically no change in the personnel of the Orchestra since last season, and it is this constant association, and the ability to hold the orchestra practically together during the entire year, that has brought about the result of marvelous uniformity of tone, and a thorough response to the baton of the director at the beginning as at the end of a season.

Nor is it difficult to discern wherein lies the results that are obtained by the Boston Orchestra, for the answer is felt instantly Dr. Muck appears and the hold he has acquired in command is never lost until he relinquishes the baton at the end of the program. The Orchestra absorbs all the musical enthusiasm and refinement of its director, and the audience is carried ever to the realization that it is hearing a master's message magnificently presented.

A Fine Program.

Dr. Muck chose an admirable program for his first concert. Both he and the soloist, Mr. Kreisler, are deserving of much praise for having given recognition to an American, in performing, at this concert, a composition by Ernest Schelling, a concerto for violin and orchestra. Mr. Schelling is most familiar to us as a concert pianist, but a Philadelphia audience is not unacquainted with his ability as a composer.

His new concerto was first presented about a fortnight ago in Providence and the general impression last night was that it is a work worthy of the pianist-composer, the Boston Symphony as a program number, and Mr. Kreisler, who is generally considered the greatest of violinists, as its interpreter.

In many respects it is the finest composition of its character ever presented by an American composer to musical literature, and Mr. Schelling is fortunate in having been able to interest this great violinist in its performance, for he not only brought out all of its sublime beauty, but gained for himself another striking proof of the great pleasure that he can afford on his instrument. He was in splendid form.

The concerto sounded somewhat thin, following a Wagner number, and the volumeful Schumann symphony, but it was music of an entirely different character and added variety to the program. Once the audience was brought in full sympathy with it, the many delightful and unique themes that were introduced found fully responsive ears, and the fine and finished art of the soloist carried it to a point of exalted music in which there was a strong and absorbing appeal. The audience may have preferred to have heard its favorite in a work in which his art could have shown more brilliantly, but the long applause that followed its playing indicated the favor of its reception.

The "Rhenish" Admirably Played.

The symphony was Schumann's "Rhenish," in which the composer placed all his powers in the portrayal of the national character. It represents the German nationality of more than half a century ago, but it is equally as characteristic of that nation as we understand it to-day. Dr. Muck is naturally in thorough sympathy with the subject matter of this work, and he gave it that admirable and characteristic reading which showed that he understood and felt its every meaning.

It is music of the most wholesome and direct character and was given by the orchestra with a sweeping volume of tone, with the audience, for the most part, fairly engulfed by the surging waves of beautiful sound. The melodious scherzo was taken with a most judicious pace, and the conductor used good discrimination in carrying through the lento movement, inspired by the Church ceremonial, reading it with the solemnity intended without any effort to make a tragedy out of it.

The two smaller numbers, which were also admirably played, were Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture. With this varied program given in the Boston Symphony's best style, and with Kreisler as soloist, it is easy to appreciate what a wonderful musical treat was enjoyed by last evening's audience.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 31

KREISLER INTERPRETS SCHELLING CONCERTO

Violinist, Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Gives First Rendition Here

GETS HEARTY GREETING

GREAT enthusiasm greeted Fritz Kreisler last night, when he appeared at the Academy of Music as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first rendition here of Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra. This concerto was written for Kreisler last summer and has been played by Kreisler in public only twice before, once at Providence, October 17, and again at Cambridge, Mass., on October 19.

The concerto contains a recitative passage for the violin, accompanied by two harps, which is full of beauty. There is also an interlude toward the end of the movement in the Spanish vein, which was interpreted beautifully by Kreisler. Despite the wonderful orchestration, however, the concerto as a whole lacked unity.

Schumann's Symphony in E-Flat Major No. 3, was interpreted with delicacy and exquisite shading of tone. The second movement contained a lovely trio in which the horns and other wind instruments carry the melody. The ending of the movement, with the horns, strings and wood-wind instruments repeating the two themes of the movement in their original form, was given with Doctor Muck's usual exquisite interpretation.

The third movement, in A-Flat Major, is developed by the clarinets and bassoons over a viola accompaniment. The second theme of the movement, developed from the refrain heard in the first theme, was the most beautiful bit of melody of the whole symphony. The last movement, which is said to portray a Rhenish festival, contains themes reminiscent of the themes in the fourth or cathedral movement.

The two other numbers given by the orchestra were Wagner's Faust Overture and the Academic Festival Overture of Brahms, which is a skillfully made fantasia of the songs of the students at the University of Goettingen.

From the Journal Nov.3,1916.

BRAHMS SYMPHONY TO BE PERFORMED

Dr. Muck's program for the present season of Symphony concerts are of most unusual quality and are giving great satisfaction to the patrons of the concerts. For the fourth pair of concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, he has made another program of great attractiveness. There will be no soloist and only two works will be played. These will be Brahms' symphony in C minor No. 1, which has its regular biennial performance, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The "Scheherazade" has not been heard in Boston since the early days of Mr. Fiedler. Dr. Muck has never before conducted it in this country.

From the American Nov.5,1916.

Dr. Muck's program for the present season of Symphony concerts are of most unusual quality and are giving great satisfaction to the patrons of the concerts. For the fourth concert he has made another program of great attractiveness. There will be no soloists and only two works will be played. These will be Brahm's Symphony in C Minor No. 1 and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Dr. Muck is to give another popular program at the first pension fund concert in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, November 19. He will play the Fourth Symphony and one by Tschaikowsky. The second part of the program will be truly popular music and comprises Weber's "Oberon" overture; the whole of the suite taken from Delibes' ballet "Sylvia"; Johann Strauss' waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," and finally Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

From the post
Oct.29,1916.

It was easy to see why Ernest Schelling's violin concerto, which was heard for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of Oct. 20 and 21, was played twice in other places before the Boston performance. Some wondered why this novelty should have seen the light in Providence and in Cambridge before the Symphony Hall audience was asked for its verdict. The reason was evidently, in the first place, that the orchestration was unusually heavy, and that on account of its rhythmic peculiarities the accompaniment of the work was anything but simple. And yet for once we feel that the labor was not spent in vain.

Too many successful virtuosi, especially those with some influence in high places, such as Mr. Schelling, have their compositions performed with a care that not all masterpieces receive when they are first heard, then the works are shelved forever, or exceptions are made on the occasion of the virtuoso's birthday or some other occasion of the sort, and again the piece disappears. We cannot help feeling that a fate of this kind will eventually befall Mr. Schelling's two pieces for piano and orchestra, which he has performed here on previous occasions with the Boston Symphony, the "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, and the composition, which, though an advance on this work, was for us far less than a composition of great inherent strength, the "Impressions (from an artist's life) in Form of Variations on an Oriental Theme," which was played for the first time in Boston last year. We felt that these pieces contained a great deal of padding and passage work; that there was little that was original either in the ideas or their development, and that Mr. Schelling orchestrated, not as a master of the orchestra, but as a pianist unable to think idiomatically for the instruments. Now, in the work heard 10 days ago, although the orchestration may be subject to certain criticisms and revisions, the whole spirit and execution of Mr. Schelling's conception seems to us importantly and admirably at variance with his former compositions known here.

The ideas ofthe violin concerto are in themselves piquant and unusual; they are handled with real continuity and resource in development; and the feeling for orchestral color is as evident as it is effective. It is very possible that Mr. Kreisler, who was near Mr. Schelling when he composed this concerto last summer in Bar Harbor, exercised powers of revision when it came to the violin part. It would certainly be a reproach to Mr. Schelling's good sense if he did not. But throughout, despite the heaviness of the instrumentation and the complexity of the orchestral part, there is thinking in terms of instrumental color. There is also a harmonic scheme which is unusual and titillating to the ear in its employment of dissonance, and there are real ideas in the work.

Mr. Schelling took one of the best passages of the previously composed "Impressions" when he appropriated the variation therein entitled "Lagoon" for one of the themes of the slow movement of the violin concerto. He also made happy use of the variation he had composed with thought of Mr. Kreisler.

For the rest the themes are new and entertaining. The theme of the introduction, of a type and a color which harmonizes well with the theme of the finale, is ideal for concerto purposes, with its virtuoso flourish. The contrasting theme is fortunately conceived. The finale is an exceedingly happy reminiscence of the singing and the playing of guitars in a Spanish cafe, which Mr. Schelling remembered when he wrote his concerto. Of late seasons we have heard much of Spanish music, and also much of the pseudo-Spanish music. These last pages of Mr. Schelling's concerto are certainly admirable reminiscences of a native scene, not only because of the curious curves of the melodies, which have that Moorish tinge characteristic of much Spanish music, but because of the extremely exciting and unusual rhythms of the accompaniment. All in all, this work ranks for us not only as by far the best thing of Mr. Schelling's which we know, but as a welcome addition to the small list of acceptable compositions for solo violin and orchestra.

From the Advertiser
OOct.26,1916.

The presence of Madame Gadski at this week's Symphony concert has enabled Dr. Muck to put on his program two excerpts from "Tristan und Isolde," which have not been heard here since Dr. Muck has been at the head of the orchestra. The first, Isolde's Narrative to Brangaene, in the first act, has never been done at a Symphony concert, and the "Liebestod," which Madame Gadski will sing at the conclusion of the prelude, has not been heard here in this form in many years. The Symphony will be Schumann's in E-flat No. 3, "Rhenish" and the other orchestral number will be Beethoven's Grand Fugue for string orchestra, Opus 133, which is heard at the Symphony concerts for the first time.

Alma Gluck will carry the entire burden of the program at the third popular concert in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 5. She will sing four groups of songs, classical arias, songs by German composers, songs by Russians and Frenchmen and a group of American songs. Anton Hoff will be her accompanist.

From the
Transcript
Oct.28,1916.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

VIVID WAGNER AND SCHUMANN; DULL BEETHOVEN

Dr. Muck and Mme. Gadski in Eloquent Performance of Two Fragments of "Tristan"—The Rhenish Symphony Recalled to Life, Stride and Voice—The Grand Fugue for Strings Dutifully Played and Heard

If we in Boston may not have Wagner of the music-dramas at the Opera House that now for the most part belies its name, we may at least enjoy an occasional approximation of him at the Symphony Concerts. At long intervals the company of the Metropolian Opera House visits us and assigns three or four performances in a fortnight or three weeks to Wagner. For aught else from his pages we must wait upon Dr. Muck, and the conductor at first was chary. Newly come from a Germany where Wagner's music is as familiar a thing of the theatre as are the musical plays in Boston, he saw no reason to include in the Symphony Concerts more than the composer's purely orchestral pieces and an operatic prelude or two. Gradually, being observant and intelligent, and conforming to the conditions of life in this town, he discovered that unless he put more of Wagner into his programmes his public would know the music-dramas little more than by name and record. Oftener the preludes appeared on his lists; to them he added orchestral fragments from the body of the operas like the apotheosis of Siegfried, the hero in "Götterdammerung" and the music of the Good-Friday magic in "Parsifal." Next came the inclusion of a scene which required a singing-actor's voice—the farewell of Wotan to Brünnhilde at the end of "Die Walküre," sung two or three years ago by Mr. Witherspoon; while yesterday for present climax two numbers of the programme for the third pair of Symphony Concerts were excerpts from the very body and soul of "Tristan." It is fair now to say that Dr. Muck has agreed to detachable speeches for a single voice in the concert-room and with time and patience, we may yet hear Siegfried farewelling Brünnhilde or Siegmund and Sieglinde in amorous ecstasy upon the platform of Symphony Hall.

Of the fragments of Friday in which Mme. Gadski of the Metropolitan was the singer one is curiously seldom transferred to concerts—the long narrative in the first act of "Tristan," wherein Isolde recounts to Brangaene her nursing of the wounded knight, her recognition of him as the slayer of Morold, who loved her; the potent stirring of the fated passion within her, and his subsequent coming to Ireland as Mark's messenger to demand her for an old man's bride. Then, for ending, the music flames with her tortured pride, her high humiliation in rage upon love and destiny. Brangaene, engrossed, overwhelmed, seldom interrupts Isolde's speech, and her brief sayings may be readily excised. The speech itself is nearly self-contained, little dependent upon preceding episode, visible action or pictorial environment. It begins, proceeds, cumulates as puissantly in the concert hall as in the opera house. More; on the stage itself it seldom touches the eloquence of tragic passion with which the conductor, the orchestra and the singer yesterday clothed it.

Once more—and with what inner zest none may say—Dr. Muck was the operatic conductor over as enkindling pages as the whole literature of music-drama contains. The technician, if there was such to take cool thought in the blaze of music and performance, may have marvelled at the skill with which the conductor achieved every mighty stroke of Wagner's orchestra while never once did he overcloud the singer's voice. With like suppleness he kept the music endlessly plastic, running swiftly and unemphatically forward when it merely narrated an incidental fact, only to gather itself, leap and flame at the burning spark of Isolde's passionate woe. Much more than the technician, the conductor who perceives and feels, dramatizes and wings his music, spoke out of those recurring passages in which the orchestra sounds the motiv of fate, irresistible, inevitable, as it were in Isolde's ear or whips her bare emotions with the scourge of the love-motiv indomitable. The singer was like the conductor. Within long memory, Mme. Gadski has not sung in Boston with such magnificence of tone—marred only once by a passing touch of shrillness in a single moment of furious declamation—with such unflagging and adroit opulence of voice, with such keen sense of long sweeps and momentary emphases of her music, with such intensity of color in her song, with such play of the release and characterization of emotion. Freed from the necessity of action and impersonation except in her tones, Mme. Gadski touched a passionate eloquence that usually evades her in the theatre. Perhaps the circumstance of the hour transported her, controlled as she seemed. For once in her career she sang greatly.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSICAL TREATS AT THE ACADEM

Will Be the Boston Symphon Orchestra and the Diaghileff Ballet Russe.

Novelties by Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives under Institute auspices the first concert of its twenty-ninth season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, November 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for eleven years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist. The orchestra will be kept busy for thirty weeks, giving 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in Boston. It is an exceptionally attractive program that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains two novelties: One a Concerto for violin and orchestra, by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. The Concerto was written for Mr. Kriesler at his request, last summer, while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. It is short, taking twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement, which, however, might easily be divided into sections, comprising a first movement, in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an Interlude, based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Scheling's "Variations for Piano and Orhestra," played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an Intermezzo, based on the "Kreisler" variation of the same work from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a Finale in Rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The Concerto has been received with much favor. Critics and lay-public alike have greeted it with enthusiasm and the general feeling is that Mr. Schelling has made a contribution of permanent value to modern musical literature and established himself more firmly than ever as a foremost American composer.

The other novelty, at least so far as the Brooklyn Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned, will be the beautiful Symphony in B-flat, by Ernest Chausson, a gifted French composer, who was killed in an accident seventeen years ago. It is interesting to note that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first to play this Symphony in America in November, 1904, in Philadelphia, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, who was in this country conducting a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a "guest." Later it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a work with great ideas and is brilliantly orchestrated.

The other numbers on the program will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat .....Chausson
"A Faust Overture" .....Wagner
Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time here) .....Schelling
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss

Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 28 191

OPENS ITS SEASON

Kreisler Will Play New Concerto At Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its thirty-second season in Baltimore at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for 11 years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist.

Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting program for this first concert. It contains a novelty in a concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler, at his request, last summer while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August. The concerto is short, playing 21 minutes, and it is in one movement.

The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The other number on the program will be the delightful rondo of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa
Date OCT 29 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, October 30, at 8.15. This will be the thirty-second consecutive season in which the Boston Symphony has helped to enrich the musical life of this city. It returns this year with only two changes in its personnel; one in the first violins and one in the bassoons. The orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death last month Peter Sadony, who for eleven years had been first bassoon of the orchestra. His place has been filled by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach. The orchestra began its season (its thirty-sixth) on October 13, in Boston, the same day that the Philadelphia Orchestra began its work of the year. It has marked out for it the usual thirty weeks with one hundred and ten concerts.

The first concert here provides much of interest and attractiveness. The programme contains an interesting novelty and three standard works which have long been favorites.

The Symphony will be Schumann's Third in E flat major, known as the "Rhenish." It is the first time that this work has appeared on a Boston Symphony programme in Philadelphia in many years, and, in fact, it was played in Boston the past week for the first time in six years.

The second half of the programme calls for "A Faust Overture," by Richard Wagner; Ernest Schelling's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, and Brahm's Overture, "Academic Festival." The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia during the current season.

Mr. Schelling's new concerto has already had four performances. Its first was in Providence, R. I., October 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., October 19, and its third and fourth in Boston, October 20 and 21. The general feeling of the critics as well as of the lay public is that Mr. Schelling has made another most important contribution to the modern literature of music and has made for himself, even more securely, a place among the famous American composers. It seems to be the general opinion, which is backed most enthusiastically by Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler, that this new concerto because of its intrinsic beauty, its skill in construction and its rarely effective orchestral treatment has a permanent value that has been given to few modern works of its kind. It is extraordinarily difficult not only for the solo instrument, but for the orchestra, and Dr. Muck has given to it not less than three entire rehearsals of three hours each since the orchestra came together, October 9.

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3 ..... "Rhenish"
Wagner ..... "A Faust Overture"
Schelling ....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra (First time here).
Brahms—Overture ....."Academic Festival"
Soloist—Fritz Kreisler

ERNEST SCHELLING
Whose Concerto Kreisler is to play tomorrow evening.

FRITZ KREISLER
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the Transcript.
Nov.1,1916.

BEETHOVEN'S FUGUE

A Protest Against the Current View of a Much-Condemned Piece

To the Musical Editor of the Transcript:

In reviewing the symphony concert of last week in your columns, H. T. P. intimated that Beethoven's Grand Fugue, played by Dr. Muck, was dull and uninteresting. "Let us blaspheme contentedly and even joyously," he concluded. "The fugue with which Reger ends his Hiller Variations is a deal more imaginative and eloquent—finer sport and better fun." If the lamented but erudite Mr. Reger made a fugue of another color, that color surely does not, in consequence, become the height of fugal ambition. Further, I should like to reply in behalf of any lovers of Beethoven who share my feelings, that the last pages of the "Grosse Fugue" are imaginative and eloquent in a way surpassed by none but Beethoven himself. Perhaps Beethoven needs no apologist, but there are blasphemers when the "last period" is in question, and at such times one becomes unreasonably indignant, and must have his say.

Let me speak humbly, and as no fit champion of it. But at least let me echo the comments of the great appreciators. Beethoven's last quartets, the Fugue included, may not be popular, they may be intricate, impossible of comprehension with anything less than the minutest study; they may be great subjective enigmas, moody and dark at moments, if spiritually joyous in others. But before the loftiness of the "last period," even Wagner admitted his impotence. Let us at least respect what may be above our heads in its unworldliness. Possibly the Grand Fugue as a whole is less inspired than other movements. Even so, the introduction, the impressive subject itself, the middle portion in G-flat, the glorious close, and perhaps a dozen other parts—any one of these is enough to stamp the noblest composer of them all. Goethe said: "The people make sport of the sublime. If they could see it as it is, they would be unable to bear its aspect."

Thorough musician as Dr. Muck is, surely this blithe passing by of greatness can be traced to his bad taste in placing the Fugue in the programme, for if Mme. Gadski was necessary at that particular concert, the Fugue wasn't. It is bad enough to sever the Fugue from its rightful place at the end of the quartet in B-flat, contrary to the creative instinct of the master, and in accordance with the caprice of a publisher. It is bad enough to drag it from the personal and hushed intimacy of its intended medium into the full glare and splendor of full string orchestra. But on top of these blunders, Dr. Muck finally marred its purity and quiet exaltation by sandwiching it between two portions of "Tristan," in which every excess of emblazoned passion was let loose. Accord with this highest mood of Beethoven requires restful solitude and contemplation both before and after a hearing. The commanding and indelible vividness of "Tristan" of course killed the effect of the Fugue completely.

A LOVER OF BEETHOVEN

PUBLIC LEDGER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 29 1916

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This will be the thirty-second consecutive season in which the Boston Symphony has helped to enrich the musical life of this city. It returns this year with only two changes in its personnel—one in the first violins and one in the bassoons. The orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death last month Peter Sadony, who for eleven years had been first bassoon of the orchestra. His place has been filled by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach. The orchestra began its thirty-sixth season on October 13 in Boston.

The first concert here provides much of interest and attractiveness. The program contains an interesting novelty and three standard works which have long been favorites. The Symphony will be Schumann's Third in E-flat major, known as the "Rhenish." It is the first time that this work has appeared on a Boston Symphony program in Philadelphia in many years, and, in fact, it was played in Boston last week for the first time in six years.

The second half of the program calls for "A Faust Overture" by Richard Wagner, Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra and Brahams's Overture, "Academic Festival." The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia during the current season.

Mr. Schelling's new concerto has already had four performances. Its first was in Providence, R. I., October 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., October 19, and its third and fourth in Boston, October 20 and 21. The general feeling of the critics, as well as of the lay public, is that Mr. Schelling has made another most important contribution to the modern literature of music and has made for himself, even more securely, a place among the famous American composers. It seems to be the general opinion, which is backed most enthusiastically by Doctor Muck and Mr. Kreisler, that this new concerto, because of its intrinsic beauty, its skill in construction and its rarely effective orchestral treatment, has a permanent value beyond that of most modern works of its kind. It is extraordinarily difficult not only for the solo instrument, but for the orchestra, and Doctor Muck has given to it not less than three entire rehearsals of three hours each since the orchestra came together.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish." Schumann
"A Faust Overture" .....Wagner
Concerto for violin and orchestra.....Schelling (First time here.)
Overture, "Academic Festival".....Brahms

[34]

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 29 19

KREISLER TO PLAY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert of its thirty-second season in Baltimore in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, November 1, at 8.15 o'clock. The orchestra returns almost with unchanged personnel. There is a new member of the first violins and last month the orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death Peter Sadony, who had been for 11 years its first bassoon. Mr. Sadony's place has been taken by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach, an admirable artist in every respect.

The orchestra began its season's work in Boston, October 13, and for 30 weeks it will be kept busy, giving a total of 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in its home city.

It is an exceptionally attractive program that Dr. Muck has arranged for this first concert. It contains a very interesting novelty in a concerto for violin and orchestra by the American composer, Ernest Schelling, which Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play. This, it is almost needless to say, will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance with orchestra in Baltimore.

The concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler at his request last summer while Mr. Schelling was in Bar Harbor. The preliminary sketches were made early in July and the work was finished by the end of August and was put in rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra October 10, the second rehearsal of the season. It had its first performance in Providence, R. I., October 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., October 19, and its third and fourth in Boston October 20 and 21. It will have its fifth performance in Philadelphia tomorrow (Monday) evening and will be played in Washington the following day. The concerto is short, playing 21 minutes. It is in one movement, which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the "Kreisler" variation of the same work from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in Rondo form, which is modeled on a Spanish jig.

The symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The other number on the program will be the delightful Rondo of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica."
Schelling—Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time here).
R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Soloist—Fritz Kreisler.

From the Transcript Oct.28,1916.

The otner number from Wagner was the more familiar fragment of the concert-room that joins Isolde's final speech over the dead Tristan to the prelude that begins and epitomizes the whole music-drama. The composer himself made the jointure as though by the addition of the closing scene he would so concentrate and cumulate his epitome. The prelude in itself is an old-new story from Dr. Muck and his orchestra; but yesterday, as it seemed, more than usually dark and ominous was the march of destiny through the 'celli and basses, more than usually intense the mounting phrases of the brighter strings that yet may never catch the intensity of Isolde's, Tristan's and Wagner's passion of desire. Once more, too, in the dreary and unsated end of the prelude, the tone of the orchestra was as the bleak desolation of the music. For if passion lifted the lovers to beatitude, it left them also woful. It is this pain of their passion with which, perhaps, Dr. Muck would accent the music wherein Wagner steadily intensifies the love-motive and accordingly his version of it seem less glowing and sensuous than, for example, is Mr. Toscanini's. As the German conductor feels the music, with mind as well as emotion alight, the desire of Tristan and Isolde is the desire that aches and is sated only to be rekindled by its own pangs as within a burning wound of fate.

The rest—Isolde's final speech—came newly from Dr Muck's hand in like puissance of design, march, detail and climax, in like tragic eloquence of the soul of the woman and the soul of the drama speaking through the many-tongued instruments; while as with the prelude he gave his version an individualizing touch. His Isolde begins almost in piteous wonder and longing. His phrasing and coloring of the orchestral tone in

Seht ihr, Freunde, Säh't ihr's nicht?

make her questioning wring the heart while from this poignant human note, he sweeps the music upward on the pinions of her ecstasy. Nor did Mme. Gadski in Isolde's song fall hardly a whit below the magnificences of voice and the intensities of absorbed and transmitted emotion that had enriched her singing of the narrative. Like Dr. Muck, she did not forget the music and the fullest glory, perhaps, of their two-fold version of this scene of transfiguration was their regard for it as sustained and mounting song, upspringing upon itself to melodic height above melodic height, outpoured from itself in ever-widening melodic flood. After all, there can be a "Tristan" of the concert hall.

From The Transcript Oct. 26,1916.

The third glory of a thrilling concert was the performance of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony for the first time in Boston under Dr. Muck's leading—a performance that renewed the glowing vitality, regained the manifold beauty and struck and sustained the high, romantic note of music that has been dulled and clouded more by the doubts and fears of those that mistrustfully have undertaken it than by its own shortcomings. It is easy to deplore the thickness of the instrumental voices as Schumann has disposed them; his indifference or awkwardness with contrasts of timbres, his persistence with a few tonal colorings, like those which horns and trumpets yield, with a few intervals, like his recurring seconds; his lack of many a brilliance and diversity of orchestration that the composers of our time ply almost in the cradle; the tendency of his expressing hand to lessen the very imaginings that impel it. Soothing himself with such reflections upon Schumann's—and not his own—shortcomings many a conductor merely works his way through the Rhenish Symphony as a duty recurringly done to a dubious classic.

Dr. Muck, almost needless to say, was not so minded. By that unobtrusive elasticity of pace which is one of his most remarkable and least heeded attributes as a conductor, by sensitive regard to the balance of tone from every choir and indeed every instrument; by unfailing plasticity of rhythm and progress, by lucent play with the tonal color, by high transmitting ardor with Schumann's equally ardent moods, as phrase or period or whole movement bore and intensified them—by all these masterful means applied to vividly conceived ends, he set the music free, as it were, from its own bonds. So released, the symphony strode the air in the jubilant and exuberant march of the first movement as elately songful as the leaping allegro of the earlier symphony that carols in the spring So at ease, the scherzo-like second movement ran its undulating or lusty course—the romantic Schumann of the beginning now German to the core in the substance and the style of his music. Next under Dr. Muck's enhancing, the charm (albeit somewhat faded, as the lighter colorings and musings of romantic music will), the lyric interlude of the pretty refrain.

Then the enduring splendors of the last two movements—"the proud and noble music," touched with the exaltation of romantic vision and romantic sensation, that Schumann thought to write—the tonal vista of the great cathedral with the upsoaring Brucknerian phrases (as they might now be labelled) of horns and trumpets and trombones glowing against the stately ecclesiastical harmonies of the background. Here is golden light and shade, Rembrandt like. Close upon it, as though through the porticos of the shadowed cathedral the listeners streamed into the square a-light with the people's fete—a master-stroke of vivid and romantic transition—the brightness, the gayety, the leaping modulations and the frolicking figures of the finale. Schumann heavy-handed? With Dr. Muck to aid in this last allegro he becomes vivacity itself. So went this symphony of high romantic voice and proud romantic stride when there was one to loose its tongue and free its feet.

Perhaps for point of repose in the concert, Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for Strings" lay between the two fragments from "Tristan." It is an old story that it is a fugue that he designed as the finale to one of his last quartets; that at his publisher's suggestion, he rewrote it for orchestral choir; that by them it is occasionally played; and that, if the disputants are so minded, it can be made a pretty text for argument over the wisdom, the effect and the illusion of chamber-music played by multiplied instead of single voices. In the concert-room, however, the listener merely hears out of the background of the moment and might hear—to judge from the experience of yesterday—with much more interest and exhilaration than the music even in eloquent performance brings. There is large and plentiful reiterated or recondite manipulation of the more imposing of the two "subjects." There is songful and suffused lingering over the second of melancholy and lyric voice; a few Beethovenish growls in the darker strings; here and there a long Beethovenish ascension; unexpectedly little play, Bach-wise, with the timbres of the choir and a sudden end as though the composer, like his hearers, had had enough. Let us blaspheme contentedly and even joyously. The fugue with which Reger ends his "Hiller Variations" is a deal more imaginative and eloquent—finer sport and better fun. H. T. P.

EVENING TELEGRAM
ress: New York City
NOV 4 1916
e

For their first matinee of the season this afternoon in Carnegie Hall the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Carl Muck's inspired leadership, give first place in their programme to the Symphony in B flat by the French composer Ernest Chausson.

The first performance of this great work in this country was by the Boston Orchestra, in Philadelphia, with Chausson's countryman, Vincent D'Indy, conducting.

From the Transcript Nov.4,1916.

Saturday evening, Nov. 18, in Symphony Hall, the fifth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, assisting and the programme already specified.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 24, in Symphony Hall, the sixth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. Mozart's symphony in D (No. 35), Brahms's concerto for violin and Smetana's tone-picture, "Wallenstein's Camp," fill the programme. In the concerto, Mr. Witek, first violin of the orchestra, will play the solo part.

Saturday evening, Nov. 25, in Symphony Hall, the sixth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with the programme already listed.

Sunday afternoon Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall, another concert by Mr. Kreisler, now established in American favor beyond any other violinist of his time, by the just deserts of technique, tone, play of sensibility and command of style.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 17, in Symphony Hall, the fifth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, assisting. The programme comprises Sibelius's first symphony, Rachmaninov's concerto in C minor, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "España."

n PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 29 OCT 2

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15. This will be the thirty-second consecutive season in which the Boston Symphony has helped to enrich the musical life of this city. It returns this year with only two changes in its personnel; one in the first violins and one in the bassoons. The orchestra had the misfortune to lose by death last month Peter Sadony, who for eleven years had been first bassoon of the orchestra. His place has been filled by his nephew, Joseph Mosbach. The orchestra began its season on October 13 in Boston, the same day that the Philadelphia Orchestra began its work of the year. It has marked out for it the usual thirty weeks, with one hundred and ten concerts

The first concert here provides much of interest and attractiveness. The programme contains an interesting novelty and three standard works which have long been favorites. The symphony will be Schumann's third in E flat major, known as the "Rhenish." It is the first time that this work has appeared on a Boston Symphony program in Philadelphia in many years, and, in fact, it was played in Boston the past week for the first time in six years.

The second half of the program calls for "A Faust Overture" by Richard Wagner; Ernest Schelling's concerto for violin and orchestra, and Brahms' overture, "Academic Festival." The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia during the current season.

Mr. Schelling's new concerto has already had four performances. Its first was in Providence, R. I., October 17; its second in Cambridge, Mass., October 19, and its third and fourth in Boston, October 20 and 21. The general feeling of the critics as well as of the lay-public is that Mr. Schelling has made another most important contribution to the modern literature of music and has made for himself, even more securely, a place among the famous American composers.

From REPUBLICAN
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date

FIRST CONCERT AT SMITH

Boston Symphony Orchestra Appears in John M. Greene Hall

The first Northampton concert of the fine series of eight arranged for this year's course at Smith college was given last night by the Boston symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall, Dr Muck conducting. The program chosen for the occasion was certainly an unusual one, for it must be allowed that not often is a concert made up as this was entirely of tone portraits. There were four of these pictures, beginning with Beethoven's inspired impressions of Napoleon embodied in the great "Eroica" symphony, No 3, op. 55, followed by Berlioz's brilliant conception of Byron's romantic "Corsair," Liszt's stormy and tragic "Mazeppa" and Richard Strauss's fantastic "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." As the eating is the proof of the pudding, so the hearing of these similar and yet widely dissimilar compositions on the same program proved a tremendous success.

This success may have been partly due to the fact that Dr Muck seemed to be particularly in the mood for bold and brilliant effects last night, or it may have been due to a peculiarly sympathetic rapport between the conductor and orchestra, for so close was the sympathy between players and leader that a great part of the scherzo of the symphony was played without a movement of the baton.

The whole symphony indeed was wonderfully played, the allegro with a splendid dignity, the funeral march with a most satisfactory tempo; it is often hurried, but was given last night with just the right impressiveness and yet with no dragging. The scherzo was played amazingly as has been suggested, with the finale a magnificent climax. If one could forget Dr Muck's marvelous conducting of Strauss, one might say that he is at his best in Beethoven; at least it may be said he is never better than in the great Beethoven works.

From the Globe Nov.5,1916.

Symphony Orchestra In Boston and Cambridge

There will be no soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts this week and only two works will be played. These will be Brahms' Symphony in C minor No. 1, which has its regular biennial performance, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." The "Scheherazade" has not been heard in Boston since the early years of Mr Fiedler and Dr Muck has never conducted it in this country.

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening will mark the debut of Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano, who has been engaged for a series of six concerts with the orchestra in Cambridge, Providence, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

Miss Millar will sing a very interesting air by the 18th century Italian composer, Rinaldo da Capua. The air is from the opera "Vologeso." She will also sing with orchestra three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Die Nacht" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The second and third songs have been orchestrated for her by Andre Maquarre of the Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestral numbers will be Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, the "Grand Fugue" of Beethoven and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

Miss Millar, who will sing at the Cambridge Symphony this week, is a Virginian and a pupil of Mme Sembrich. A considerable part of her girlhood was spent in Germany, where she began her studies under Mme Pappenheim.

HERALD
New York City

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Again; Better Than Ever

Dr. Muck and His Men Delight Great Audience with First Concert of Season and Receive Ovation.

Carnegie Hall was filled to overflowing last night at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The boxes were unusually gorgeous. Mme. Marcella Sembrich, lovely and radiant, was in the first tier, while near by Harold Bauer and Rudolph Ganz listened reverently.

At the door the ushers found great difficulty in restraining late comers from rushing to their places. At times it seemed as if altercations were inevitable. Among those standing the perusal of the symphonic score was popular.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, was in high favor with the audience, which applauded him heartily at his entrance and even more enthusiastically at later opportunities afforded by the natural divisions of the programme. The applause was well deserved, for never has the orchestra been in better form. The strings were unusually brilliant, while the wood winds were more delightful than ever, if such a condition could possibly be. The glorious sonority, the precision, the ffinely balanced tone, the exquisite colorings for which the orchestra long has been famous again compelled unrestrained admiration.

Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, with which the programme began, received a masterly performance. Its interpretation revealed the sublimity of the heroic ideal which dominated Beethoven at the time of its composition. The lovely allegro induced a seraphic mood and this happiness could not be dispelled by subsequent contrasts. From the reaction of the audience, it was evident that Dr. Muck was exercising a wizard's spell. This was especially noted during the scherzo, whose pollity was almost immediately reflected in the smiles of young and old alike.

At the close of the symphony Dr. Muck was repeatedly called out. With unselfish recognition of Anton Witek's fine work as concert master he made the entire orchestra rise to share the applause.

The festive air continued to dominate the house, and in the intermission there were lively reunions, at which expressions of delighted musical comment were heard, until a sharp touch of the baton called a halt to conversation.

The second half of the programme was devoted to a group of pieces which disclosed the marvelous virtuosity of the orchestra. Clear and silvery, with exquisite sheen, was the playing of Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair."

The recent appearance of Waslav Nijinky and the Ballet Ruse naturally heightened interest in Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." When played as it was last night, with fire and whirling rhythm carried to a breathless degree, when glittering tone and brilliant color dazzled the ear rather than the eye, the interest is compounded. Such playing always bring an audience to its feet in ecstatic enjoyment.

STAATSZEITUNG
New York City.
NOV 3 1916

Theater und Musik.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Bostoner, unsere immer gern gesehenen und nach Gebühr geschätzten musikalischen Gäste, eröffneten gestern abend in Carnegie Hall, das mit der geistigen und sozialen Elite unserer Metropole gänzlich besetzt war, den Zyklus ihrer Konzerte, welche uns auch diesmal zwei Serien, eine am Donnerstag abend, die andere am Samstag Nachmittagen, vorführen werden.

Das Eröffnungsprogramm der Saison begann mit Beethoven's „Eroica", um in der zweiten Abteilung mit Berlioz' „Corsaire"-Ouverture, Liszt's „Mazeppa" und Strauß „Till Eulenspiegel" ein ungemein brillante Nummernordnung aufzustellen.

Wenn es wirklich noch eines Beweises bedurft hätte, daß die Bostoner ihresgleichen suchen an künstlerischem Glanz, an blendender Virtuosität und fabelhaftem Zusammenspiel, der gestrige Abend hätte ihn gebracht. Dr. Muck dirigierte die „Eroica" in seiner bekannten objektiven Weise, welche doch das persönliche Mitgehen nicht ausschließt. Besonders schön gelang gestern der Trauermarsch des zweiten Satzes, sowie der Aufschwung im letzten, aber das ganze Werk wirkte in dieser wundervollen Darbietung wie ein Monument, das von schweren Zeiten spricht, aber auch der tröstlichen Hinweise nicht entbehrt. Gespielt wurde es großartig.

Man ist wirklich um Ausdrücke verlegen, um den ganzen Klangzauber und die gediegene Brillanz zu schildern, welche die Bostoner in den virtuosen Aufgaben entfalteten. Es war einfach meisterhaft. Die inhaltlich wenig bedeutende „Corsaire"-Ouverture erklang so recht ungestüm und wild, Liszt's „Mazeppa" brachte unvergeichliche Klangbilder, und im „Eulenspiegel" feierte die Virtuosität wahre Triumphe. Wir können uns wahrhaft glücklich schätzen, in einer Stadt zwei so ragende Aufführungen dieses geistreichsten aller Orchesterscherze genießen zu können, wie sie uns durch die Philharmoniker und die Bostoner geboten werden. Jeder Mann war gestern ein Virtuose; Einzelnes herausgreifen hieße wahrhaft, Eulen nach dem amerikanischen Athen zu tragen.

Das Publikum, das Dr. Muck mit einer herzlichen Ovation empfangen hatte, gab sein Entzücken durch ungemein warmen Beifall zu erkennen. Es war ein vielversprechender Anfang.

Robert Lortat.

Ein französischer Pianist, dem aus Paris ein sehr guter Ruf vorausgegangen war, stellte sich gestern nachmittag in Aeolian Hall uns erstmalig vor. Herr Lortat ist ein hochtalentierter und ernst nehmender Virtuose, wenn er Beethoven gestern auch ausgewichen ist. Das bedeutet ja schließlich nichts, denn man kann ein erstes Programm auch ohne Altmeister erfreulich durchführen und sich als berufener Kunstjünger erweisen. Das gelang dem Pianisten gestern unbedingt. Zwar in den Schumann'schen „Symphonischen Variationen" machte sich ein gewisser Hang zum Verklünsteln des Rhythmus bemerkbar, sonst aber zeigte Herr Lortat so viel liebevolles Eingehen und Kraft und brillante Technik, daß man sein Wohlgefallen an ihm haben konnte. Das gilt in noch erhöhterem Maß von seiner Ausgestaltung von Chopin's Vierundzwanzig „Préludes", die ungemein viel Schönes und Poetisches brachten. Die Kontrastierung der wiederstrebenden Elemente habe ich zwar nicht immer bedeutsam betont gehört, und gelegentlich machte sich auch eine gewisse Monotonie bemerkbar, welche darauf zurückzuführen ist, daß Lortat ungeachtet aller Kraft seine besten Wirkungen in den Pianonuancen findet. Das zeigte er in mehreren Stücken von Debussy, Fauré und de Séverac, deren Wirkung aber durch einen sehr brillant und schwungvoll wiedergegebenen „Scherzo-Valse" von Chabrier übertroffen wurde. In den beiden „Heiligenlegenden" Liszt's, die der Künstler mit großer Technik meisterte, vermißte man das exaktische Element. Dem Publikum hat Herr Lortat sehr gut gefallen, denn er wurde von dem gut besetzten Saal mit allen Zeichen der Befriedigung aufgenommen.

EVENING WORLD
ess: New York City

Symphony Orchestra easily held the post of honor on Saturday. A crowded Carnegie Hall, in the afternoon, heard a fine presentation of Chausson's symphony in B-flat major, seldom played, and a rarely exquisite exposition by the strings of Beethovens' grand fugue in B-flat major. At Aeolian Hall, also in the afternoon, Beatrice Harrison, an English 'cellist, and Samuel Gardner, violinist, assisted by Clarence Adler at the piano, gave an interesting entertainment at which Paderewski was a listener. In the evening, at Aeolian Hall, Beryl Rubinstein, the young pianist, gave a second recital which charmed a large audience.

[35]

n AMERICAN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
e NOV 2 - 1916

KREISLER PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

Soloist at Opening Boston Symphony Program.

LARGE CROWD AT LYRIC

AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING OF ORCHESTRA'S SEASON.

Dr. Karl Muck, Director of the Organization, and the Famous Violinist Share in the Honors—The Program Had Been Built With Rare Skill and Discernment—Audience Enthusiastic Throughout the Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert here this season before an audience that packed the Lyric to the doors last evening. Fritz Kreisler, the renowned violinist, was the soloist, and he was given a rousing reception that showed he had completely captivated the heart of Baltimore music lovers.

The program consisted of the Beethoven Eroica Smyphony and the Strauss 'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in rondo form for the orchestra, and a concerto by Ernest Schelling for voilin and orchestra, composed at the instance of Mr. Kreisler and played in public for the third time last evening. It was in this the chief interest of the program centered.

Always it is difficult to appraise the true worth of any serious musical composition on first hearing, in so complex and elaborate a structure as a concerto, the difficult merges almost into the impossible. Yet it is proper to record first impressions. And certainly this concerto made a powerful impression beneath the bow of Kreisler. It is romantic in conception, extraordinarily vigorous and original. Like Dvorak, it would seem the young composer finds ideas crowding upon him almost too swiftly for development. One may search the memory and finding nothing of which it is reminiscent, its freshness and originality is amazing. There is a broad imaginativeness in the concerto, a poetic imagery that instantly appeals. It is gay, and grave, and sad and sweet—and always romantic. In the lovely Lagoon part, the thought is so noble, so lofty, and its expression is so sincere, one instinctively agrees with Kreisler—who regars the concerto as a master work—when he said, "It is the greatest concerto written in 25 years. I can find nothing like it anywhere!"

To dwell on the perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians were to repeat an old, if worthy tale. The absolute unity of the organization is a thing at which to wonder and be thankful for. In the playing of the stupendous third symphony, its fine development under the master hand of Dr. Muck was shown as if under a spotlight. The precision of the attack, particularly evident in the scherzo of the symphony, where some exceedingly delicate work occurs; the responsiveness to the ideas of the director; the broad, evenness of the tone; the splendid balance of the choirs, all were evident, as always they are when this orchestra is here.

The enigmatic Strauss number, which no one seems really to understand—and which very few care much about understanding—made a satisfying closing number. It was an auspicious beginning to the season.

EVENING NEWS.
m
dress Baltimore, Md.
NOV 3
te

[illegible] and silver fox furs.

The audience at the Lyric last night to hear the first concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a very fashionable one. Among those there were Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Cotten, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McKeon, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Keith, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Spence, Mr. and Mrs. James T. Dennis, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Levering, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Samuel C. Rowland, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Garrett, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitridge, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Marbury, Mrs. James Madison Thompson, Mrs. S. Tagart Steele, Mrs. Edward Livingston Smith, Mrs. Charles R. Spence, Miss Beverly James and the Misses Merryman.

om REPUBLICAN
dress: Springfield, Mass.
te NOV 2 19

LOCAL AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA

Though It is Only 36 Years Old, There Are But Five Older

The Boston symphony orchestra, which returns to Springfield Monday evening for the second concert in the Ellis series in the Auditorium, is now one of the oldest orchestras in the world, only five having enjoyed a longer life. The orchestras which exceed Boston's in age are the Philharmonic of Vienna, the Gewandhaus of Liepsic, the Conservatoire of Paris, the Philharmonic of London and the Philharmonic of New York. The Vienna, Paris and London orchestras have since their organization given only a very limited number of concerts in each season while only in the last few years has the Philharmonic society of New York been so organized as to have exclusive control of its members. The Gewandhaus orchestra of Liepsic is in many respects the prototype of the Boston orchestra.

The Boston symphony orchestra is in its 36th year having given its first concert in 1881. In the 35 years that have passed it has given an average of almost 100 concerts per season, the seasons ranging from six months in the early days to 7½ months to-day. Actually the number of concerts that had been given up to the close of the season of 1914-1915 was 3407. The great majority of these concerts, naturally, were given in Boston where with the exception of the first and second year 24 pairs have been given each season. In the first year there were but 20 pairs and in the second year there were but 25. The orchestra began its more extensive traveling in the spring of 1886 when Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington were visited, and a series of concerts were given throughout the middle West. In the following year, the first concerts were given in New York.

m TIMES
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist at the First Concert of the Season in the Academy of Music.

The twenty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in the Academy of Music last night with the customary crowded opera house and intense enthusiasm of the audience. Each passing year brings its changes in the personnel of this splendid organization—this time a first violin and the first bassoon are unfamiliar—and there is probably not a member who has survived from the beginning; yet each year as truly it must be said that the supreme, one is tempted to say sublime, artistry of the whole is enhanced so gradually that at times it is virtually impossible to note it, yet so surely that the retrospection of a single year makes it plain.

So let it be said that last night the orchestra seemed perfection plus! Dr. Muck appeared a veritable magician, weaving with his baton fabric after fabric of wondrous tenuous color. The program included Wagner's "A Faust Overture," the familiar yet ever pleasng "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Richard Strauss, Chausson's "Symphony in B flat," played for the first time here by the Boston Orchestra, and Ernest Schelling's new concerto for violin and orchestra. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, as if Dr. Muck were determined to leave nothing undone to begin the Brooklyn concerts beyond criticism.

Kreisler must be accepted as the musical marvel of the present century. With the possible exception of Ysaye, the erratic master, of whom little is heard nowadays, he is without a peer as a violinist. To speak of technique of this man, to comment on his bowing, to discuss his fingering is a mere waste of words, in respect of those his playing is faultless, but he does not stand alone there. The clear singing of his instrument, the wondrous tones which he seem to summon by mere thought—this is the field in which he is supreme and unchallenged. Well can he afford to ignore the fantastic gesturings and silly mannerisms of the second class of virtuosi, and stand with simple sincerity as he executes, rather than interprets, the compositions of the masters.

The Schelling concerto is in one movement, but the composer might easily have divided it into a first section with two themes, development, fantasia, and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon Variation" which the composer played last year at the Academy; a recitative for two harps and a violin, an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation in the Schelling collection, and a finale in rondo form, in Spanish jig fashion. The work is altogether pleasing and Mr. Schelling may well be congratulated on it. Last night was its first presentation in this city. It was written for Kreisler last summer in Bar Harbor. Twenty-one minutes were required to play it.

The Chausson symphony, which was first played in America twelve years ago by the Boston orchestra, is brilliantly orchestrated, filled with thought and color.

EVENING SUN
: New York City

Music and Musicians

Rising Recall for Boston Symphony Winds Up an Eight-Concert Day. Crowds for "Till" in Two Boroughs; Opera Folk See "The Impresario."

When the Boston Symphony players stood up to be counted, midway in Carnegie Hall's most crowded concert last night, they mustered 98 per cent. of seasoned veterans, and some few dating back to Founder Higginson's original band thirty-six years ago. Conductor Muck, well groomed and debonnair, showed a new touch of silver in his thinning locks. And whatever an excitedly talking audience thought of Beethoven's "Eroica," with the hero's name torn from its pages a century since as they are tearing down their idols in Europe to-day, it's certain that the mighty Ludwig never heard his music so played by the bush league orchestras of the Fatherland.

With a welcome condescension toward foreigners, Dr. Muck also brought forward the "Corsair" of Berlioz. Here was a Frenchman, master of the whole bag of tricks still pursued by the cubists with hue and cry. It was as if the Sacred Codfish had drawn a Gallic red herring across the Teutonic trail. Liszt's "Mazeppa," an old battle horse of Seidl, surprised many with its wealth of "Tristan's" last act. For Wagner lifted this as he lifted everything of his father-in-law's that wasn't nailed down. The real event of the evening was the windup in Strauss's "Till."

Streets blocked as never before made a riot at the carriage doors. Subway explosions at times came in almost on the beat of the music. Sold out as for some years now, the hall literally turned six hundred away, and W. H. Brennan's urbane smile nearly came off telling disappointed folk that they'd find no place at these concerts for another five months to come.

To-night in Brooklyn the band plays a new programme of Chausson, Schelling, Wagner and again Strauss, and at Carnegie Hall to-morrow Chausson, Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms-Haydn.

SUN
New York City

CHAUSSON'S MUSIC SUPERBLY PLAYED

Frenchman's Symphony Conducted With Much Feeling by Dr. Karl Muck.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, Beethoven's grand fugue, opus 133, and Brahms's variations of Haydn's "Chorale St. Anthoni" theme. It was not a well arranged programme, but it served to hold the interest of a large audience except during the fugue. A piano teacher in this town once told an ambitious pupil who wished to study the great C minor sonata, "Beethoven is not for little girls." His fugues are not for matinee audiences. And this one is better in its original form. It was played in masterly style.

However, there was satisfaction probably for every one in the performance of the Chausson symphony. The work is not new to this town, but it has not been given so often as to make it strictly familiar. It is a deeply felt composition, revealing an imagination of lofty outlook and a virile temperamental force guided by a well concentrated intellect. Chausson was a pupil of Cesar Franck for two years and his symphony shows the noble influence of that Belgian master, who brought into French music a deeper note than it had before sounded.

It would be difficult to describe without verging on rhapsody such a performance as the symphony received yesterday. Dr. Muck proved clearly that he was in full accord with the thought of the composer. He had searched the score thoroughly and followed its exquisitely wrought melos in all its variations and all its polyphonic surroundings. The song of Chausson was sung with an exquisite clarity and balance of utterance and with a genuinely poetic feeling. Rarely has Dr. Muck given an interpretation so rich in communicative sympathy.

The Brahms variations were well done and brought the concert to a pleasing close. As for the youthful "Faust" fragment of Wagner it holds its own quite well, even in these days of fevered ideas and turgid expression. Some will continue to prefer it to Rubinstein's "Musikalisches Charakterbild" on the same theme, or even to Gounod's first act.

[36]

STANDARD UNION
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 4 1916
EW YORK CITY, SA

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Plays Programme of Modern Classics With Its Usual Surpassing Tone.

FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST.

Composer Schelling Hears His New Concerto Given.

A new blue-gray drop, replacing the green-paneled eyesore that has seemed inseparable from good music in Brooklyn for the past decade, served as background for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last night at the Academy of Music. The season was new, for the Bostonians came to break the long instrumental silence that had lasted since early last spring. The programme was new; nothing more ancient than Richard Wagner was represented.

But it was the Boston Symphony of old, surpassing in tone, seemingly immune from technical faults, always clear, unruffled and suave. Only two changes have been made in its personnel since last season. The baton was wielded by the old leader, Dr. Karl Muck, already fast becoming a gray-haired veteran in appearance. And the best known and most loved of violinists, Fritz Kreisler, was its assisting soloist.

The coming of the Boston Symphony means the Brooklyn music season has really begun. There were no seats to be sold, for as usual, the entire house had been disposed of by subscription. But the novelty of the programme and the presence of Kreisler had brought out many who were content to stand. Demonstrations of approval are not the custom of this rather reserved form of entertainment, yet last night it seemed as if there was more applause than usual.

Kreisler, who remains at the crest of supreme artistic development, played the American composer, Arthur Schelling's, concerto for solo violin with orchestra. This was the newest of the programme's offerings—dating back, in fact, only to last summer. Mr. Schelling himself sat inconspicuously in a rear seat. The concerto awakened wonderment mixed with the enthusiasm.

Bar Harbor was the scene of the composer's inspiration in this number. He has reveled in unusual effects, and has afforded great opportunities for individual instruments in the orchestra, as well as for the solo violin. The mood is varied though never sombre; the tonal atmosphere always modern. The soloist's interpretation was warm-blooded, inspiring, with a wealth of true Kreisler-tones. The concerto has but one movement. It seemed all too brief, though never surpassing in depth.

Second in interest, though first chronologically, was the B flat major symphony of Ernest Chausson, a too-little-known French composer, who, like his mentor, Cesar Frank, was never famous during his lifetime. It was magnificently played. Its fresh, caressing strains fitted perfectly the capacity of Dr. Muck and his band of tone-specialists.

Chausson has departed from the traditional symphonic arrangement. He has but three divisions, first a slow movement, transposing into "allegro vivo," then a lament, and finally one labeled "animated." The composer's moods evidently include no agitato; the powerful moments have in them nothing of passion. But throughout the symphony its message is given in truly melodic and ingratiating fashion. Nothing more charming that the choral melody of the final movement has been heard here for a long time.

The Wagnerian excerpt, "A Faust Overture," seemed out of place. It was neither representative of the composer's best nor in harmony with the rest of last night's programme. A real Karl Muck favorite, the "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Richard Strauss, concluded the evening, and gave the orchestra its chance to "cut loose" in as emphatic a manner as is possible for a group so truly dignified as the Boston Symphony

om CITIZEN
ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
te 1916

FRITZ KREISLER WINS ALL HEARTS

Plays Ernest Schelling's Interesting Concerto.

GREETED BY A CROWDED HOUSE AT THE ACADEMY

Audience Manifests Its Approval by Enthusiastic Applause—Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Appearance Here This Season.

Brooklyn audiences may be, as has been said, reserved, but they are not cold, as some unthinking people declare. They are more like the audiences of Boston than those of any other city. And like the Boston audiences they are particularly fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But even the Boston Symphony Orchestra could scarcely account for the size of the audience at the Academy of Music last night, for the hall was packed to the doors. And even Dr. Muck's famous organization could scarcely arouse the enthusiasm to the pitch that was manifest last night. It was Fritz Kreisler, the most loved and most admired violinist of his day, that the people came to see and hear.

Fritz Kreisler, it may be said without qualification, was at his best. For that matter he is always at his best, but the audience last night were prepared to sewar that never was music so sweet, so sympathetic, so brilliant as the notes that came from the priceless violin played by the hand of the master. He played a very interesting concerto, for violin and orchestra, written for him by the American composer, Ernest Schelling. It was composed at Mr. Kreisler's own request last summer while Mr. Schelling was at Bar Harbor, was finished about the end of August, and has been played hitherto only four times—once in Providence, R. I., once in Cambridge, Mass., and twice in Boston.

The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitonal recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modelled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto is an exquisite piece of music, and its reception here was as hearty and enthusiastic as it has been in other places. The smiling violinist was recalled time and again by the delighted audience.

The programme in full was as follows: Symphony in B flat (Chausson), "A Faust Overture" (Wagner), concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling), and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

Concerning the work of the Boston Orchestra it is necessary only to say that never has it appeared to better advantage in Brooklyn than last night. There have been few changes made in its personnel, and it seems to be better than ever. It is a wonderful organization, responding perfectly to the conception of the conductor, and Dr. Muck, and Boston, too, may well be proud of it.

om WORLD
dress: New York City
NOV 5 1916

CHAUSSON WORK IN SECOND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms on Programme Adequately Given by Conductor Muck and Players.

The second programme of the Boston Symphony was played yesterday afternoon to the customary large audience. Conductor Muck offered the B-flat major symphony of Ernest Chausson, not often heard here; Wagner's Faust overture, Grand Fugue of Beethoven, and the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn.

This was an entirely different musical fare from that presented Thursday, and while the playing of the musicians was beyond reproach, there was not the thrill for the audience that the first concert supplied. The symphony has quiet and reposeful moments and provides no difficulties for the listener.

Beethoven's Fugue, while a scholarly piece of writing and proof of the master's skill, was accepted by the audience in a resigned manner. Their spirit was aroused by the fluent Brahms variations.

There was much applause for Dr. Muck and his men.

n AMERICAN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

KREISLER PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

Soloist at Opening Boston Symphony Program.

LARGE CROWD AT LYRIC

AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING OF ORCHESTRA'S SEASON.

Dr. Karl Muck, Director of the Organization, and the Famous Violinist Share in the Honors—The Program Had Been Built With Rare Skill and Discernment—Audience Enthusiastic Throughout the Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert here this season before an audience that packed the Lyric to the doors last evening. Fritz Kreisler, the renowned violinist, was the soloist, and he was given a rousing reception that showed he had completely captivated the heart of Baltimore music lovers.

The program consisted of the Beethoven Eroica Smyphony and the Strauss 'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in rondo form for the orchestra, and a concerto by Ernest Schelling for violin and orchestra, composed at the instance of Mr. Kreisler and played in public for the third time last evening. It was in this the chief interest of the program centered.

Always it is difficult to appraise the true worth of any serious musical composition on first hearing, in so complex and elaborate a structure as a concerto, the difficult merges almost into the impossible. Yet it is proper to record first impressions. And certainly this concerto made a powerful impression beneath the bow of Kreisler. It is romantic in conception, extraordinarily vigorous and original. Like Dvorak, it would seem the young composer finds ideas crowding upon him almost too swiftly for development. One may search the memory and finding nothing of which it is reminiscent, its freshness and originality is amazing. There is a broad imaginativeness in the concerto, a poetic imagery that instantly appeals. It is gay, and grave, and sad and sweet—and always romantic. In the lovely Lagoon part, the thought is so noble, so lofty, and its expression is so sincere, one instinctively agrees with Kreisler—who regars the concerto as a master work—when he said, "It is the greatest concerto written in 25 years. I can find nothing like it anywhere!"

To dwell on the perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians were to repeat an old, if worthy tale. The absolute unity of the organization is a thing at which to wonder and be thankful for! In the playing of the stupendous third symphony, its fine development under the master hand of Dr. Muck was shown as if under a spotlight. The precision of the attack, particularly evident in the scherzo of the symphony, where some exceedingly delicate work occurs; the responsiveness to the ideas of the director; the broad, evenness of the tone; the splendid balance of the choirs, all were evident, as always they are when this orchestra is here.

The enigmatic Strauss number, which no one seems really to understand—and which very few care much about understanding—made a satisfying closing number. It was an auspicious beginning to the season.

EVENING NEWS.
m
dress Baltimore, Md.
te NOV 3

hat and silver fox furs.

The audience at the Lyric last night to hear the first concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a very fashionable one. Among those there were Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Cotten, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McKeon, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Keith, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Spence, Mr. and Mrs. James T. Dennis, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Levering, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Samuel C. Rowland, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Garrett, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitridge, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Marbury, Mrs. James Madison Thompson, Mrs. S. Tagart Steele, Mrs. Edward Livingston Smith, Mrs. Charles R. Spence, Miss Beverly James and the Misses Merryman.

om REPUBLICAN
dress: Springfield, Mass.
te NOV 2 19

LOCAL AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA

Though It is Only 36 Years Old, There Are But Five Older

The Boston symphony orchestra, which returns to Springfield Monday evening for the second concert in the Ellis series in the Auditorium, is now one of the oldest orchestras in the world, only five having enjoyed a longer life. The orchestras which exceed Boston's in age are the Philharmonic of Vienna, the Gewandhaus of Liepsic, the Conservatoire of Paris, the Philharmonic of London and the Philharmonic of New York. The Vienna, Paris and London orchestras have since their organization given only a very limited number of concerts in each season while only in the last few years has the Philharmonic society of New York been so organized as to have exclusive control of its members. The Gewandhaus orchestra of Liepsic is in many respects the prototype of the Boston orchestra.

The Boston symphony orchestra is in its 36th year having given its first concert in 1881. In the 35 years that have passed it has given an average of almost 100 concerts per season, the seasons ranging from six months in the early days to 7½ months to-day. Actually the number of concerts that had been given up to the close of the season of 1914-1915 was 3407. The great majority of these concerts, naturally, were given in Boston where with the exception of the first and second year 24 pairs have been given each season. In the first year there were but 20 pairs and in the second year there were but 25. The orchestra began its more extensive traveling in the spring of 1886 when Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington were visited, and a series of concerts were given throughout the middle West. In the following year, the first concerts were given in New York.

n TIMES
lress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Concert.

Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist at the First Concert of the Season in the Academy of Music.

The twenty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in the Academy of Music last night with the customary crowded opera house and intense enthusiasm of the audience. Each passing year brings its changes in the personnel of this splendid organization—this time a first violin and the first bassoon are unfamiliar—and there is probably not a member who has survived from the beginning; yet each year as truly it must be said that the supreme, one is tempted to say sublime, artistry of the whole is enhanced so gradually that at times it is virtually impossible to note it, yet so surely that the retrospection of a single year makes it plain.

So let it be said that last night the orchestra seemed perfection plus! Dr. Muck appeared a veritable magician, weaving with his baton fabric after fabric of wondrous tenuous color. The program included Wagner's "A Faust Overture," the familiar yet ever pleasng "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Richard Strauss, Chausson's "Symphony in B flat," played for the first time here by the Boston Orchestra, and Ernest Schelling's new concerto for violin and orchestra. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, as if Dr. Muck were determined to leave nothing undone to begin the Brooklyn concerts beyond criticism.

Kreisler must be accepted as the musical marvel of the present century. With the possible exception of Ysaye, the erratic master, of whom little is heard nowadays, he is without a peer as a violinist. To speak of technique of this man, to comment on his bowing, to discuss his fingering is a mere waste of words, in respect of those his playing is faultless, but he does not stand alone there. The clear singing of his instrument, the wondrous tones which he seem to summon by mere thought—this is the field in which he is supreme and unchallenged. Well can he afford to ignore the fantastic gesturings and silly mannerisms of the second class of virtuosi, and stand with simple sincerity as he executes, rather than interprets, the compositions of the masters.

The Schelling concerto is in one movement, but the composer might easily have divided it into a first section with two themes, development, fantasia, and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon Variation" which the composer played last year at the Academy; a recitative for two harps and a violin, an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation in the Schelling collection, and a finale in rondo form, in Spanish jig fashion. The work is altogether pleasing and Mr. Schelling may well be congratulated on it. Last night was its first presentation in this city. It was written for Kreisler last summer in Bar Harbor. Twenty-one minutes were required to play it.

The Chausson symphony, which was first played in America twelve years ago by the Boston orchestra, is brilliantly orchestrated, filled with thought and color.

EVENING SUN
: New York City

Music and Musicians

Rising Recall for Boston Symphony Winds Up an Eight-Concert Day. Crowds for "Till" in Two Boroughs; Opera Folk See "The Impresario."

When the Boston Symphony players stood up to be counted, midway in Carnegie Hall's most crowded concert last night, they mustered 98 per cent. of seasoned veterans, and some few dating back to Founder Higginson's original band thirty-six years ago. Conductor Muck, well groomed and debonnair, showed a new touch of silver in his thinning locks. And whatever an excitedly talking audience thought of Beethoven's "Eroica," with the hero's name torn from its pages a century since as they are tearing down their idols in Europe to-day, it's certain that the mighty Ludwig never heard his music so played by the bush league orchestras of the Fatherland.

With a welcome condescension toward foreigners, Dr. Muck also brought forward the "Corsair" of Berlioz. Here was a Frenchman, master of the whole bag of tricks still pursued by the cubists with hue and cry. It was as if the Sacred Codfish had drawn a Gallic red herring across the Teutonic trail. Liszt's "Mazeppa," an old battle horse of Seidl, surprised many with its wealth of "Tristan's" last act. For Wagner lifted this as he lifted everything of his father-in-law's that wasn't nailed down. The real event of the evening was the windup in Strauss's "Till."

Streets blocked as never before made a riot at the carriage doors. Subway explosions at times came in almost on the beat of the music. Sold out as for some years now, the hall literally turned six hundred away, and W. H. Brennan's urbane smile nearly came off telling disappointed folk that they'd find no place at these concerts for another five months to come.

To-night in Brooklyn the band plays a new programme of Chausson, Schelling, Wagner and again Strauss, and at Carnegie Hall to-morrow Chausson, Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms-Haydn.

SUN
New York City

CHAUSSON'S MUSIC SUPERBLY PLAYED

Frenchman's Symphony Conducted With Much Feeling by Dr. Karl Muck.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Chausson's symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, Beethoven's grand fugue, opus 133, and Brahms's variations of Haydn's "Chorale St. Anthoni" theme. It was not a well arranged programme, but it served to hold the interest of a large audience except during the fugue. A piano teacher in this town once told an ambitious pupil who wished to study the great C minor sonata, "Beethoven is not for little girls." His fugues are not for matinee audiences. And this one is better in its original form. It was played in masterly style.

However, there was satisfaction probably for every one in the performance of the Chausson symphony. The work is not new to this town, but it has not been given so often as to make it strictly familiar. It is a deeply felt composition, revealing an imagination of lofty outlook and a virile temperamental force guided by a well concentrated intellect. Chausson was a pupil of Cesar Franck for two years and his symphony shows the noble influence of that Belgian master, who brought into French music a deeper note than it had before sounded.

It would be difficult to describe without verging on rhapsody such a performance as the symphony received yesterday. Dr. Muck proved clearly that he was in full accord with the thought of the composer. He had searched the score thoroughly and followed its exquisitely wrought melos in all its variations and all its polyphonic surroundings. The song of Chausson was sung with an exquisite clarity and balance of utterance and with a genuinely poetic feeling. Rarely has Dr. Muck given an interpretation so rich in communicative sympathy.

The Brahms variations were well done and brought the concert to a pleasing close. As for the youthful "Faust" fragment of Wagner it holds its own quite well, even in these days of fevered ideas and turgid expression. Some will continue to prefer it to Rubinstein's "Musikalisches Charakterbild" on the same theme, or even to Gounod's first act.

STANDARD UNION
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 4 1916
EW YORK CITY, SA

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Plays Programme of Modern Classics With Its Usual Surpassing Tone.

FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST.

Composer Schelling Hears His New Concerto Given.

A new blue-gray drop, replacing the green-paneled eyesore that has seemed inseparable from good music in Brooklyn for the past decade, served as background for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last night at the Academy of Music. The season was new, for the Bostonians came to break the long instrumental silence that had lasted since early last spring. The programme was new; nothing more ancient than Richard Wagner was represented.

But it was the Boston Symphony of old, surpassing in tone, seemingly immune from technical faults, always clear, unruffled and suave. Only two changes have been made in its personnel since last season. The baton was wielded by the old leader, Dr. Karl Muck, already fast becoming a gray-haired veteran in appearance. And the best known and most loved of violinists, Fritz Kreisler, was its assisting soloist.

The coming of the Boston Symphony means the Brooklyn music season has really begun. There were no seats to be sold, for as usual, the entire house had been disposed of by subscription. But the novelty of the programme and the presence of Kreisler had brought out many who were content to stand. Demonstrations of approval are not the custom of this rather reserved form of entertainment, yet last night it seemed as if there was more applause than usual.

Kreisler, who remains at the crest of supreme artistic development, played the American composer, Arthur Schelling's, concerto for solo violin with orchestra. This was the newest of the programme's offerings—dating back, in fact, only to last summer. Mr. Schelling himself sat inconspicuously in a rear seat. The concerto awakened wonderment mixed with the enthusiasm.

Bar Harbor was the scene of the composer's inspiration in this number. He has reveled in unusual effects, and has afforded great opportunities for individual instruments in the orchestra, as well as for the solo violin. The mood is varied though never sombre; the tonal atmosphere always modern. The soloist's interpretation was warm-blooded, inspiring, with a wealth of true Kreisler-tones. The concerto has but one movement. It seemed all too brief, though never surpassing in depth.

Second in interest, though first chronologically, was the B flat major symphony of Ernest Chausson, a too-little-known French composer, who, like his mentor, Cesar Frank, was never famous during his lifetime. It was magnificently played. Its fresh, caressing strains fitted perfectly the capacity of Dr. Muck and his band of tone-specialists.

Chausson has departed from the traditional symphonic arrangement. He has but three divisions, first a slow movement, transposing into "allegro vivo," then a lament, and finally one labeled "animated." The composer's moods evidently include no agitato; the powerful moments have in them nothing of passion. But throughout the symphony its message is given in truly melodic and ingratiating fashion. Nothing more charming that the choral melody of the final movement has been heard here for a long time.

The Wagnerian excerpt, "A Faust Overture," seemed out of place. It was neither representative of the composer's best nor in harmony with the rest of last night's programme. A real Karl Muck favorite, the "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Richard Strauss, concluded the evening, and gave the orchestra its chance to "cut loose" in as emphatic a manner as is possible for a group so truly dignified as the Boston Symphony

om CITIZEN
ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
te 1916

FRITZ KREISLER WINS ALL HEARTS

Plays Ernest Schelling's Interesting Concerto.

GREETED BY A CROWDED HOUSE AT THE ACADEMY

Audience Manifests Its Approval by Enthusiastic Applause—Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Appearance Here This Season.

Brooklyn audiences may be, as has been said, reserved, but they are not cold, as some unthinking people declare. They are more like the audiences of Boston than those of any other city. And like the Boston audiences they are particularly fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But even the Boston Symphony Orchestra could scarcely account for the size of the audience at the Academy of Music last night, for the hall was packed to the doors. And even Dr. Muck's famous organization could scarcely arouse the enthusiasm to the pitch that was manifest last night. It was Fritz Kreisler, the most loved and most admired violinist of his day, that the people came to see and hear.

Fritz Kreisler, it may be said without qualification, was at his best. For that matter he is always at his best, but the audience last night were prepared to sewar that never was music so sweet, so sympathetic, so brilliant as the notes that came from the priceless violin played by the hand of the master. He played a very interesting concerto, for violin and orchestra, written for him by the American composer, Ernest Schelling. It was composed at Mr. Kreisler's own request last summer while Mr. Schelling was at Bar Harbor, was finished about the end of August, and has been played hitherto only four times—once in Providence, R. I., once in Cambridge, Mass., and twice in Boston.

The concerto is short, playing twenty-one minutes. It is in one movement which, however, might easily be divided into sections comprising a first movement in orthodox symphonic form, with two themes, development, fantasia and recapitulation; an interlude based on the "Lagoon" variation of Mr. Schelling's "Variations for Piano and Orchestra" played last year; a transitional recitative for violin and two harps, followed by an intermezzo based on the Kreisler variation of the same work, from which the "Lagoon" is taken, and a finale in rondo form, which is modelled on a Spanish jig.

The concerto is an exquisite piece of music, and its reception here was as hearty and enthusiastic as it has been in other places. The smiling violinist was recalled time and again by the delighted audience.

The programme in full was as follows: Symphony in B flat (Chausson), "A Faust Overture" (Wagner), concerto for violin and orchestra, first time here (Schelling), and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (R. Strauss). Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

Concerning the work of the Boston Orchestra it is necessary only to say that never has it appeared to better advantage in Brooklyn than last night. There have been few changes made in its personnel, and it seems to be better than ever. It is a wonderful organization, responding perfectly to the conception of the conductor, and Dr. Muck, and Boston, too, may well be proud of it.

om WORLD
dress: New York City
te NOV 5 1916

CHAUSSON WORK IN SECOND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms on Programme Adequately Given by Conductor Muck and Players.

The second programme of the Boston Symphony was played yesterday afternoon to the customary large audience. Conductor Muck offered the B-flat major symphony of Ernest Chausson, not often heard here; Wagner's Faust overture, Grand Fugue of Beethoven, and the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn.

This was an entirely different musical fare from that presented Thursday, and while the playing of the musicians was beyond reproach, there was not the thrill for the audience that the first concert supplied. The symphony has quiet and reposeful moments and provides no difficulties for the listener.

Beethoven's Fugue, while a scholarly piece of writing and proof of the master's skill, was accepted by the audience in a resigned manner. Their spirit was aroused by the fluent Brahms variations.

There was much applause for Dr. Muck and his men.

[36]

m EVENING POST
ress: New York City
NOV 3 - 19

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Men Play Programme Music.

Dr. Muck's interesting concert of programme music in Carnegie Hall last night could have been made still more impressive from the programmatic point of view if he had made his men play Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony instead of the "Heroic," and the "Danse Macabre" or "Phaëton" of Saint-Saëns in place of Berlioz's brilliant but empty "Corsair" overture. But even as it was his programme provided an entertainment as suggestive and edifying as it was enjoyable. The order of events was "Eroica," "Corsair," Liszt's "Mazeppa," and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Beethoven's "Eroica" is not so obviously a piece of programme music as the "Pastoral," with its thunder-storm, its scene by the brook, its imitation of bird songs, and its merrymaking of the peasants. Yet in composing the "Eroica," he had in mind Napoleon Bonaparte, and the title originally was "Sinfonia grande, written on Bonaparte." When Napoleon had himself proclaimed emperor, Beethoven, enraged, erased his name and changed the title to "Heroic Symphony, composed for the celebration of a great man." From a programmatic point of view, the trouble with the "Eroica" is that, as Romain Rolland points out in a footnote in his book on Handel, the composer "allows his hero to die and be buried in the second movement, and then celebrates his acts and triumphs in the third and fourth movements."

It was Liszt who realized the unsuitableness of the symphonic form, on the whole, for programme music, wherefore he invented the symphonic poem, of which his "Mazeppa" is so marvellous a specimen. Strauss, who has called Liszt the only great composer since Beethoven, followed in his footsteps and his "Till Eulenspiegel," a brilliant performance of which closed last night's programme, is his best production, excepting "Don Juan." Yet "Eulenspiegel" is neither as inspired in the matter of music and emotion as "Mazeppa" nor as good a specimen of programme music, as it is difficult to follow the plot. In truth, Strauss was wise in wishing to keep the plot to himself and let the thing stand simply as a piece of absolute music in the comic style. The only unmistakable detail is the scaffold scene, proclaimed by the blaring trombones (suggested by the purgatory music in Liszt's "Dante").

It is quite otherwise with Liszt's "Mazeppa," the outlines of which are easy to follow in the music. France's greatest composer, Saint-Saëns, who has always bubbled over with enthusiasm for the poetic as well as the musical side of Liszt's compositions, has given a most admirable analysis of "Mazeppa" in his "Harmonie et Mélodie" (pp. 169-172). It is too long to quote, but musicians who would like to understand the true inwardness of Liszt's method (which is superior to Strauss's) should by all means read the chapter on Liszt in this book. It is surprising that Philip Hale, the erudite, has not quoted in his programme book these splendid remarks of Saint-Saëns.

Liszt wrote a prefatory note to his symphonic poems, warning off conductors who had not learned the new art of interpretation, which is guided by ideas instead of by bars. Dr. Muck is a master of this new art of conducting, and no wonder there were three rounds of applause after the "Mazeppa." The whole concert, indeed, was a triumph for him and his admirably trained orchestra. The orchestra had to rise after the "Eroica," which also had a fine performance, although in the funeral march the orchestra did not rise to that stupendous climax of poignant grief to which Mahler accustomed us at the Philharmonic concerts.

m EVENING TELEGRAM
ress: New York City
NOV 3 19

Dr. Muck selected a conventional programme, beginning with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, of which a luminous reading was given. In the scherzo Dr. Muck merely held his hand on the reins, as it were, letting his men find their own pace.

Since the "Eroica" was written around Napoleon, "the great first cause of romanticism," it was fitting that two pieces inspired by the romanticism of Lord Byron should follow the symphony.

They were Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa." While Nijinsky was appearing in Brooklyn as Till Owlglass to Strauss' music the Boston players in this city used the same score for the finale of their concert.

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: New York City
NOV 5

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS VISIT HERE

Propagandism for Chausson's Symphony in New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its first visit to the metropolis this season yesterday afternoon. The concert which it gave in Carnegie Hall did not attract quite as many persons as the evening concert of Thursday, nor evoke as much enthusiasm. Neither was it so interesting.

The fault lay in the programme, not in the performance. Dr. Muck, like the conductors of local societies which give a large number of concerts in a season, occasionally shows the oppression of a sense of duty toward cults as well as schools. To meet the wishes of a coterie of enthusiastic admirers of the very new French romantic school eleven years ago Major Higginson brought M. Vincent d'Indy to America and placed the Boston orchestra in his hands for the amiable purpose of propagandism. M. d'Indy gave a hearing in Boston and New York to the music of a group of Frenchmen of whom we had heard little or nothing.

Among the best of his offerings was Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, which he brought forward here on December 10, 1905. Chausson was something more than a name, but his symphony was new and it was flanked by some music, which was better than it, and some which was infinitely worse.

In February, 1911, Mr. Walter Damrosch, also imbued with an educational purpose, included the symphony in a French scheme arranged for the Symphony Society. So far as the listeners were concerned it seemed quite as new as five years before; and so it did again yesterday, and for an obvious reason. There is not enough of pregnant thematic material in it to lay lasting hold upon the fancy or memory of its hearers. Had it struck fire at its first performance it would have been repeated oftener, and familiarity might have bred understanding and, possibly, admiration. That is the way with music which is truly great.

As it is, it was heard with interest, the beauty which it contains was appreciated and the splendid performance which it received aroused enthusiasm. It could not have been made to sound more nobly or magnificently sonorous.

The symphony was followed by Wagner's "Faust" overture, and this by the Fugue for strings which Beethoven wrote as the finale of his Quartet in B-flat (published as op. 130), but put aside after the first public performance, largely because it extended the work unduly. It has been heard here from the Kneisel Quartet as well as from combined orchestral strings.

The concert came to an end with the familiar variations by Brahms on a theme by Haydn—always a delight when given by the men from Boston.

rom HERALD
ddress: New York City

BOSTON MEN PLAY BEETHOVEN WELL

But Audience at Orchestral Concert Finds Dr. Muck's Programme Rather Dull.

Although the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of its first pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was as near perfection as any one could have wished, many persons in the audience found the programme a little dull. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, chose Chausson's Symphony in B flat as his most important offering. It is a pleasant work and well written, but the fact that it is sixteen years old and still is practically unknown here would indicate that other conductors have not found it interesting. After the symphony came Wagner's "Faust" overture, an early work and not written in his most attractive vein, and Beethoven's Grand Fugue, opus 133. The fugue is a remarkable composition. Nobody after hearing it would deny that Beethoven was a skilled musician, but it is of more interest to students of composition than to the public, for it lacks the emotional appeal of the Sixth Symphony, which Dr. Muck presented on Thursday.

The final number, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, is a really beautiful work, the finest on the whole programme, but it, like the fugue, depends upon mechanical musical development for much of its charm.

The audience applauded the numbers, but without the enthusiasm that usually is shown at the Boston Symphony's concerts, and as it passed out many complaints about the dull character of the programme were heard, mingled with praise for the fine playing of the orchestra.

[37]

m AMERICAN
dress: New York City
NOV 5 1916

RARE OVERTURE SURPRISE GIVEN BY ORCHESTRA

Beethoven's Grand Fugue Presented at Boston Symphony Concert with Success.

Some of the Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers who attended the season's first matinee of that organization yesterday in Carnegie Hall were astonished to read in the programme that a work by Beethoven described as an overture was to have its first performance "at these concerts." Nor was their surprise relieved when they discovered that the composition in question actually proved unfamiliar to them.

The explanation of the phenomenon is simple enough, however. The Grand Fugue in B flat major, opus 133, which more than a few in the audience never had heard before, was written originally as the last movement for the string quartet in B flat major. It is, therefore, in reality a piece of chamber music—though rarely presented as such—and was played yesterday by the full string orchestra with the 'cellos reinforced by the basses.

It seems strange, nevertheless, that this extremely interesting composition, which one or two persons yesterday may have recalled hearing on April 3, 1883, at a symphony concert of Theodore Thomas, should not figure more often on local programmes.

Not every orchestra, to be sure, could unravel its rhythmical and contrapuntal intricacies as did Dr. Muck and his virtuoso disciples, and doubtless the prolonged applause that followed their achievement was a complimentary demonstration for the leader and his men rather than for the complicated score.

Yet one cannot agree with those who see in this work only a specimen of highly developed technique. Interesting it is for the trained musician, absorbingly interesting, and exceedingly suggestive, too, for the student who likes to discover in Beethoven seeds that bore fruit in later composers. But what profound imagination, what passion, what melancholy, what exultation and fire we find in these inspiring pages—pages that can well hold their own among the finest flowers of the German master's genius.

Perhaps it was with some thought of thematic relationship that Dr. Muck had Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture" precede Beethoven's great fugue. Possibly he even had in mind the influence Wagner and Liszt had exerted on Chausson when he grouped those two works on the same programme with the French composer's beautiful, if not highly original, symphony in B flat major.

Brahm's Variations on a there by Hayden brought the afternoon to a close.

om STAATSZEITUNG
ldress: New York City.
NOV 6 19

[illegible] werden will.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das zweite Konzert des Bostoner Meisterorchesters in Carnegie Hall, zugleich die erste Matinee der neuen Saison, brachte in Chausson's Symphonie ein wenig gehörtes Werk, dem aber genugsam musikalische und geistige Reize innewohnen, um häufigere Wiederholungen zu rechtfertigen. Chausson war ein bedeutender melodischer Erfinder, der in seinen ersten Werken nur allzu leichtfertigen Gebrauch davon machte, indem er die sorgfältige und logische Durchführung vernachlässigte. Nicht so in dieser Symphonie, welche deutlich die Spuren seiner Studien bei dem großen Komponisten César Franck zeigten, welcher der französischen Musik die ihr bis dahin oft abgehende Tiefe und logische Entwicklung gegeben hat. Es ist viel und treffliche Musik in diesem Werk, welches Dr. Muck uns am Samstag mit einem liebevollen Aussichheraustreten vorsetzte, das fast überraschen mußte. Beflügelt flott und in breiten Strichen legte er das Werk vor uns hin, in dem sein Orchester in unerhörter Klangpracht schwebte. Eine große Aufführung, ein enthusiastischer Erfolg.

Das Programm brachte sonst nicht durchweg Homogenes. Wagners „Faust"-Ouverture gelang in markigen Strichen trefflich, Beethovens Große Fuge, op. 133, ermüdete aber, so virtuos sie auch gespielt wurde, und in Brahms' „Variationen über einen Haydnschen Choral" sind nicht wenige sogenannte „tote" Punkte zu finden, Längen, die ermüden. Daß die Bostoner alle Werke einfach tadellos vortrugen, versteht sich von selbst.

H.

EVENING NEWS,
Baltimore, Md.
1916

KREISLER IN NEW WORK

Schelling Concerto Affords Him Few Opportunities.

Splendid Audience At The Lyric Hears Opening Of Boston Symphony Season.

The huge audiences which now always fill the Lyric when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits Baltimore have become so much a matter of course as no longer to be a subject of comment, and we sincerely hope and trust that it is the real value of these concerts and not a freak of fashion that is the underlying cause.

There is a sort of half-mark which has always stamped the organization in the eyes of the American public and made it the abiding standard by which all others shall be judged. In matters of taste and finish and in balance and lofty musical principle it still stands aloof from all other orchestras. It would be difficult to imagine a more ideal conception of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony than that given by Dr. Muck.

There was, this time, none of that inflexible rigidity that occasionally mars this conductor's readings of Beethoven symphonies; all was mobile and plastic, yet, on the other hand, dignified, restrained and essentially classical. The one flaw in the performance was the raucous tone and coarseness of shading on the part of the horns in the trio of the third movement, a most unusual blemish for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of the symphony itself, it is sad to observe that the scherzo is the only movement that makes a vivid appeal to the public of today.

The massive architecture, the sustained nobility, the wealth of ideas, and daring innovations of the first movement seem quite beyond the ken of audiences so surfeited with formless masses of color as are those of today. It must be admitted, however, that the Funeral March, though epoch-making, at the time it was written, as the first great emotional movement in symphonic literature, is of length disconcerting to even the composer's most loyal adherents, while the finale is, in purpose, so out of keeping with the rest of the symphony as to make it doubtful whether this work should be allowed to come under the heading of a "symphony with a program" at all.

The incomparable violinist, Fritz Kreisler, whose hold on the public seems to be ever on the increase, was heard in a new Concerto by Schelling, written expressly for him. This composition certainly afforded Mr. Kreisler no very extraordinary opportunities, but it is perhaps not too much to say that what success was scored by the composer was greatly due to the work of this artist, and to its excellent handling by the orchestra. Candidly, Mr. Schelling cannot be altogether congratulated on his latest effort. The subject matter is for the most part lacking in distinction, either of rhythm or harmonic device, and it was only some very telling and interesting music in the middle section of the concerto that made the composition worth while as a whole and showed a distinctive gift of colour not to be ignored.

The concert concluded with Richard Strauss' wholly delightful, though possibly too realistic, "Till Eulenspiegel."

H. D. P.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
NOV 3 -

MUSIC

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

When Karl Muck brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York, it often seems as though he deliberately selected familiar compositions for his programme just to show how new they can be made to appear. "Who is this man Beethoven anyway?" some one asked last evening at Carnegie Hall, after Dr. Muck had finished his interpretation of the "Eroica" symphony.

No superlative could do justice to the playing of that symphony. It was perfection, simple and undemonstrative, but perfection nevertheless. On such performances the reputation of the Boston orchestra rests securely.

"Having shown you what a creative genius could accomplish with the simplest of materials," Dr. Muck's programme seemed to say, "I shall now proceed to illustrate the work of three masters of orchestration, less endowed spiritually but with far more complex methods of expression." Whereupon followed the "Corsair" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" and the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel."

All three gave occasion for orchestral virtuosity, and only in the third did the musical content approach the magnificence of the technique. But this produced probably the exact effect intended by Dr. Muck in his ascending climax of show-pieces.

m EAGLE - NOV 4
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Kreisler Pleases in Schelling's Sparkling New Concerto.

After one hour of solid gloom, the Boston Symphony Orchestra struck a cheerful chord last evening, and the great audience, which crowded the Academy of Music to welcome the return of Brooklyn's favorite orchestra, looked up and smiled. The concert had been impressively solemn theretofore in portions of Chausson's "Symphony in B Flat," but the note of cheer came from Ernest Schelling's "Violin Concerto," written last summer for Fritz Kreisler. That great and popular violinist was present to give the work its introduction to New York—almost its introduction in America, for it had had only two or three preliminary performances in New England.

It is safe to say that, although this was the first performance of the work in Brooklyn, it will be far from its last. Schelling has written the brilliant, sparkling and not too ponderous sort of music which audiences delight to hear. The three movements of the concerto are run together as one and although it actually occupies half an hour in preformance, it does not seem to take more than half that time, so persistently interesting and varied is it. Several of the themes Mr. Schelling took from his piano variations which he played in Brooklyn last year with this same orchestra. Both he and his music were greatly liked then, and the latter seems even better adapted to the violin than to the piano—or, perhaps the violin hearing being freshest, this has wiped out the memories of the other. At any rate, last night it was altogether charming, and a good part of the charm lay in the brilliant and easy performance, on the part of both Kreisler and the orchestra. The snap and dash imparted to the Scotch [illegible] music quickened the pulses. The brief passage for violin and harps was one of the most conspicuous instances of the way in which interest is added to the score by the variety and fitness of the combinations of instruments employed.

The other novelty used by Dr. Muck to open his program was the Chausson symphony. It is solemn music, but solemnity is frequently impressive and inspiring, and it is so in this case. Especially is that true of the second, or very slow, movement. An intense "andante" is rare, and Chausson has succeeded in giving a passionate quality to the introduction of that movement which is commonly achieved only at a quicker pace. The last movement has far greater variety of tempo and of instrumentation, but it misses the exaltation of the second, which is the crown of an impressive and unusual work, although one which is hardly likely to make its way to great popularity.

The effect of the symphony would have been better if it had been followed by something better worth while than Wagner's early "Faust Overture." It was written as a pot-boiler in a garret in Paris, and there is no particular reason that it should be pulled out of its deserved obscurity now, except for the instruction of students in the development of Wagner's style. Such interest as it has lies in seeing how Wagner worked before he had anything in particular to say. In the orchestration of his later works traces of the style of Berlioz appear, but by that time Wagner was so much greater than Berlioz that the relation has merely an academic interest. But in this overture he shows more nearly the attitude of pupil to the French innovator in orchestration. It is interestng to see one of the sources from which Wagner learned the mastery of his trade, but Boston symphony concerts exist for something more than technical instruction.

The concert closed with that gorgeous Strauss fantasq, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which had been danced, or pantomimed, on the same stage by the Russians the night before. Pantomime, of course, helps to impress the story, but one does not need it for enjoyment when this orchestra lets out the glorious resources of its tone and technical skill on this concentrated essence of difficulties. The performance was superb and it sent the audience home happy in its ability to forget the vain aspirations of the boyish Wagner.

m ldress:

SECOND ELLIS CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Monday Evening, Nov. 6.

The entire personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 men, under Dr. Karl Muck, assisted by Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, will come to Springfield for the second of the Ellis Concerts in the Auditorium, Monday evening of next week, for which tickets go on sale at Otto Baab's Music House this morning. Dr. Muck has made up a program that delights the local musicians, including the great Tschaikowsky "Concerto" for piano and orchestra, a work which Miss Hartley is said to play with great brilliance. There will be much interest in this, the first appearance of Miss Hartley in Springfield. Her remarkable rise in a very short time has attracted much attention and she is now rated as one of the best of American women pianists.

STAR

s: BALTIMORE, MD

NOV 2 - 1916

GREAT APPLAUSE GIVEN KREISLER

Master Violinist Called to Front at Lyric Concert Many Times.

TRIUMPH FOR ORCHESTRA

Not less than eight times the people who packed the Lyric last evening called Fritz Kreisler forward to the front of the stage to bow to their applause as he finished the magnificent Schelling concerto, played in the first concert with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has graced Baltimore this season. And, at the close of the Beethoven Eroica, at a word from Dr. Carl Muck, the whole band of master musicians arose to take the overwhelming applause standing. Never has this city seen a finer opening night.

A soul singing in the wilderness, the mother's cry of tenderness over her child; these and much more were suggested by Kreisler's superb playing of the Schelling opus, new to Baltimore and a-thrill with floating melody. Right well did the composer know this master violinist; for, as Kreisler played, it was not a violin one heard; rather, it was a full orchestra, so deep were the tones, so magnificent the double stopping. One wished last evening that the invariable rule of the Bostonians had been suspended and that Kreisler had been permitted to give at least one encore.

The great moment of this concerto was the solost's playing of the Fr. Kr. theme—fascinating, swaying melody, almost a lullaby.

Even if critics disagree as to whether Beethoven intended the Eroica Symphony (Opus 55) to portray the majesty of Napoleon, its heroism is symbolic and effulgent. The majesty of the opening movement, allegro con brio, which begins with two massive chords for the full orchestra, followed by the chief theme, sung by the cellos, is intensely prophetic of victory. And during the stately marche funebre one can almost feel the passing of a great soul, a superbeing into the world beyond. The delicate lace work of the scherzo is as the wit and intrigue of battle; this was deliciously played.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress: New York City

NOV 5 1916

BOSTON SYMPHON IN FIRST MATINE

Dr. Muck and Famous Orches Render Splendid Program at Carnegie Hall.

CHAUSSON SELECTION DELIGH

Dr. Carl Muck conducted the first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, having chosen a program in which thoughtful and introspective moods were carefully blended with the more cheerful and gayer sides of life.

Chausson's B flat major symphony opened the program. It is a noble work that has pain, sorrow and grief as its leading motives. It describes the desolation of a heart that is without hope and without eillusion, relieved only by resignation and prayer.

Had Chausson written no other work than this, he would still have earned a right to take a place in the foremost ranks of composers. This he undoubtedly would have done had not an unfortunate accident put a premature end to his life and work.

Dr. Muck's performance was an admirable one, full of poetry, feeling and sympathy. His conducting shows such sensitiveness, such complete understandings of the emotions, and passions of others, and such individuality and style, that one wishes he would devote more of his time to original compositions. They would surely be a treat to listeners, at least, that is the impression he gives, and he undoubtedly has great gifts at his command.

A Faust overture by Wagner was the second number to be given, and it is difficult to trace in this thoughtful work any signs of the raging toothace Wagner is said to have had when he wrote the overture.

Beethoven's Overture: Grand Fugue (now free, now strict), was given for the first time by the orchestra yesterday, while Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn completed the program.

The Boston Symphony will give its second pair of concerts on Thursday evening, November 30, and Saturday afternoon, December 2.

EVENING JOURNAL

ess: New York City

NOV 3

DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN IN 1ST CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck and his men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York last evening for the first of their season concerts in Carnegie Hall and were given the usual warm welcome from the accustomed housefull. The great audience was given nothing that drove it into any puzzled writhing of soul or strange troublings of mental convolutions. Dr. Muck was steadfast to well tried things, the only semblance of the novel on his programme being Berlioz's concert overture to Byron's "The Corsair." For the rest, there was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss's recently Nijinskidded "Till Eulenspiegel."

Were it not for the fact that this programme was identically that which opened the Boston Orchestra's concerts in its own city, and therefore probably devised during the Summer, one might have imagined Dr. Muck bringing "Till Eulenspiegel" to New York as a bit of irony for New Yorkers. Certainly he provided the opportunity for once more familiarizing oneself with this one of the best examples of Strauss's quality, as a postscript to the overwrought and underdone balletted version recently on view on West Thirty-fourth street, to say nothing of its aptness as postscript to the latest and most vapid Strauss of the "Alpine" symphony.

But that was its only aspect of postscript, although it did end Dr. Muck's programme, for the manner in which it was played made it a genuine Straussian footnote to fifteenth century legendary history. Indeed, the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck both were in their best fettle throughout the evening.

Thus Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony became an event, in a season where new music and old music both have already been so often mere eventuality. The symphony was not alone played with that minute detail of finish that is an orchestral joy; it had been prepared with utmost care to let it sound the whole of its stirring emotional musical speech. It is the fatality of words, when they attempt to describe music, to become banal; and the greater the music, the more banal the words seem. Perhaps it were wiser, therefore, not to venture farther. Yet this much may be said. One lifted up one's head as the music flowed onward; concentration of thought evolved into concentration of feeling. Beethoven seemed again to be the master of them all.

The Berlioz overture, seldom played, was well worth hearing, although it is not the finest Berlioz. It has its spots of the commonplace, but at least it displays what, at the time it was written, was a genuinely new orchestral suggestion of the sea and its storms and still appears robustly original in this respect. It is a romantic response in music to the Byronism of its time and Dr. Muck succeeded in recreating such vitality as it has. And he almost succeeded in making Liszt's grandiloquence in "Mazeppa" imposing.

m EAGLE

dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM.

William J. Henderson, musical critic, of Manhattan, discussed in detail, yesterday afternoon, at the Brooklyn Institute, the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening in the opera house of the Academy. He brought with him two young women from the School of Musical Art, Manhattan, who played on two pianos the motives and phrases of the compositions on the program. They are Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, opus 20; Wagner's Faust Overture, Schelling's Concerto for violin and orchestra, which will be played for the first time here, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, and the Strauss symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Mr. Henderson did not devote much time to the symphony, which, he said, is admirably described by Philip Hale in the descriptive program books that are obtainable for every Boston Symphony concert. Schelling's Concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler last summer at Bar Harbor and was performed by the orchestra and Mr. Kreisler for the first time on October 17 last in Providence, R. I.

The chief composition considered was Wagner's Faust Overture, which Mr. Henderson analyzed in detail, describing its motives, and then calling upon his young pianists to play the whole overture, which they did admirably.

[38]

om TRIBUNE

ddress: New York City

BOSTON PLAYERS RECALL HISTORY

Symphony Orchestra Delights Carnegie Hall Audience

It was, of course, the merest chance that last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall and a modest band of twenty-five or thirty men in the Garrick Theatre should for a few moments have been engaged in playing music based on the same theme—a theme invented by the boy Mozart for his operetta "Bastien and Bastienne"—in 1768 and employed by the mature Beethoven a full generation later as the principal subject of his "Heroic" Symphony. A coincidence, but one that offers a glimpse into the workings of genius and one that to the observing showed how gigantic was the stride taken by music in a single lifetime.

The Boston musicians under Dr. Muck played the symphony to open the season two years ago, and there were those who thought they observed something of a purposed Teutonic demonstration in it. No such thought was likely to arise last night; minds and emotions of the listeners were all engrossed in receiving the proclamation of beauty—strong, virile beauty—which Dr. Muck and his men made. A nobler performance we do not recall or one more replete with sheer loveliness. There were other things on the programme in which the virtuosoship of the orchestra shone, like "Till Eulenspiegel," but there was enough in the symphony for one visit.

The "Corsair" overture, by Berlioz, which was on the programme, is an unfamiliar work; so unfamiliar, indeed, that eleven years ago a conspiracy was set afoot in the office of the "Musical Courier" to capture a prize of $500 offered by Mr. Paderewski for the best overture by an American composer. A clerk in the circulation department gave the use of his name to the fraud, which might have cost him and his employer dear had the trustees of the Paderewski fund chosen to pursue the matter; but they thought it not worth the trouble, inasmuch as the judges had not been deceived.

Mr. Walter Damrosch then put the work on the programme of a Kubelik concert more as a curiosity than anything else. That, we believe, was the first and last performance of "The Corsair" until that of last night.

H. E. K.

EVENING STAR

s: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, as soloist, gave its first concert of the season at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. Especial interest centered in the new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which was played by Kreisler and was rewarded with long continued applause. The orchestral numbers included Schumann's Symphony in E flat major, "Rhenish"; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, and Brahm's overture, "Academic Festival." As is usually the case with concerts by the orchestra, the audience was large and representative.

n EVENING GLOBE

ress: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first Carnegie Hall concert of the season with a performance o Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Thi performance throughout was of sur passing finish and euphony, and i the scherzo and the finale of exhilarating buoyancy and dash. Dr. Muck paid his men the supreme compliment of letting them play the scherzo with hardly a motion to indicate time o shading from their conductor, save i the tricky trio. The audienc (capacity, as usual for these concerts went wild with enthusiasm at th close of the work.

The rest of the programme consiste of Berlioz's overture to "The Co sair" (a favorite of the late Hans von Bülow, but seldom played nowadays). Liszt's "Mazeppa" (seemingly a favorite with Dr. Muck), and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" (certainly a favorite with Dr. Muck). The performance of all three was of a brilliance fairly astounding. Bülow once wrote of a performance of "The Corsair" overture conducted by himself that it went as if "it were shot from a pistol." Too bad he could not hear the performance last night.

P. S.

m PUBLIC LEDGER

dress: Philadelphia, Pa. NOV 3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—I am delighted to see that your musical critic has the courage of his convictions. I heard the concert last evening. More of such candor and honesty is much to be desired in musical criticism.

VERITAS.

Philadelphia, October 31, 1916.

UNION

Springfield, Mass.

OCT. 29, 1916.

SECOND IN THE ELLIS-MARSH SERIES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the renowned Dr. Karl Muck will play in the Auditorium on Monday, Nov. 6, this being the second concert of the Ellis-Marsh series, begun so brilliantly by Mme. Farrar. This concert is the first of the two symphony concerts this season which the organization has decided to give in Springfield; and it should be generously attended to prove that there is a good demand for such sterling attractions here. For a soloist, Miss Laeta Hartley an American pianist of brilliant attainments has been chosen, she playing the B-flat minor concerto by Tschaikowsky, one of the finest solo-compositions ever written for piano. She has a splendid command of her instrument and interpretative ability of unusual degree. The orchestra, perhaps, never better equipped in personnel than this season for the performance of the world's greatest orchestral masterpieces, will play Liszt's "Mazeppa," and the massive "Rheinish" symphony in E-flat major by Schumann; and may be depended upon for a delightful reading of whatever it undertakes. Tickets for this concert, and for the two remaining ones—respectively on Jan. 29 when Fritz Kreisler comes, and on Feb. 23, when the greatest of symphony orchestras will be heard again—are now on sale at Otto Bauer's. Advance orders are being filled in the order of their receipt.

MORNING TELEGRAPH

New York City

NOV 3 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Incomparable Orchestra Opens Season to Delight of Audience at Carnegie Hall.

DR. KARL MUCK DIRECTING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The annual visits of the greatest symphony orchestra in the world—for it is generally conceded by connoisseurs that there is no band either in Europe or in America to equal it—have become an institution, and as has been the case for several years past, the performances are entirely sold out by subscription.

It is difficult to excel Philip Hale's analysis of Dr. Muck's relation to his orchestra. "The Boston Symphony is not merely one that contains certain virtuosos," he says. "The orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr. Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul."

And it is true. Dr. Muck has gradually raised his orchestra to the high plane on which it rests by sheer ability and power, and it is difficult to picture this orchestra without the slight, erect figure of Dr. Muck at its head.

It must be admitted that Dr. Muck has of late evinced a little hardly feeling toward New Yorkers, deeming us, perhaps, too frivolous; at least that is the meaning we give to some very stiff and rather dull programs he has chosen for us.

But why dwell on the past? Last night's concert was a very beautiful one. It consisted of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair;" Leiszt's "Mazeppa," symphonic poem for full orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Dr. Muck led his men with characteristic spirit and skill.

From WORLD

Address: New York City

Date NOV 3

BOSTON MUSICIANS PLAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra entered triumphantly upon its thirty-first season in New York last night in Carnegie Hall. It would be difficult to imagine a more brilliant and satisfying performance than Dr. Muck's men gave.

The programme comprised Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, played with wonderful precision and spirit; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair;" Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," in both of which the orchestra thrilled its auditors by its sheer brilliance, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which permitted a display of individual and combined virtuosity.

The audience was very big and most appreciative.

The second concert will be given tomorrow afternoon.

m SUN

dress: New York City

NOV 3

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS ITS SEASON

Organization Heard In Programme of Beethoven, Berlioz, Liszt and Strauss.

"EROICA" SUPERBLY DONE

Standards of the Institution Kept Up to the Customary Level.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in town again. Their first concert of the current season took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was arranged in a way that might suggest to an essayist a long discussion on the growth of certain tendencies in modern music. It consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel."

Here is a swift survey of the field of modern "programme" music with three periods clearly defined and even the remarkable influence of Byron indicated. But these are matters for sober reflection, not for the running record of the morning after. Possibly one might pause long enough to wonder whether Dr. Muck had been reading Quintilian on oratory, for that eminent teacher advised the placing of the weakest arguments in the middle, and Dr. Muck had his weakest compositions in this well protected position.

The performance of the "Eroica," familiar as the symphony is, was of impressive character. The funeral march has often been played admirably in this city, but its profound solemnity and its poignant emotion have never been brought out more strikingly than they were last evening.

In the scherzo Dr. Muck indulged in an artist's caprice by resting through more than half of the movement, allowing the orchestra to display its brilliant precision and virtuosity by proceeding without his direction. Or is it possible that the distinguished conductor does not find himself so deeply interested in the scherzo as in the other movements? It was manifest that his heart was in the finale, for he directed it with great feeling and it was superbly played.

The Boston orchestra has seen many changes in its personnel, but none except for the better in its artistic excellence. It is still a great institution and its visits to New York continue to be among the real events of the musical season.

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BIG AUDIENCE GREETS KREISLER AT NATIONAL

Famous Violinist Serves as Soloist for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave its first concert of the season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. There was a large and representative audience present, and many, unable to get seats, stood during the concert.

The soloist of the occasion was Fritz Kreisler, who played Ernest Schelling's new concerto, written for the violinist last July. The opening passages of the concerto are extremely effective and original, the harmony is rich, and the theme for the violin quaint and lovely. The concerto does not lack variety, for in it are included several themes from Mr. Schelling's former compositions, a vivo movement which recalls a Scottish jig, and folk song themes of different countries, these last a never-failing source of inspiration.

Mr. Kreisler played with his usual depth of feeling and emotional appeal. Always lofty and spiritual in quality, his work is a revelation of his high ideals. After the concerto Mr. Kreisler was recalled by the audience many times.

The orchestra gave an excellent interpretation of Schumann's symphony in E flat major, called "Rhenish," because it is supposed to portray the composer's impressions of life in the Rhineland.

The symphony was played in five movements, the first two full of liveliness and vigor. The third movement is quiet and thoughtful in character, with an appealing melody, while the fourth represents a religious ceremony, and the music is solemn and majestic in character. The finale is vigorous and joyous, with the religious motive reappearing at intervals.

The overture to "The Corsair," a short but dramatic composition, was rendered impressively by the orchestra, and the concert closed with the presentation of Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture. This piece was written by the composer as an expression of gratitude to the University of Breslau, which had conferred a degree upon him. It abounds with jolly student songs, and was played by the orchestra with a spirit of enthusiasm which the audience applauded warmly.

STAR
s: BALTIMORE, MD
NOV - 1916

GREAT APPLAUSE GIVEN KREISLER

Master Violinist Called to Front at Lyric Concert Many Times.

TRIUMPH FOR ORCHESTRA

Not less than eight times the people who packed the Lyric last evening called Fritz Kreisler forward to the front of the stage to bow to their applause as he finished the magnificent Schelling concerto, played in the first concert with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has graced Baltimore this season. And, at the close of the Beethoven Eroica, at a word from Dr. Carl Muck, the whole band of master musicians arose to take the overwhelming applause standing. Never has this city seen a finer opening night.

A soul singing in the wilderness, the mother's cry of tenderness over her child; these and much more were suggested by Kreisler's superb playing of the Schelling opus, new to Baltimore and a-thrill with floating melody. Right well did the composer know this master violinist; for, as Kreisler played, it was not a violin one heard; rather, it was a full orchestra, so deep were the tones, so magnificent the double stopping. One wished last evening that the invariable rule of the Bostonians had been suspended and that Kreisler had been permitted to give at least one encore.

The great moment of this concerto was the solost's playing of the Fr. Kr. theme—fascinating, swaying melody, almost a lullaby.

Even if critics disagree as to whether Beethoven intended the Eroica Symphony (Opus 55) to portray the majesty of Napoleon, its heroism is symbolic and effulgent. The majesty of the opening movement, allegro con brio, which begins with two massive chords for the full orchestra, followed by the chief theme, sung by the cellos, is intensely prophetic of victory. And during the stately marche funebre one can almost feel the passing of a great soul, a superbeing into the world beyond. The delicate lace work of the scherzo is as the wit and intrigue of battle; this was deliciously played.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City
1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST MATINEE

Dr. Muck and Famous Orchestra Render Splendid Program at Carnegie Hall.

CHAUSSON SELECTION DELIGHTS

Dr. Carl Muck conducted the first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, having chosen a program in which thoughtful and introspective moods were carefully blended with the more cheerful and gayer sides of life.

Chausson's B flat major symphony opened the program. It is a noble work that has pain, sorrow and grief as its leading motives. It describes the desolation of a heart that is without hope and without eillusion, relieved only by resignation and prayer.

Had Chausson written no other work than this, he would still have earned a right to take a place in the foremost ranks of composers. This he undoubtedly would have done had not an unfortunate accident put a premature end to his life and work.

Dr. Muck's performance was an admirable one, full of poetry, feeling and sympathy. His conducting shows such sensitiveness, such complete understandings of the emotions, and passions of others, and such individuality and style, that one wishes he would devote more of his time to original compositions. They would surely be a treat to listeners, at least, that is the impression he gives, and he undoubtedly has great gifts at his command.

A Faust overture by Wagner was the second number to be given, and it is difficult to trace in this thoughtful work any signs of the raging toothace Wagner is said to have had when he wrote the overture.

Beethoven's Overture: Grand Fugue (now free, now strict), was given for the first time by the orchestra yesterday, while Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn completed the program.

The Boston Symphony will give its second pair of concerts on Thursday evening, November 30, and Saturday afternoon, December 2.

EVENING JOURNAL
ess: New York City
NOV 3

DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN IN 1ST CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck and his men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York last evening for the first of their season concerts in Carnegie Hall and were given the usual warm welcome from the accustomed housefull. The great audience was given nothing that drove it into any puzzled writhing of soul or strange troublings of mental convolutions. Dr. Muck was steadfast to well tried things, the only semblance of the novel on his programme being Berlioz's concert overture to Byron's "The Corsair." For the rest, there was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Richard Strauss's recently Nijinskidded "Till Eulenspiegel."

Were it not for the fact that this programme was identically that which opened the Boston Orchestra's concerts in its own city, and therefore probably devised during the Summer, one might have imagined Dr. Muck bringing "Till Eulenspiegel" to New York as a bit of irony for New Yorkers. Certainly he provided the opportunity for once more familiarizing oneself with this one of the best examples of Strauss's quality, as a postscript to the overwrought and underdone balletted version recently on view on West Thirty-fourth street, to say nothing of its aptness as postscript to the latest and most vapid Strauss of the "Alpine" symphony.

But that was its only aspect of postscript, although it did end Dr. Muck's programme, for the manner in which it was played made it a genuine Straussian footnote to fifteenth century legendary history. Indeed, the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck both were in their best fettle throughout the evening.

Thus Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony became an event, in a season where new music and old music both have already been so often mere eventuality. The symphony was not alone played with that minute detail of finish that is an orchestral joy; it had been prepared with utmost care to let it sound the whole of its stirring emotional musical speech. [illegible]s the fatality of words, when they [illegible]tempt to describe music, to become [illegible]nal; and the greater the music, [illegible]e more banal the words seem. Perhaps it were wiser, therefore, not [illegible]venture farther. Yet this much [illegible] said. One lifted up one's [illegible] the music flowed onward; [illegible]tion of thought evolved into [illegible]tion of feeling. Beethoven [illegible]ain to be the master of [illegible]rlioz overture, seldom [illegible] well worth hearing, al[illegible] not the finest Berlioz. [illegible]ts of the commonplace, [illegible]t displays what, at the [illegible]itten, was a genuinely [illegible]suggestion of the sea [illegible]and still appears ro[illegible] this respect. It is [illegible]se in music to the [illegible]ime and Dr. Muck [illegible]ting such vitality [illegible]almost succeeded [illegible]grandiloquence in [illegible]posing.

m EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM.

William J. Henderson, musical critic, of Manhattan, discussed in detail, yesterday afternoon, at the Brooklyn Institute, the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening in the opera house of the Academy. He brought with him two young women from the School of Musical Art, Manhattan, who played on two pianos the motives and phrases of the compositions on the program. They are Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, opus 20; Wagner's Faust Overture, Schelling's Concerto for violin and orchestra, which will be played for the first time here, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, and the Strauss symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Mr. Henderson did not devote much time to the symphony, which, he said, is admirably described by Philip Hale in the descriptive program books that are obtainable for every Boston Symphony concert. Schelling's Concerto was written for Mr. Kreisler last summer at Bar Harbor and was performed by the orchestra and Mr. Kreisler for the first time on October 17 last in Providence, R. I.

The chief composition considered was Wagner's Faust Overture, which Mr. Henderson analyzed in detail, describing its motives, and then calling upon his young pianists to play the whole overture, which they did admirably.

[38]

om TRIBUNE
ldress: New York City

BOSTON PLAYERS RECALL HISTORY

Symphony Orchestra Delights Carnegie Hall Audience

It was, of course, the merest chance that last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall and a modest band of twenty-five or thirty men in the Garrick Theatre should for a few moments have been engaged in playing music based on the same theme—a theme invented by the boy Mozart for his operetta "Bastien and Bastienne"—in 1768 and employed by the mature Beethoven a full generation later as the principal subject of his "Heroic" Symphony. A coincidence, but one that offers a glimpse into the workings of genius and one that to the observing showed how gigantic was the stride taken by music in a single lifetime.

The Boston musicians under Dr. Muck played the symphony to open the season two years ago, and there were those who thought they observed something of a purposed Teutonic demonstration in it. No such thought was likely to arise last night; minds and emotions of the listeners were all engrossed in receiving the proclamation of beauty—strong, virile beauty—which Dr. Muck and his men made. A nobler performance we do not recall or one more replete with sheer loveliness. There were other things on the programme in which the virtuosoship of the orchestra shone, like "Till Eulenspiegel," but there was enough in the symphony for one visit.

The "Corsair" overture, by Berlioz, which was on the programme, is an unfamiliar work; so unfamiliar, indeed, that eleven years ago a conspiracy was set afoot in the office of the "Musical Courier" to capture a prize of $500 offered by Mr. Paderewski for the best overture by an American composer. A clerk in the circulation department gave the use of his name to the fraud, which might have cost him and his employer dear had the trustees of the Paderewski fund chosen to pursue the matter; but they thought it not worth the trouble, inasmuch as the judges had not been deceived.

Mr. Walter Damrosch then put the work on the programme of a Kubelik concert more as a curiosity than anything else. That, we believe, was the first and last performance of "The Corsair" until that of last night.

H. E. K.

EVENING STAR
s: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, as soloist, gave its first concert of the season at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. Especial interest centered in the new concerto by Ernest Schelling, which was played by Kreisler and was rewarded with long continued applause. The orchestral numbers included Schumann's Symphony in E flat major, "Rhenish"; Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, and Brahm's overture, "Academic Festival." As is usually the case with concerts by the orchestra, the audience was large and representative.

n EVENING GLOBE
ress: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first Carnegie Hall concert of the season with a performance o Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Thi performance throughout was of sur passing finish and euphony, and i the scherzo and the finale of exhilarating buoyancy and dash. Dr. Muck paid his men the supreme compliment of letting them play the scherzo with hardly a motion to indicate time o shading from their conductor, save i the tricky trio. The audienc (capacity, as usual for these concerts went wild with enthusiasm at th close of the work.

The rest of the programme consiste of Berlioz's overture to "The Co sair" (a favorite of the late Hans von Bülow, but seldom played nowadays). Liszt's "Mazeppa" (seemingly a favorite with Dr. Muck), and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" (certainly a favorite with Dr. Muck). The performance of all three was of a brilliance fairly astounding. Bülow once wrote of a performance of "The Corsair" overture conducted by himself that it went as if "it were shot from a pistol." Too bad he could not hear the performance last night.

P. S.

m PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa. NOV 3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—I am delighted to see that your musical critic has the courage of his convictions. I heard the concert last evening. More of such candor and honesty is much to be desired in musical criticism.

VERITAS.

Philadelphia, October 31, 1916.

UNION
Springfield, Mass.
OCT. 29, 1916

SECOND IN THE ELLIS-MARSH SERIES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the renowned Dr. Karl Muck will play in the Auditorium on Monday, Nov. 6, this being the second concert of the Ellis-Marsh series, begun so brilliantly by Mme. Farrar. This concert is the first of the two symphony concerts this season which the organization has decided to give in Springfield; and it should be generously attended to prove that there is a good demand for such sterling attractions here. For a soloist, Miss Laeta Hartley an American pianist of brilliant attainments has been chosen, she playing the B-flat minor concerto by Tschaikowsky, one of the finest solo-compositions ever written for piano. She has a splendid command of her instrument and interpretative ability of unusual degree. The orchestra, perhaps, never better equipped in personnel than this season for the performance of the world's greatest orchestral masterpieces, will play Liszt's "Mazeppa," and the massive "Rheinish" symphony in E-flat major by Schumann; and may be depended upon for a delightful reading of whatever it undertakes. Tickets for this concert, and for the two remaining ones—respectively on Jan. 29 when Fritz Kreisler comes, and on Feb. 23, when the greatest of symphony orchestras will be heard again—are now on sale at Otto Bauer's. Advance orders are being filled in the order of their receipt.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Incomparable Orchestra Opens Season to Delight of Audience at Carnegie Hall.

DR. KARL MUCK DIRECTING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The annual visits of the greatest symphony orchestra in the world—for it is generally conceded by connoisseurs that there is no band either in Europe or in America to equal it—have become an institution, and as has been the case for several years past, the performances are entirely sold out by subscription.

It is difficult to excel Philip Hale's analysis of Dr. Muck's relation to his orchestra. "The Boston Symphony is not merely one that contains certain virtuosos," he says. "The orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr. Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul."

And it is true. Dr. Muck has gradually raised his orchestra to the high plane on which it rests by sheer ability and power, and it is difficult to picture this orchestra without the slight, erect figure of Dr. Muck at its head.

It must be admitted that Dr. Muck has of late evinced a little hardly feeling toward New Yorkers, deeming us, perhaps, too frivolous; at least that is the meaning we give to some very stiff and rather dull programs he has chosen for us.

But why dwell on the past? Last night's concert was a very beautiful one. It consisted of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat, Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair;" Leiszt's "Mazeppa," symphonic poem for full orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Dr. Muck led his men with characteristic spirit and skill.

From WORLD
Address: New York City

Date NOV 3

BOSTON MUSICIANS PLAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra entered triumphantly upon its thirty-first season in New York last night in Carnegie Hall. It would be difficult to imagine a more brilliant and satisfying performance than Dr. Muck's men gave.

The programme comprised Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, played with wonderful precision and spirit; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair;" Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," in both of which the orchestra thrilled its auditors by its sheer brilliance, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which permitted a display of individual and combined virtuosity.

The audience was very big and most appreciative.

The second concert will be given tomorrow afternoon.

m SUN
dress: New York City
NOV 3

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS ITS SEASON

Organization Heard In Programme of Beethoven, Berlioz, Liszt and Strauss.

"EROICA" SUPERBLY DONE

Standards of the Institution Kept Up to the Customary Level.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in town again. Their first concert of the current season took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was arranged in a way that might suggest to an essayist a long discussion on the growth of certain tendencies in modern music. It consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel."

Here is a swift survey of the field of modern "programme" music with three periods clearly defined and even the remarkable influence of Byron indicated. But these are matters for sober reflection, not for the running record of the morning after. Possibly one might pause long enough to wonder whether Dr. Muck had been reading Quintilian on oratory, for that eminent teacher advised the placing of the weakest arguments in the middle, and Dr. Muck had his weakest compositions in this well protected position.

The performance of the "Eroica," familiar as the symphony is, was of impressive character. The funeral march has often been played admirably in this city, but its profound solemnity and its poignant emotion have never been brought out more strikingly than they were last evening.

In the scherzo Dr. Muck indulged in an artist's caprice by resting through more than half of the movement, allowing the orchestra to display its brilliant precision and virtuosity by proceeding without his direction. Or is it possible that the distinguished conductor does not find himself so deeply interested in the scherzo as in the other movements? It was manifest that his heart was in the finale, for he directed it with great feeling and it was superbly played.

The Boston orchestra has seen many changes in its personnel, but none except for the better in its artistic excellence. It is still a great institution and its visits to New York continue to be among the real events of the musical season.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BIG AUDIENCE GREETS KREISLER AT NATIONAL

Famous Violinist Serves as Soloist for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave its first concert of the season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. There was a large and representative audience present, and many, unable to get seats, stood during the concert.

The soloist of the occasion was Fritz Kreisler, who played Ernest Schelling's new concerto, written for the violinist last July. The opening passages of the concerto are extremely effective and original, the harmony is rich, and the theme for the violin quaint and lovely. The concerto does not lack variety, for in it are included several themes from Mr. Schelling's former compositions, a vivo movement which recalls a Scottish jig, and folk song themes of different countries, these last a never-failing source of inspiration.

Mr. Kreisler played with his usual depth of feeling and emotional appeal. Always lofty and spiritual in quality, his work is a revelation of his high ideals. After the concerto Mr. Kreisler was recalled by the audience many times.

The orchestra gave an excellent interpretation of Schumann's symphony in E flat major, called "Rhenish," because it is supposed to portray the composer's impressions of life in the Rhineland.

The symphony was played in five movements, the first two full of liveliness and vigor. The third movement is quiet and thoughtful in character, with an appealing melody, while the fourth represents a religious ceremony, and the music is solemn and majestic in character. The finale is vigorous and joyous, with the religious motive reappearing at intervals.

The overture to "The Corsair," a short but dramatic composition, was rendered impressively by the orchestra, and the concert closed with the presentation of Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture. This piece was written by the composer as an expression of gratitude to the University of Breslau, which had conferred a degree upon him. It abounds with jolly student songs, and was played by the orchestra with a spirit of enthusiasm which the audience applauded warmly.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 1 - 1

nnounced.

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS

Opens Season Here With Delightful Program, Aided by Fritz Kreisler.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, in its first concert of the season, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, literally packed the National Theater yesterday afternoon to its very doors. The program was a very interesting one, although Dr. Muck has given us more brilliant ones.

Schmann's E-flat major, "Rhemish" symphonys, Berlioz's "Corsair" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," opus were the orchestral offerings, and Ernest Schilling's concerto for violin and orchestra brought forth Fritz Kreisler, who received a genuine ovation.

Besides being the finest violinist before the public today, Mr. Kreisler enjoys an unprecedented personal popularity, which moved an eminent Boston critic to speak of him as "Kreisler the beloved."

Of the five movements of the Schumann Symphony the second and third seemed to be strongest in their popular appeal to the audience. The somewhat rugged joviality of the second and the lovely tenderness of the romanza in the third brought very enthusiastic applause at their close.

The Berlioz overture, rich in the imagination that characterizes all the tone poems of this composer, was brilliantly played, and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" proved a skillfully made "pot-pourri or fantasia" of German student songs.

The most interesting thing of the afternoon was the first presentation here of the Schilling concerto, by Mr. Kreisler. It proved a unique composition, piquant, difficult, indeed, in quite an original style, and Mr. Kreisler brought to its interpretation all his high gifts of artistic expression and marvelous technique. It was received with rapturous applause, requiring countless bowings by Mr. Kreisler.

From EVENING TELEGRA
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER WITH BOSTONIANS

Violinist is Soloist with Orchestra at Academy.

It was only Fritz Kreisler who saved it from being a moth-eaten evening at the Academy of Music last night. The great Austrian violinist, fully filled out physically after the emaciation of the trenches, and entirely recovered from the limp in his wounded leg, was quite the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program and served to attract an audience strikingly brilliant in personnel and appearance, and so notable numerically that even the orchestra pit below the stage was crowded.

Kreisler chose as his medium a new concerto by Ernest Schelling. It is a work that requires a technical giant to make the solo part effective; indeed, it is hard to imagine any one of less than Kreisler's mastery making anything of it at all. But last night's soloist was fully equal to its demands and the wizardry of his left hand and his perfect bow, combined with all the artistic ardor of his temperament, served to endow it with vitality and make it so effective that, after many recalls, the concerted hissing of downstairs was needed to silence the unbridled enthusiasm of upstairs so that Kreisler could at last retire and Dr. Muck finish the program.

There is much in this concerto of Schelling's, however, that is quite worthy of serious attention. Without, perhaps, any vast originality of conception, it is an extremely interesting combination of the ultra-modern schools and regards the orchestra as a legitimate means of picturing moods in the most effective ways without regard to the rules of harmony so dear to the musical forefathers—may they rest in peace. It is replete with odd intervals and delightful dissonances and the sure musicianship of the scoring serves to lend distinction to themes that might otherwise be considered banal and crude.

Outside of the soloist and his selection, the program was an excellent one for respectable old gentlemen and nice old ladies. It began with Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; then came an interval of ten minutes for revivification and then Wagner's "Faust" overture, the solo, and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture. The Boston organization was not entirely at its best, for some reason, but it was a pleasure to hear again the splendid sonority of tone, matched by no othe orchestra in this country if in the world, to feel the deep and serious musicianship of the men as a body, to note the matured technical proficiency of all the choirs and the unfailing distinction of the conductor in everything that he dic

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date Oct 22, 1915 OCT

Die Bostoner eröffnen ihre New Yorker Saison unter Leitung von Dr. Carl Muck mit ihrem ersten Konzertpaar am Abend des 2., resp. am Nachmittag des 4. November. Das Donnerstags-Programm lautet: Beethovens „Eroica", die Berlioz'sche „Corsaire"-Ouvertüre, Liszt's „Mazeppa" und Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche". Das Samstags-Nachmittagskonzert umfaßt: Symphonie in B von Chausson, Wagner's „Faust"-Ouvertüre, Beethoven's große Fuge für Streichorchester, und Brahms' „Variationen über einen Choral".

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date Oct 31st OCT 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LOCAL SEASON OPENS

Familiar Program, With Schelling Concerto as Novelty, Played by Kreisler

The inaugural of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-second local season, Fritz Kreisler's first appearance here since last spring and the announcement of a new violin concerto by the pianist, Ernest Schelling, served to send the "No seats, no standing room," sign up at the Academy unusually early last night. Aside from the concerto there was little novelty to the program, which began with the same symphony that Mr. Stokowski is to play next Friday—the "Rhenish" of Schumann—played in this case by Doctor Muck and his men with what the epigrammarians like to call "cool fury" or "weighed passion," which, in the vulgar idiom, means simply: with the intellect dominating the emotion. The whole concert was more for the thinker than the man who seeks in music consolation, excitement or the imaging of his own desires or sorrows. And it was, to be sure, done with marvelous polish and perfection of detail. One expects and gets that from Doctor Muck.

What one did not get, in the Wagner "Faust" overture, was much spinal thrill or the spirit of piety and sin. It was all as far away from Gounod and the footlights as it could well have been, which is, perhaps, correct, but it hardly painted "a soul aweary of life, yet ever forced by his indwelling daemon to engage anew in life's endeavors." The Boston's glorious horns gave the work a brilliance of sound, which was supported by the rest of the orchestha.

In the concerto, which was composed for Mr. Kreisler last summer, the great, focused strength of the Boston band also was apparent. In fact, the music seemed more like a purely orchestral piece, with interlarded violin passages. It proved to be an elaborately brocaded tapestry of sound, in which the skill of the weaver did not quite conceal the thinness of his thread, nor the intricacy of the dissonance make up for the elaboration. There were some points at which the interplay of violin and harps was quite engaging—the latter being especially well handled—and Mr. Kreisler's 3000 odd admirers shook the building with applause at his dextrous fingering of the dance and semipastoral themes.

All-embracing enthusiasm over a great artist is always good to see and hear, but there is a point at which hero-worship becomes a vice. So it must be recorded, in detached fairness to others, that last night's continual recalls, until hisses directed at the clappers mixed with the plaudits, were hardly good manners; were actually an impoliteness to the conductor, the soloist and more diffident auditors. Mr. Kreisler, who is plumper and has lost all trace of his war-time limp, came out and bowed many times, but gave no encore. The final number of the evening was Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, delayed somewhat by the previous demonstration for the violinist.

rom TIMES
ddress: New York City

Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The First Concert of the Season—Dr. Muck Warmly Greeted.

At the first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Carnegie Hall, there were the great audience, filling every seat in the house; the cordial and demonstrative greeting for Dr. Muck, the conductor; the delight in the playing of the organization, that have so often before been witnessed at the performances in this city. The orchestra, though it has been completely changed in its personnel since its first years, and has shown many new faces in recent years, remains the same, in its quality and its powers; and it has seldom surpassed its playing last evening in most of the essential matters that make for the highest artistic enjoyment.

Dr. Muck's program offered no soloist and contained nothing new and only one piece that was unfamiliar. It comprised Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's overture "The Corsair," Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa, and "Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The symphony received a particularly noble and stirring performance. There is that in it which appeals especially to the heart in these days; it was evident that Dr. Muck felt this appeal and that he was able to communicate it with unusual eloquence to his listeners. The orchestra was an extraordinarily supple and plastic instrument in his hands, and its playing was remarkably beautiful in tone, in the proportion and balance of the several instrumental qualities, in finish and lucidity of phrasing, full of subtle and significant nuance. There were an immense vitality in the first movement, a poignantly tragic note in the funeral march, and a fiery energy in the variations of the last movement; and it was all a true embodiment of Beethoven's thought, without the obtrusion of a "reading."

Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," is little known to concert goers. It has its brilliant passages—and how brilliantly was the vehement opening phrase delivered! But the music says singularly little, and is characteristic of Berlioz's strenuous groping for expression, his vague and uncertain melodic inspiration, which panted so ineffectually behind his ambition. There is glittering orchestration after Berlioz's manner, but the glitter is all on the outside, and it is but a dull piece.

Liszt's pictorial representation of Mazeppa's ride and Strauss's extraordinary rondo, which seems raised to a higher power of cleverness and wit in comparison with some of his later orchestral works, are matters to which the Boston Orchestra do fullest justice.

rom RECORD
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
te 31 OCT 3

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Kreisler's Genius Could Not Gloss Schelling's Concerto.

The thirty-second consecutive season of the Boston Orchestra concert series in Philadelphia had a brilliant beginning in the Academy of Music last night, but it may not be said that the closing of the performance was brilliant. With the always interesting and enjoyable Rhenische Symphony of Schumann as an opening offering, some pleasure was derived from an otherwise stupid program. The Rhenische Symphony was beautifully played, Dr. Muck bringing out in vivid style the animation and natural loveliness of the work.

With the exception of the Brahms "Academic Festival" overture, the closing piece, the enjoyable portion of the concert practically stopped with the Schumann work.

The "Faust" overture of Wagner might with profit to the audience have been left unplayed, since it does not present the Wagner beloved of opera-goers and has none of the inspiration usually found in the Wagner Overtures employed for concert purposes. With the adored Fritz Kreisler as soloist, even in an unknown work, there was hope of enjoyment. Any such anticipation was short-lived, however, since the Schelling concerto for violin, played by Kreisler, proved to be a tiresome, disconnected and uninteresting work even in such masterly hands. The composition is scarcely entitled to be called a concerto, but is rather in the manner of a fantasie. Schelling undoubtedly has a comprehensive knowledge of orchestration and he indulges his fancy in all kinds of peculiar and unusual effects. Some of these journeys into the possibilities of orchestration are productive of what we call style in music, and many of his effects were unique and of passing interest. There were brief passages for the solo instrument that bordered on something inspirational in character, but the mood was fleeting, and quickly changed to the rhythmic sway—largely Spanish—which redeemed the concerto from insipidity, but which did not atone for lack of coherent melody. Kreisler, of course, was the favorite he always is, and he was recalled to the stage many times.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York Cit
Date Oct 29, 1915 OC

Am kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag, finden in Carnegie Hall die beiden hiesigen Eröffnungskonzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck statt. Die Programme, welche keine Solisten aufweisen, sind wie folgt aufgestellt: Am Donnerstag Abend: Beethoven's „Eroica"; Berlioz' Ouvertüre zum „Korsaren"; Liszt's „Mazeppa" und Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel". Das Samstag Nachmittags-Programm enthält Chausson, Symphonie in H; Wagner's „Faust"-Ouvertüre; Beethoven's große Fuge für Streichorchester und Brahms' „Variationen über einen Choral von Haydn".

om EVENING GLOBE
ldress: New York City

te

Dr. Muck deserves thanks for putting the symphony of the ill-starred Chausson on the programme of the Boston orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. It is on the whole a beautiful work and has been neglected. Vincent d'Indy conducted a performance of it here when he visited New York nearly eleven years ago as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I recall only one subsequent performance here until that of Saturday—a performance by the Symphony Society at the Century Theatre in the course of a series of concerts Mr. Damrosch devoted to modern French music.

Meantime the same old symphonies of the classic masters and the three ubiquitous overtures of Weber are played until some of the greatest works of human genius threaten to become public nuisance. Are conductors like the prima donna with her mad scene, her skyrocketing waltz? Are they wedded to the pieces they know, the pieces they are certain to make an effect with, as Mr. Safonoff was to Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique"?

I would hardly go so far as Mr. Carl Van Vechten goes in that delicious essay on "Music for Museums?" in his inspiriting book "Music After the Great War," where he declares he really does not think a modern symphony orchestra ought to be allowed to play more than one Beethoven symphony a season. We must remember the generation that is growing up. But I do agree that Beethoven's symphonies are played too much—too much for their own good and for their hearers'. A performance of a Beethoven symphony to-day—when Beethoven has been bred into our bones—should be as carefully prepared, as enthusiastically led as a performance of a brand new piece by Schoenberg or Stravinsky. I heard such a performance of the Seventh Symphony conducted by Dr. Muck a couple of years ago and such a performance of the "Eroica" last Thursday.

TIMES
New York City
1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Chausson's Symphony and Beethoven's "Grand Fugue" Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its highest level of achievement in yesterday afternoon's concert that marked the end of its present visit to New York. Dr. Muck was likewise in his best vein, and the performance was a memorable one. Likewise the program was of uncommon interest. It comprised Chausson's symphony, "Eine Faust Ouvertüre" by Wagner, Beethoven's "Grand Fugue" in B flat, Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn's.

The symphony has been played here a few times, but it has not taken the place in the modern répertoire that its beauties entitle it to. It is noble and beautiful music, fitly to be placed among the finest products of the modern French school—not of the most modern, but of that which derives directly from César Franck. Yet there is no question here of imitation nor even of a dominating influence. Chausson's inspiration was his own; and this music has a peculiarly personal touch. The symphony is a real symphony; its structure is substantial; nor was Chausson afraid or ashamed to treat his ideas conclusively as musical ideas, and to evolve beauty and eloquence by symphonic development. It is notably fine in its orchestration. Chausson's orchestral color is of itself a means for creating a poetical and emotional atmosphere; and there are effects throughout the three movements that give him title of master.

Dr. Muck entered with obvious enthusiasm and warmth of feeling into the spirit of this work; and the performance was a glowing and profoundly beautiful one. It was particularly beautiful in its reproduction of the orchestral color, in its transparency, its subtle adjustment of the different planes and strata of the color scheme, and the unerring prescience with which the composer's melodic line was followed through it.

The performance of Beethoven's great fugue by all the strings of the orchestra was deeply interesting, and an extraordinary tour de force. It has been done here in this way before by Felix Weingartner. The piece was composed for string quartet, and was intended as the finale of Op. 130, from which place the composer ousted it in favor of a less exacting movement. Of course, it partakes of the qualities of his last style, and of what may be called its extravagance and recklessness. Beethoven made no such demands on the four players of any other, even of his last quartets, as he did in this. Its difficulties are not only for the individual players, but still more for the ensemble. There are certain passages which seem almost impossible for even the most accomplished quartet players to make sound like much else than sawing wood, no matter what perfection of intonation or what subtly considered balance of the parts they employ in their task. The colossal spirit of the piece is too great for the fragile frame within which it is confined. The recourse to a string orchestra is obvious. This has much more justification than in any other of the last quartets, and its justification was established by the results of yesterday's performance. There are still great difficulties to be overcome, and the difficulties in ensemble are in some sense multiplied by the multiplication of the instruments. But when they are mastered as they were in this performance, the effect is superb. The piece now actually "sounds," and the rough places are made, if not plain, at least a good deal plainer. It cannot be said that the composition made a deep effect upon the audience, but the magnificence of the performance was promptly recognized and heartily applauded, so that Dr. Muck made the string players rise (those that were not already standing) to accept the applause.

From EVENING JOURNA
Address: New York City
Date Nov. 6 - Nov

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For the second of its pair of New York oncerts, the Boston Symphony Orchesra on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall brought forward Chausson's symphony, which is only rarely heard. Dr. Muck gave it a performance of exquisite clarity and searching penetration. Presented in this way, it seemed to have been unworthily neglected heretofore. The rest of Dr. Muck's programme consisted of Wagner's "Faust" overture, which he made as interesting in his way as Toscanini once did in his; the Beethoven "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra," expanded from its original four strings, and superbly played by the men from Boston, and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme of Haydn."

The New York Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Aeolian Hall played the chorale and marche funebre and the air de ballet from Xavier Leroux's incidental music to "Les Perses," one of the type of novelties with which Walter Damrosch knows so well how to vary his programmes; Saint-Saens' C minor symphony, scored for orchestra piano and organ, and with Carl Friedberg as the soloist, the Beethoven C minor concerto.

At the same time in the Cort Theatre, Max Jacobs's orchestra, known as The Orchestral Society of New York, gave the first of a series of Sunday afternoon concerts. The novelty of his programme was Homer N. Bartlett's symphonic poem, "Apollo," this being its first performance here. Arthur Hartmann played the Saint-Sains B minor concerto. The rest of the programme was devoted to works of Wagner and Tchaikovsky.

From the Herald Nov.11,1916,

SCHEHERAZADE ON PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite at Concert for First Time Since the Reign of Mr. Fiedler—Music and the Scenario Have Nothing in Common.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave its fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Brahms's symphony in C minor and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade." The Suite had not been played at these concerts since the reign of Mr. Fiedler.

When the ballet "Scheherazade" was first performed in Paris by a Russian company the wife of the composer protested in no measured terms against the disarrangement of her husband's music. This ballet has been given in Boston several times, first by Miss Gertrude Hoffmann and last season and this season by the Ballet Russe. The ballet itself is a gorgeously sensual spectacle, even in the somewhat chastened form that is thought to please American taste, but the music and the scenario have nothing in common except that they are oriental.

Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote an argument for his score. The music is in illustration of Sinbad the Sailor, the storm at sea, the shipwreck, the tale of one of the three Kalandars, a tale of a prince and a princess. The argument is not wholly clear and probably this was the composer's intention. What prince and what princess? There are so many in "The Thousand Nights and a Night." Who will be so rash as to name the one of the three Kalandars? In the last movement there is a festival at Bagdad, and lo, suddenly Sinbad's ship sails to its fate.

In the ballet all this music is wedded to the story that is the prelude to the wondrous tales: the story of the two rulers, their wanton wives, and the resolve of one of the Kings to kill a spouse every morning, until Scheherazade by her charm as a narrator softens his heart. What then becomes of the graphic sea-music; or that illustrative of Kalandar, prince and princess? It is not necessary to insist on the incongruity.

The performance of the Suite yesterday afternoon was strikingly sensuous and brilliant. The imagination of the conductor was in unison with that of the composer. Unless a conductor can feel in this music the spirit of "The Thousand Nights and a Night," unless he is himself a rhapsodist with admiration for the wild fancy, the humor now grotesque, now cruel, now Rabelaisian, for the sensuousness that is at times sensuality; unless there is understanding, with appreciation of the imagination that peopled the air with slaves of King Solomon's ring, hideous Afreets and space-annihilating genii, his interpretation will be that of a man who complains of endless repetitions without contrapuntal development. The music is not for the academic.

Grant that "Scheherazade" reeks at times of benzoin and the pastils of the harem; that it suggests

Lucent syrops, tinct with cinnamon;
Manna and dates in argosy transferred
From Fez; and spiced dainties, every one
From silken Samarcand to cedared Lebanon

—grant all this; there remains the superb sea music with the rolling billows, the tossing, laboring vessel, the final crash and wild farewell. There is more than a constant display of fancy or imagination. The wonder is, as a matter of technic, how Rimsky-Korsakoff succeeds in casting his spell with an alogous themes constantly varied. Nor is this due solely to the surprising, masterly and entrancing instrumentation. The performance yesterday was the first to reveal in fulness the strength, beauty and poetry of the composition.

Equally admirable, though necessarily in a different way, was the interpretation of the symphony. The impressive preparation for the Finale—music that announces something nobly sonorous to come—was shrewdly conceived. Here, as in the Suite, the art, the genius of the conductor was shown in the treatment of details as in that of climaxes and broad and sweeping pages.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The programs of the concerts next week will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Chabrier, "Espana."

From the Transcript.
Nov,11,1916.

DR. MUCK AND MISS MILLAR

The Second Symphony Concert at Cambridge, with Mme. Sembrich's First Pupil as Debutante—Chausson's Eloquent Symphony and Beethoven's Variously Regarded Fugue

FOR his second concert in Cambridge last evening, Dr. Muck selected a choice piece from each of his first three Boston programmes: from the opening one "Mazeppa," from the second, Chausson's beautiful and long slighted symphony, and from the third, Beethoven's Grand Fugue" for strings, which might have been expected, since our conductor has a way of repeating important works which his audience passes by. In addition to these, Cambridge had the pleasure which Boston had not of hearing Miss Susan Millar, the first pupil whom Mme. Sembrich has trained from the start, and sent, after three years of t, to her début. Miss Millar showed last night that her apprenticeship is by no means over—but she also showed every indicatcn and equipment for an unusually successful singer:—she has a pleasant bearing, is large, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, though not stout, has a clear and soft-toned contralto voice, an eager and alert sense of music and rhythm, and an intelligent feeling for the meaning of a text (if it have one). The first number, a routine operatic aria from the far past of Italy, did not seem to awaken emotion or enthusiasm in her, or in any one else, for that matter. But the three songs that she chose from Strauss's pre-matrimonial collection had a more kindling quality, for they always glowed with sentiment, if not sentimentality. Such a state of mind was to be expected under the conditions of their conception, and since the young Richard did even banal things well, the listeners of last night showed the more common sense in their attitude toward the love songs in question, by excusing and indulging. And the greater was their enjoyment. Miss Millar, at any rate, entered into their spirit of quiet and tender reflection, of gentle and amorous optimism. She sang with subdued fervor, with true accent, and with accurate intonation. But thoughtful songs of this sort have no call for the larger aspect of song—for ringing high notes and large, dramtaic declaration. Miss Millar showed us nothing of this. Whether she was in most need of confidence, to which a large orchestra is not conducive, or whether of further development of latent vocal powers, is hard to say. But she shows a good and thorough foundation, and broadening vistas, ahead.

Chausson's revived symphony has been greeted with delight on every hand. In the first place, it proves its composer to have been no bungler, but a thorough musician and a thorough workman, who not only mastered the ways of counterpoint, orchestration and structure, but utilized them fully and efficiently for his purpose of bringing to full recorded expression his musical thoughts and feelings. Consequently we have a Frenchman of unusually fine and noble character, sensitive to his environment of musical genius. He catches up the fire of his contemporaries, he learns thoroughly the working ways of his art, and he expresses his musical moods directly and comprehensibly. And his success in this is largely due to his broad and proportioned view of the whole structure under his making, as well as each of its movements. For his intensity of emotion and variance of mood are consistent and convincing, his climaxes do not spend themselves at the wrong moment, but cumulate, and carry the listener off his feet with their large voiced, melodic intensity. Chausson is not the kind to make bold excursions into the unknown, but he is the kind to make the most of the old, to utilize every opportunity, to keep interest and excitement alive at every phrase, turn, and climax, to make the most of eloquent and interwoven melody, always maintaining the balance between intricacy and poverty. His appeal is direct, but it never cloys. He always does the expected thing, but he always makes the most of it. And through the whole course of the work glows the individuality and personality of its author, with his alternating moods of brightness and sorrow, and his pulsating emotional fervor.

Beethoven's Fugue is a great work, but it was never meant for the resplendent glare of the concert hall, and in the midst of the brilliant array of an orchestral repast, its lofty, segregated and personal message, its thoughtful seriousness, are entirely obliterated. There was a festive spirit in last night's concert. Its more melting moods were nevertheless light ones, which contrasted well with gaiety. In such a spirit, Beethoven's Fugue can never be appreciated.

Liszt's "Mazeppa," on the other hand, made the most satisfactory kind of a close. In its brilliance, its dash, and its galloping rhythms of shrieking flute and blaring trumpet, its resounding and imperious themes for the brass, it is the most vivid, contagious and intoxicating postlude of them all, and Dr. Muck evidently shares his view, for he jealously saves it for the triumphant finishing off of his first and last programmes. And he takes just pride in his orchestra's execution of it, for such brilliance of brass was never excelled.

L. M. R.

From the Boston Post * Nov.12,1916.

group of popular musical folk. From left to right—Reinhold de Warlich, Russian basso cantata singer; Mrs. Fritz Kreisler and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Mr. Kreisler's popularity in Boston is so great that his Symphony Hall recitals are given to crowds that fill both auditorium and stage

From the Monitor
Nov.11,1916.

FIRST SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS GIVEN UNDER KARL MUCK

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor—Fourth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Nov. 10: Brahms, symphony No. 1 in C minor; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Schéhérazade" symphonic suite.

In putting the "Schéhérazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff into performance at the very time when the Diaghileff Russian ballet is visiting Boston and is presenting its pantomimic drama, "Schéhérazade," Dr. Muck has done something more important than break lances with the distinguished Frenchman who directs the music of the dance organization. For the question whether his reading of the piece is better or worse than that of the Diaghileff conductor all depends on what the listener prefers in the way of orchestral style. Those who like to be made keenly aware of the structure of music will say that the Symphony leader's study is the one that better pleases them, while those who like to be kept alert to color will say that the ballet conductor's study better suits them.

The more they discuss the matter, the farther will they be from determining anything. But the fact that they can find cause for debate is evidence that Rimsky-Korsakoff's work lends itself to the methods of any school. For its pages are a glorious exemplification of the art of orchestration; and whether treated in the manner of Berlin or in that of Paris, they remain a model of correct and expressive scoring. The original artist has furnished an almost matchless cartoon, in respect to both charm of subject and symmetry of design. The artificer who weaves a piece of tapestry from it may make his drawing run in sharp outline, or he may let it go dimly defined; but either method, applied consistently, will bring the task to a successful issue.

Whatever the significance of the production of the suite under the unpictorial conditions of the concert hall, at a time when it is being presented on an opera stage, with the spectacular accompaniment of dancing, the conductor's achievement was less remarkable in it than in the other number on his program. Indeed, the Brahms symphony in C minor, which is generally understood to be a severe composition, and in its second movement even ponderous, had great mildness of mood and lightness of action. Instead of standing, as it could well have been expected to do, in unfortunate contrast to "Schéhérazade," because of turgid orchestration and inelastic rhythm, it sounded nearly bright enough to claim consideration as a piece of dance music itself.

The performance of the Brahms work, because of its contained enthusiasm, must have reminded listeners of the conductor's first term with the Boston orchestra. Interpretation, as in those days of his first American acclaim, was all sincerity, yet never the sincerity of harshness. The reading of the first movement was intellectual, even rationalistic and keenly logical, yet without a touch of cynicism. It was a reading that the audience could call its own, instead of one brought to it like something it could take or leave, as it chose. And as for the andante and allegretto, they were in as complete agreement with the daily thinking of the public to which they were addressed, as if they had been composed on the ground. They were passages of Concord philosophy, idealistic, whimsical and bucolic, all at once. The fourth movement was a declaration of pleasure in the sunset that left an adjective or two for use at another time. The scoring of Brahms was allowed to effect its own climax, and because the earlier portions of the work had been kept within reasonable bounds of sonority, the concluding pæan chanted itself majestically through, not one of the orchestral voices lost.

TENOR FOR "FAUST" SYMPHONY

Arthur Hackett, tenor, is on the books of his concert manager, W. R. Macdonald, to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Dec. 22 and 23, singing the solo part in the "Faust" symphony of Liszt.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Nov. 17 and 18. He will present the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, No. 2, in C minor. The other works on the program will be the Sibelius symphony, No. 1, Debussy's prelude, "Afternoon of a Faun," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert in aid of its pension fund, on the afternoon of Sunday, Nov. 19, in Symphony Hall. The program will comprise the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 4 in F minor, the Weber overture to "Oberon," the Delibes "Sylvia" suite, a Johann Strauss waltz and the Nicolai overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."

EVENING POST
New York City

Three Orchestral Concerts.

At the matinée performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck opened with the Chausson Symphony in B flat, a work not often heard, in spite of its many beauties. The rest of the programme consisted of Wagner's Faust Overture, Beethoven's fugue for strings, opus 133, in B flat, and Brahms's "Chorale St. Antoine" variations—also in B flat—verily a B flat programme. The playing of the orchestra was on its usual high level, but that did not mitigate the dulness of the long Beethoven fugue; even Homer nods sometimes, and Beethoven, unapproachable as he is in sonata form, had very little to say in the fugue. At least in this one. But it was a virtuoso feat for the strings to play it as they did.

[40]

From the Journal
Nov.11,1916.

TWO CLASSIC WORKS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Leads Brilliant Performance at the Friday Matinee.

Fully as brilliant as any of its predecessors, both as regards program and performance, was yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr. Muck and his incomparable orchestra have returned from their first triumphal tour of Southern cities feeling, seemingly, that their efforts have never been more successful or more enthusiastically appreciated.

Brahms' first symphony, which ranks among the finest of modern compositions for orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which dramatically depicts several episodes in "The Thousand and One Nights," comprises this week's program. The symphony is enriched with haunting melodies, and the suite is, in effect, a vivid picture of the palmy days of Bagdad, full of magnificent colorings and of themes that admirably fit the famous narratives.

In both numbers are many solo passages that afford opportunity for the display of the virtuoso qualities for which the Symphony Orchestra has long been celebrated; but yesterday these particular beauties were but part of the magnificent ensemble achieved by Dr. Muck and the whole orchestra. The interpretation in both instances was highly poetical and replete with extraordinary technical skill. All in all, it was a performance in the finest possible orchestral style—a performance that made the two classic compositions seem more beautiful than ever. It will be given again tonight.

The program for next week's concerts is made up of the first Sibelius symphony, the Rachmaninoff piano concerto in C minor, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist.

From the American
Nov.12,1916.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, Russian pianist, will be soloist at the fifth Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for Piano in C-Minor.

Dr. Muck has arranged a varied and interesting program. The symphony will be that of Sibelius in E-Minor, No. 1, a work in which Dr. Muck has always shown great interest and with which he seems to be in profound sympathy. This is the first number. Following the Rachmaninoff concerto in the second part will come Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. The length of the program is one hour and fifty-five minutes.

From the Globe
Nov.11,1916.

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY SUPERBLY PLAYED

Dr Muck's Reading Is One of Great Nobility

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade Shows Orchestral Euphony

Dr Muck gave Brahms' first symphony with incomparable nobility and breadth of feeling at the concert yesterday afternoon. The structural warp and woof was exposed with a sense of proportion which did not accentuate here to obscure there, which found luminous and symmetrical lines of beauty. Yet the dramatic character of the familiar passages in the first and last movements was emphasized. The mystery in the opening measures of the bodefully insistent tonic organ point in kettledrum, the soaring strings sharply set off by the descending theme in the wood winds, all had a certain epic character which a great symphonic conductor and symphonic orchestra realized.

The second movement again revealed Mr Longy's peerless mastery of tone and beauty of phrase. Mr Sand, employing a tone rather dark to be characteristic of the clarinet, phrased smoothly and with taste. The slow movement denoted a profound, yet intimate, sympathy between conductor and players. The nobility of the composer's thought was recreated with sincerity and majesty. There was an overwhelming show of appreciation by the audience.

The only other music of the program was Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." The suite, based upon the subjects of Sinbad's ship, the Kalendar Prince, the Prince and Princess and the festival at Bagdad, has nothing to do with the program of the harem of Shariar, King of Indes, and its destruction with his faithless favorite. Gorgeously Oriental in color and sense it needs no program to illumine it, nor could the assumption of this or that expression of Oriental life dim the power of its spell.

The performance yesterday again made known the golden euphony of the orchestra. Mr Longy, Mr Maquarre and Mr Sand were not merely virtuosi, but interpreters. For the bassoon, an instrument here of peculiarly significant voice, a tone more flexible and of greater mystery would be preferred. Mr Witek played some passages of Scheherazade's haunting music ably, even with imagination; others with but little sense of its rhythmic elasticity and abandon.

Dr Muck's interpretation as a whole was rather a contemplative, reflective one, as the vision of youth and passion in a land of purple and incense, seen now from the vantage point of cooler and retrospective years. Long symphonic lines were developed with a breadth that at times was a restraint to ardor, that tempered barbaric splendor.

The fifth concerts next week will have the following program: Sebelius' first symphony, Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano (Mr Gabrilowitsch), Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana."

From the Boston Post
Nov.11,1916.

SYMPHONY'S VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Its Great Resources Revealed by Dr. Muck

Brahms' 1st Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite after the Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade," made up the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

No more notable revelation of the resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the great talent of its conductor could have been offered; and there could have been no more interesting and impressive illustrations of certain "classic" and "modern" tendencies in music than those driven home by the rugged and mighty symphony of Brahms and the gorgeous orientalism and fairy-tale quality of the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BEAUTY AND VARIETY

His coloring seems matchless for beauty and variety of orchestra tone, but his art is also that of a composer of supreme imagination as well as a magician of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck had never given a better illustration of his versatility than in his admirably finished and inspired production of "Scheherazade." He certainly met the Russian half way—refined it a trifle, perhaps, but lost no [illegible] essential spirit in so doing.

From the Transcript. Nov,11,1916.

DR. MUCK AND MISS MILLAR

The Second Symphony Concert at Cambridge, with Mme. Sembrich's First Pupil as Debutante—Chausson's Eloquent Symphony and Beethoven's Variously Regarded Fugue

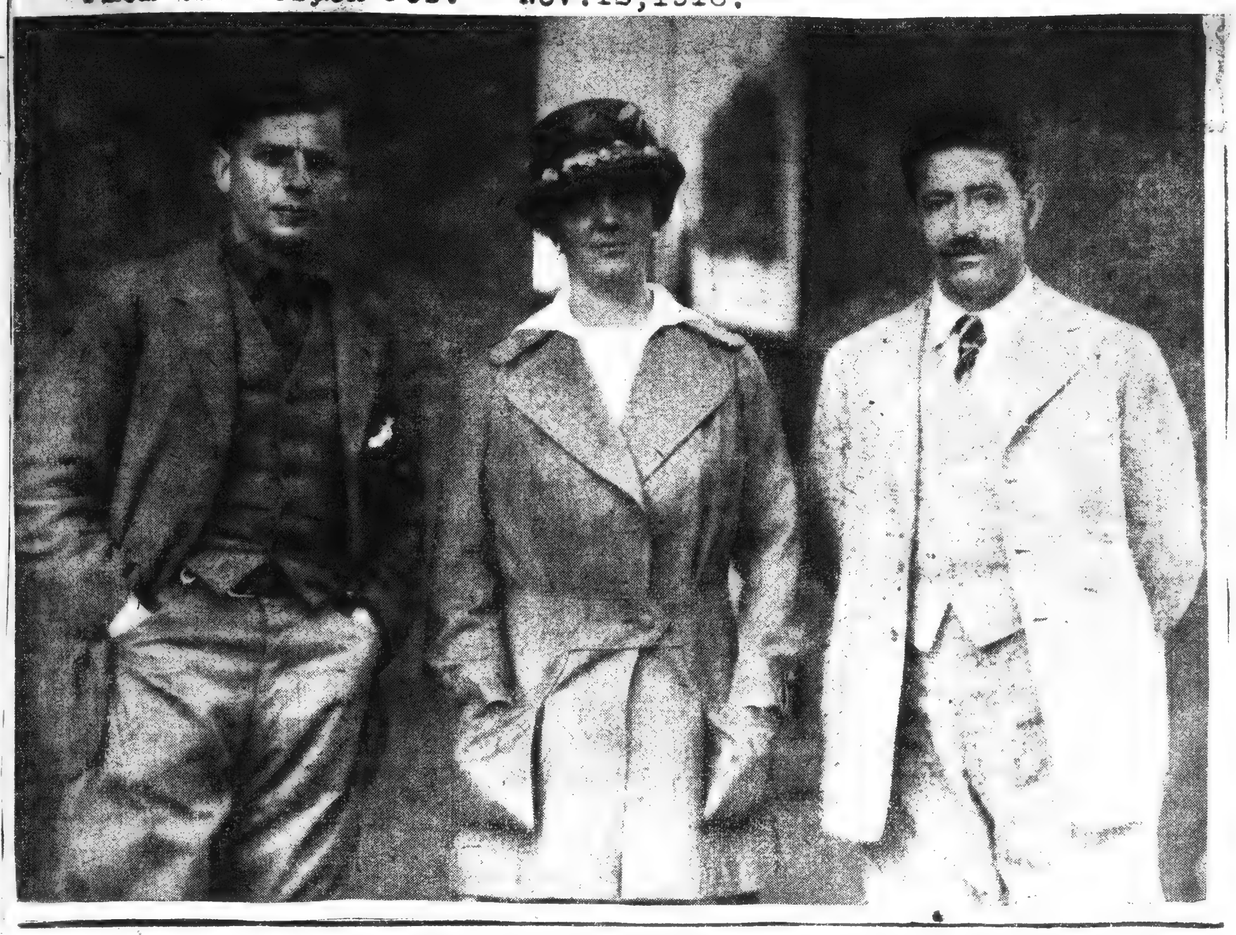
FOR his second concert in Cambridge last evening, Dr. Muck selected a choice piece from each of his first three Boston programmes: from the opening one "Mazeppa," from the second, Chausson's beautiful and long slighted symphony, and from the third, Beethoven's Grand Fugue" for strings, which might have been expected, since our conductor has a way of repeating important works which his audience passes by. In addition to these, Cambridge had the pleasure which Boston had not of hearing Miss Susan Millar, the first pupil whom Mme. Sembrich has trained from the start, and sent, after three years of t, to her début. Miss Millar showed last night that her apprenticeship is by no means over—but she also showed every indication and equipment for an unusually successful singer:—she has a pleasant bearing, is large, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, though not stout, has a clear and soft-toned contralto voice, an eager and alert sense of music and rhythm, and an intelligent feeling for the meaning of a text (if it have one). The first number, a routine operatic aria from the far past of Italy, did not seem to awaken emotion or enthusiasm in her, or in any one else, for that matter. But the three songs that she chose from Strauss's pre-matrimonial collection had a more kindling quality, for they always glow'd with sentiment, if not sentimentality. Such a state of mind was to be expected under the conditions of their conception, and since the young Richard did even banal things well, the lis'eners of last night showed the more common sense in their attitude toward the love songs in question, by excusing and indulging. And the greater was their enjoyment. Miss Millar, at any rate, entered into their spirit of quiet and tender reflection, of gentle and amorous optimism. She sang with subdued fervor, with true accent, and with accurate intonation. But thoughtful songs of this sort have no call for the larger aspect of song—for ringing high notes and large, dramtaic declaration. Miss Millar showed us nothing of this. Whether she was in most need of confidence, to which a large orchestra is not conducive, or whether of further development of latent vocal powers, is hard to say. But she shows a good and thorough foundation, and broadening vistas, ahead.

Chausson's revived symphony has been greeted with delight on every hand. In the first place, it proves its composer to have been no bungler, but a thorough musician and a thorough workman, who not only mastered the ways of counterpoint, orchestration and structure, but utilized them fully and efficiently for his purpose of bringing to full recorded expression his musical thoughts and feelings. Consequently we have a Frenchman of unusually fine and noble character, sensitive to his environment of musical genius. He catches up the fire of his contemporaries, he learns thoroughly the working ways of his art and he expresses his musical moods directly and comprehensibly. And his success in this is largely due to his broad and proportioned view of the whole structure under his making, as well as each of its movements. For his intensity of emotion and variance of mood are consistent and convincing, his climaxes do not spend themselves at the wrong moment, but cumulate, and carry the listener off his feet with their large voiced, melodic intensity. Chausson is not the kind to make bold excursions into the unknown, but he is the kind to make the most of the old, to utilize every opportunity, to keep interest and excitement alive at every phrase, turn, and climax, to make the most of eloquent and interwoven melody, always maintaining the balance between intricacy and poverty. His appeal is direct, but it never cloys. He always does the expected thing, but he always makes the most of it. And through the whole course of the work glows the individuality and personality of its author, with his alternating moods of brightness and sorrow, and his pulsating emotional fervor.

Beethoven's Fugue is a great work, but it was never meant for the resplendent glare of the concert hall, and in the midst of the brilliant array of an orchestral repast, its lofty, segregated and personal message, its thoughtful seriousness, are entirely obliterated. There was a festive spirit in last night's concert. Its more melting moods were nevertheless light ones, which contrasted well with gaiety. In such a spirit, Beethoven's Fugue can never be appreciated.

Liszt's "Mazeppa," on the other hand, made the most satisfactory kind of a close. In its brilliance, its dash, and its galloping rhythms of shrieking flute and blaring trumpet, its resounding and imperious themes for the brass, it is the most vivid, contagious and intoxicating postlude of them all, and Dr. Muck evidently shares this view, for he jealously saves it for the triumphant finishing off of his first and last programmes. And he takes just pride in his orchestra's execution of it, for such a brilliance of brass was never excelled.

From the Boston Post * Nov.12,1916.



group of popular musical folk. From left to right—Reinhold de Warlich, Russian basso cantata singer; Mrs. Fritz Kreisler and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Mr. Kreisler's popularity in Boston is so great that his Symphony Hall recitals are given to crowds that fill both auditorium and stage

From the Monitor Nov.11,1916.

FIRST SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS GIVEN UNDER KARL MUCK

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Karl Muck, Conductor—Fourth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Nov. 10: Brahms, symphony No. 1 in C minor; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Schéhérazade" symphonic suite.

In putting the "Schéhérazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff into performance at the very time when the Diaghileff Russian ballet is visiting Boston and is presenting its pantomimic drama, "Schéhérazade," Dr. Muck has done something more important than break lances with the distinguished Frenchman who directs the music of the dance organization. For the question whether his reading of the piece is better or worse than that of the Diaghileff conductor all depends on what the listener prefers in the way of orchestral style. Those who like to be made keenly aware of the structure of music will say that the Symphony leader's study is the one that better pleases them, while those who like to be kept alert to color will say that the ballet conductor's study better suits them.

The more they discuss the matter, the farther will they be from determining anything. But the fact that they can find cause for debate is evidence that Rimsky-Korsakoff's work lends itself to the methods of any school. For its pages are a glorious exemplification of the art of orchestration; and whether treated in the manner of Berlin or in that of Paris, they remain a model of correct and expressive scoring. The original artist has furnished an almost matchless cartoon, in respect to both charm of subject and symmetry of design. The artificer who weaves a piece of tapestry from it may make his drawing run in sharp outline, or he may let it go dimly defined; but either method, applied consistently, will bring the task to a successful issue.

Whatever the significance of the production of the suite under the unpictorial conditions of the concert hall, at a time when it is being presented on an opera stage, with the spectacular accompaniment of dancing, the conductor's achievement was less remarkable in it than in the other number on his program. Indeed, the Brahms symphony in C minor, which is generally understood to be a severe composition, and in its second movement even ponderous, had great mildness of mood and lightness of action. Instead of standing, as it could well have been expected to do, in unfortunate contrast to "Schéhérazade," because of turgid orchestration and inelastic rhythm, it sounded nearly bright enough to claim consideration as a piece of dance music itself.

The performance of the Brahms work, because of its contained enthusiasm, must have reminded listeners of the conductor's first term with the Boston orchestra. Interpretation, as in those days of his first American acclaim, was all sincerity, yet never the sincerity of harshness. The reading of the first movement was intellectual, even rationalistic and keenly logical, yet without a touch of cynicism. It was a reading that the audience could call its own, instead of one brought to it like something it could take or leave, as it chose. And as for the andante and allegretto, they were in as complete agreement with the daily thinking of the public to which they were addressed, as if they had been composed on the ground. They were passages of Concord philosophy, idealistic, whimsical and bucolic, all at once. The fourth movement was a declaration of pleasure in the sunset that left an adjective or two for use at another time. The scoring of Brahms was allowed to effect its own climax, and because the earlier portions of the work had been kept within reasonable bounds of sonority, the concluding pæan chanted itself majestically through, not one of the orchestral voices lost.

TENOR FOR "FAUST" SYMPHONY

Arthur Hackett, tenor, is on the books of his concert manager, W. R. Macdonald, to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Dec. 22 and 23, singing the solo part in the "Faust" symphony of Liszt.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Nov. 17 and 18. He will present the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, No. 2, in C minor. The other works on the program will be the Sibelius symphony, No. 1, Debussy's prelude, "Afternoon of a Faun," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert in aid of its pension fund, on the afternoon of Sunday, Nov. 19, in Symphony Hall. The program will comprise the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 4 in F minor, the Weber overture to "Oberon," the Delibes "Sylvia" suite, a Johann Strauss waltz and the Nicolai overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."

EVENING POST
New York City

Three Orchestral Concerts

At the matinée performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck opened with the Chausson Symphony in B flat, a work not often heard, in spite of its many beauties. The rest of the programme consisted of Wagner's Faust Overture, Beethoven's fugue for strings, opus 133, in B flat, and Brahms's "Chorale St. Antoine" variations—also in B flat—verily a B flat programme. The playing of the orchestra was on its usual high level, but that did not mitigate the dulness of the long Beethoven fugue; even Homer nods sometimes, and Beethoven, unapproachable as he is in sonata form, had very little to say in the fugue. At least in this one. But it was a virtuoso feat for the strings to play it as they did.

[40]

From the Journal Nov.11,1916.

TWO CLASSIC WORKS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Leads Brilliant Performance at the Friday Matinee.

Fully as brilliant as any of its predecessors, both as regards program and performance, was yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr. Muck and his incomparable orchestra have returned from the first triumphal tour of Southern cities feeling, seemingly, that their efforts have never been more successful or more enthusiastically appreciated.

Brahms' first symphony, which ranks among the finest of modern compositions for orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which dramatically depicts several episodes in "The Thousand and One Nights," comprises this week's program. The symphony is enriched with haunting melodies, and the suite is, in effect, a vivid picture of the palmy days of Bagdad, full of magnificent colorings and of themes that admirably fit the famous narratives.

In both numbers are many solo passages that afford opportunity for the display of the virtuoso qualities for which the Symphony Orchestra has long been celebrated; but yesterday these particular beauties were but part of the magnificent ensemble achieved by Dr. Muck and the whole orchestra. The interpretation in both instances was highly poetical and replete with extraordinary technical skill. All in all, it was a performance in the finest possible orchestral style—a performance that made the two classic compositions seem more beautiful than ever. It will be given again tonight.

The program for next week's concerts is made up of the first Sibelius symphony, the Rachmaninoff piano concerto in C minor, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist.

From the American Nov.12,1916.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, Russian pianist, will be soloist at the fifth Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for Piano in C-Minor.

Dr. Muck has arranged a varied and interesting program. The symphony will be that of Sibelius in E-Minor, No. 1, a work in which Dr. Muck has always shown great interest and with which he seems to be in profound sympathy. This is the first number. Following the Rachmaninoff concerto in the second part will come Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. The length of the program is one hour and fifty-five minutes.

From the Globe Nov.11,1916.

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY SUPERBLY PLAYED

Dr Muck's Reading Is One of Great Nobility

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade Shows Orchestral Euphony

Dr Muck gave Brahms' first symphony with incomparable nobility and breadth of feeling at the concert yesterday afternoon. The structural warp and woof was exposed with a sense of proportion which did not accentuate here to obscure there, which found luminous and symmetrical lines of beauty. Yet the dramatic character of the familiar passages in the first and last movements was emphasized. The mystery in the opening measures of the bodefully insistent tonic organ point in kettledrum, the soaring strings sharply set off by the descending theme in the wood winds, all had a certain epic character which a great symphonic conductor and symphonic orchestra realized.

The second movement again revealed Mr Longy's peerless mastery of tone and beauty of phrase. Mr Sand, employing a tone rather dark to be characteristic of the clarinet, phrased smoothly and with taste. The slow movement denoted a profound, yet intimate, sympathy between conductor and players. The nobility of the composer's thought was recreated with sincerity and majesty. There was an overwhelming show of appreciation by the audience.

The only other music of the program was Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." The suite, based upon the subjects of Sinbad's ship, the Kalendar Prince, the Prince and Princess and the festival at Bagdad, has nothing to do with the program of the harem of Shariar, King of Indes, and its destruction with his faithless favorite. Gorgeously Oriental in color and sense it needs no program to illumine it, nor could the assumption of this or that expression of Oriental life dim the power of its spell.

The performance yesterday again made known the golden euphony of the orchestra. Mr Longy, Mr Maquarre and Mr Sand were not merely virtuosi, but interpreters. For the bassoon, an instrument here of peculiarly significant voice, a tone more flexible and of greater mystery would be preferred. Mr Witek played some passages of Schcherazade's haunting music ably, even with imagination; others with but little sense of its rhythmic elasticity and abandon.

Dr Muck's interpretation as a whole was rather a contemplative, reflective one, as the vision of youth and passion in a land of purple and incense, seen now from the vantage point of cooler and retrospective years. Long symphonic lines were developed with a breadth that at times was a restraint to ardor, that tempered barbaric splendor.

The fifth concerts next week will have the following program: Sebelius' first symphony, Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano (Mr Gabrilowitsch), Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana."

From the Boston Post Nov.11,1916.

SYMPHONY'S VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Its Great Resources Revealed by Dr. Muck

Brahms' 1st Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite after the Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade," made up the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

No more notable revelation of the resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the great talent of its conductor could have been offered; and there could have been no more interesting and impressive illustrations of certain "classic" and "modern" tendencies in music than those driven home by the rugged and mighty symphony of Brahms and the gorgeous orientalism and fairy-tale quality of the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BEAUTY AND VARIETY

His coloring seems matchless for beauty and variety of orchestra tone, but his art is also that of a composer of supreme imagination as well as a magician of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck had never given a better illustration of his versatility than in his admirably finished and inspired production of "Scheherazade." He certainly met the Russian half way—refined him a trifle, perhaps, but lost nothing of essential spirit in so doing.

From the
Transcript
Nov.6,1916.

DR. MUCK IN NEW YORK

The Two Concerts That Brought the Boston Orchestra Back to That City—Unusual Praise for the Conductor and His Forces

IF the reviewers of the newspapers in New York are to be trusted, the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck outdid themselves in their two concerts in that city last week. The first befell on Thursday evening with a programme traversing Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa"; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," and Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel." The second followed on Saturday afternoon with Chausson's symphony, Beethoven's "Grand Fugue" and Wagner's "Faust Overture" for the outstanding pieces. For the earlier concert the review in The Times may speak for all the rest:

At the first of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were the great audience, filling every seat in the house; the cordial and demonstrative greeting for Dr. Muck, the conductor; the delight in the playing of the organization, that have so often before been witnessed at the performances in this city. The orchestra, though it has been completely changed in its personnel since its first years, and has shown many new faces in recent years, remains the same, in its quality and its powers; and it has seldom surpassed its playing last evening in most of the essential matters that make for the highest artistic enjoyment. . . . It was an extraordinarily supple and plastic instrument in the conductor's hands, and its playing was remarkably beautiful in tone, in the proportion and balances of the several instrumental qualities, in finish and lucidity of phrasing, full of subtle and significant nuance.

For the second concert The Sun said of the performance of Chausson's symphony:

It would be difficult to describe without verging on rhapsody such a performance as the symphony received. Dr. Muck proved clearly that he was in full accord with the thought of the composer. He had searched the score thoroughly and followed its exquisitely wrought melos in all its variations and all its polyphonic surroundings. The song of Chausson was sung with an exquisite clarity and balance of utterance and with a genuinely poetic feeling. Rarely has Dr. Muck given an interpretation so rich in communicative sympathy.

And, in turn, The Times:

Dr. Muck entered with obvious enthusiasm and warmth of feeling into the spirit of this work; and the performance was a glowing and profoundly beautiful one. It was particularly beautiful in its reproduction of the orchestral color, in its transparency, its subtle adjustment of the different planes and strata of the color scheme, and the unerring prescience with which the composer's melodic line was followed through it.

REPUBLICAN
ss: Springfield, Mass.
NOV 5 1916

THE "RHENISH" SYMPHONY

Work of Schumann's in Boston Symphony Program To-morrow

The second concert of the Ellis subscription series will be given in the Auditorium to-morrow evening, at 8.15. This will bring to Springfield for the first of its two appearances the Boston Symphony orchestra and with it will come as soloist, Miss Laeta Hartley, a young American pianist. The entire orchestra will come to Springfield on a special train, leaving Boston to-morrow afternoon and returning directly after the concert.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged comprises Schumann's Symphony in E-flat Major No 3 ("Rhenish"), Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 for pianoforte and orchestra in B-flat Minor, and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

This third symphony of Schumann's which is called the "Rhenish," was sketched and orchestrated within five weeks at the end of 1850. It is in five movements, and it gets its name from the fact that Schumann in writing to his publisher, said that he "meant this symphony mirrored here and there something of Rhenish life." The solemn fourth movement was inspired by the recollection of the ceremony at the Cologne cathedral at the instalation of the archbishop of Geissel as cardinal, at which Schumann was present. It was Schumann's intention to portray in the symphony, as a whole, the joyful folk-life along the Rhine. The symphony was the favorite of the composer.

Tschaikowsky's First Concerto in B-flat Minor, which Miss Hartley will play, had its first public performance in old Music hall, Boston, when it was played by the celebrated Hans von Buelow on October 25, 1875. Tschaikowsky wrote it for Rubinstein (Nicholas, not Anton) who absolutely would have nothing to do with it. The final number on the program, Liszt's "Mazeppa" was inspired by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was published in 1829. It was originally a piece for piano which Liszt in 1850 arranged for orchestra and Wiemar. It is the sixth of that series of symphonic poems with which Liszt widened the horizon of orchestral music. The poem is in the true Lisztian manner. It has long melodic and thrilling episodes and is written generally with grandiloquence and pomp.

From the Advertiser
Nov.11,1916.

BRAHMS' "FIRST" STRONGLY READ

MUCK FINDS EMOTION AS WELL AS INTELLECT

Tone Color in "Scheherazade" Induces Radicalism in Interpretation

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Brahms .....First Symphony
Rimski-Korsakoff—"Scheherazade" .....Symphonic Suite

The program was entirely orchestral, without a prima donna to cause a waiting line a quarter of a mile long, without an operatic tenor to excite the matinee girl, without even a pianist to give some modern and diaphanous concerto. But the orchestra was there in all its splendor, and the director was there in the plentitude of his powers. Therefore the reviewer was well content and enjoyed himself.

The program was modern, but of two kinds, the conservative modern and the radical modern. The list looks very small, as printed above, but the concert lasted well toward the two-hour mark, nevertheless, for both works are built on a large scale.

Many concert-goers remember that Dr. Muck achieved his greatest triumph here, some time ago, in the Brahms C-minor symphony. It was almost a discovery, his wonderful reading of this work—the greatest symphony after Beethoven. Yesterday the reading was equally great, but the element of surprise was not here, therefore the excitement was less intense. A greater musical enjoyment can scarcely be imagined than the performance of Brahms' first symphony by our orchestra, led by Dr. Muck. But it is an enjoyment which can appeal only to the initiated ones. Some degree of familiarity with the intricate work must precede the audition. The wonderful finale, for example, which is a summing-up of all the preceding movements, is intellectual music in the highest degree, and the first movement is equally complicated with figure treatment of the most subtle kind.

Dr. Muck's chief revelation here is the addition of a dramatic flavor to the work. He does not present Brahms as a mere "intellectual," but gives emotional power to these movements. Hugo Wolf used to say that the supreme test of a composer was—"Can he exult?"—and found fault with Brahms as being always phlegmatic and cold-blooded. This idea is exploded by the reading of Dr. Muck and Nikisch in this symphony, which formerly was thought pedantic.

There is absolutely nothing new to say of either the reading or the execution. Both were great and both were fully appreciated by the cognoscenti. Even the general public woke up to the fact that something remarkable was happening, and the applause at the end was very spontaneous and long continued.

One may especially mention the excellent horn-playing in the Andante, and the Finale was inspiring from the folk-theme of its beginning, to the lofty chorale of its close.

They have been giving "Scheherazade" (but somewhat changed) two blocks further up the avenue, with considerable success, and now we had it dished up without caper sauce, yet it remained piquant enough. It is not as definite as some modern program music, but it has a true Oriental flavor. First comes a picture of Sindbad, and, without bothering ourselves about a recurring motive which may typify him, every one can respond to the sweeping surges, jolts and shocks which picture the sea. There is more of the ocean in 10 measures of this than in the whole of Debaussy's "La Mer."

In every part of the work there is an amazing glow of tone-color, a veritable Turner painting in tones. The muted effects of the brass, and the bowing against the bridge ("sull Ponticello") of violins and violoncellos, are astonishing even in these modern days of orchestral radicalism.

The delicate Scheherazade figure, frequently recurring, gives a proper coherency and homogeneity to the work, and is a legitimate use of "Leitmotif." It appears generally upon solo violin, and it was very sweetly played by Mr. Witek, who was impeccable even in the constantly high positions and harmonics employed.

The second movement pictured the Calender Prince, but we are left in doubt as to which one is meant. The difficult bassoon passages were excellently played, and we may imagine that these were a portrayal of the young porter. This movement could not have been more highly spiced if it had taken its text from Burton's exciting translation, footnotes and all, and the flute and piccolo players decidedly earned their salaries on this occasion.

We enjoyed the Turkish effects of the third movement, "The Young Prince and the Princess," and wish that Mozart and Beethoven could have studied it. Then surely their "Alla Turca" would have been less "Alla Tedesco."

The last movement, "The Bagdad Festival," was more exciting even than the Brockton Fair, and gave full play to Oriental dance rhythms, and bizarre tone-coloring. All this was read in a manner that made every auditor sit up and take notice. It was thoroughly modern and radical, yet without that crabbed ugliness and headachey complexity which exhausts the auditor in very much twentieth century music.

A wider contrast could scarcely be imagined than the two works given afforded, but, for this occasion, the alliance of Russia and Germany was a decided success, and we may add just an additional word of praise for the sturdy trombone-playing in it.

Although "Scheherazade" is very popular and very easy to comprehend, we imagine that a diet so highly spiced cannot be altogether healthy.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Dr. Muck, the word comes from Boston, when he next invades New York with his band of great renown promises to regale us with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." Where and in what hidden way can the learned doctor have been communing with himself not to know that within the last year those two particular battle horses have been pranced in this town by the Russian ballet to the point of nervous exhaustion? To announce either of them now for a serious orchestral concert is calculated to bring a sickly smile to the dourest visage and send the dismayed subscriber to a ticket agency to dispose in haste of his seat for that superfluous occasion.

It is not that either of the compositions is other than an admirable work; both have long been accepted here as good music. It is not that either was played badly by the Russian ballet orchestra; both, unlike "Till Eulenspiegel," were played excellently by that orchestra. Nor is the fact that "Scheherazade" was shaped by its author to a programme quite different from the programme designed by the ballet-maker of the slightest real importance. Thanks to the God-given flexibility of music, programme or absolute, "Scheherazade" goes perfectly well with either programme. It is merely that "Scheherazade" and "The Afternoon of a Faun" after all the dancing are both dead tired and in need of a rest. And so is our public. Instead of wasting time and effort by including either one of them in a symphony concert for New York, Dr. Muck, or any other conductor, might with profit to all find something to fill the gap from out the mass of beautiful music that is not played. PITTS SANBORN.

From the
Journal
Nov.9,1916.

TO PLAY FAMOUS BRAHMS SYMPHONY

Symphony Orchestra Home Again—Paderewski Recital on Sunday.

There will be no soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The program comprises Brahms' first symphony, in C minor, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant and colorful symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre tonight. It will mark the debut of Susan Millar, mezzo soprano, of whom much is expected. The program comprises the Chausson symphony in B flat, an old Italian air by Rinaldo da Capua; Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for Strings," three songs by Richard Strauss with orchestra and Lizt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

From the
Herald
Nov.13,1916.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist at the fifth Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano in C-minor, which was played here seven years ago by the composer himself. Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting program. The Symphony will be that of Sibelius ni E-minor, No. 1, a work in which he has always shown great interest. Following Rachmaninoff's Concerto in the second part, will come Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. The length of the concerts is 1 hour and 55 minutes.

Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo in Liszt's "Faust" symphony when it is performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concerts, Dec. 22 and 23.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Organized Labor Vs. The Boston Symphony

By EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

IT is said in a recent article in the New York Post that one of the interesting questions likely to come before the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor in Baltimore this week will be a debate as to whether or not the Boston Symphony Orchestra shall be permitted to continue its schedule of concerts in theatres operated by union labor. The possibility of calling a strike of stage hands, electricians and other employés of theatres where the orchestra plays will be discussed, with a view to forcing the most famous musical organization in the world to capitulate to organized labor.

The fact that for 36 years this magnificent body of musicians has been maintained by the single-handed generosity of Major Higginson for the benefit of the American people; that it has accomplished a monumental work for musical culture; that it has advertised our country and Boston throughout the world as the home of the finest orchestra in existence, are matters that will probably not be taken into consideration by the labor leaders, who are attempting to control musical art in this country. They are not interested in the promotion of musical culture. The Boston Symphony has been guilty of the unpardonable crime of not paying dues to the union. It is almost unthinkable, in a country so completely under the domination of organized labor as the United States, that Major Higginson should have had the nerve to wish to manage his own orchestra, in his own way, and without interference of any kind from the labor barons. I understand that Major Higginson even took the position that the conductor of the orchestra was the proper authority to determine the length and number of rehearsals—not the labor officials—and that he refused to accept dictation from them in any matter connected with the orchestra and compelled all his musicians to resign from the American Federation of Musicians. Such audacity is almost incomprehensible in the creed of labor officials, but that the results have amply justified Major Higginson's stand in this matter is proved by the unique position which the Boston Symphony holds in the musical world today.

Not only has its great founder brightened the lives of millions of Americans by bringing to them the gems of musical literature, interpreted by the finest orchestral artists of our day, but he has struck a stanch blow for the preservation of noble art standards from the contamination of trade, which should earn the undying gratitude of this commercialized nation. No other man, in my judgment, has done as much for American musical art as Henry L. Higginson, of Boston.

The question now likely to come before the American people is whether they will permit the small minority represented by the united labor organizations (with some 2,800,000 members), about 2 per cent. of our total population, to dictate the terms on which Major Higginson may be allowed to continue his philanthropy.

Is this a free republic that we are living in, or are we all subject to the imperial majesty of Samuel Gompers, the man who gave an American Congress 48 hours to pass legislation at his bidding?

Wages are not the only requirement of the American workingman, who gets the highest wages now paid anywhere in the world. The workingman is entitled to his share of culture and happiness, and when Mr. Samuel Gompers, through the great organization of which he is president, hampers the work of a national philanthropist in music like Major Higginson, he is standing directly in the path to improved conditions and a happier existence for the American people, of which the working classes constitute a very large proportion.

From the
Transcript
Nov,18,1916.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck's Programme—A Matinee by the Symphony Orchestra for the Pension Fund—A Diversified List of Pianists and Singers in Recitals and Miscellaneous Entertainment—Sousa Anew

A LITTLE symphony from the eighteenth century, an intricate and exacting concerto alike upon orchestra, solo violinist and audience; and a long overlooked and variously pictorial tone-poem, suggested by a familiar play of Schiller fill Dr. Muck's programme for the sixth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. In the concerto, Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra and a virtuoso of distinction in technique and tone, musical design and musical detail, will play the solo part. In order, the three pieces are:

Symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9).....Haydn
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra...
Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"..Smetana

On Sunday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchtstra will be heard in the first of the two annual concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund, out of which the men of the band receive a fixed income after retirement—a long-established and deserving insurance against old age. This time Dr. Muck, following the precedent of last year, and with his forces sure to be on their mettle, has put together a programme of light and favorite pieces, viz.:

Symphony in F minor, No. 4.....Tschaikovski
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon".....Weber
Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Waltz, "Wine, Woman, Song".....Strauss
Overture to the Opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

Thursday evening, Dec. 7, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Schelling for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Symphony Hall, the seventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with Mr. Schelling for the assisting pianist in Liszt's concerto in A major. The other pieces of the programme are Franck's symphony; Borodin's "Sketch from the Asiatic Steppes" and the hackneyed overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe."

Saturday evening, Dec. 9, in Symphony Hall, the seventh of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Schelling assisting and the programme above noted.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 15, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Gerhardt for the assisting singer.

UNION
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, MONDAY.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Springfield tomorrow night at the Auditorium in another of its characteristic concerts is good news to a great many people to whom this form of "massive music" especially appeals. The 36th season of this great organization finds it in personnel and equipment as near perfection as human skill and pains can make it for its peculiar mission of interpreting the world's colossal masterpieces of orchestration—and there is such a wealth of these that it would take decades to hear the best of them. Perhaps no band in the world is better equipped for such music than the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and the splendid Schumann "Rhenish" Symphony which is its chief offering at this concert will undoubtedly be given an ideal performance. The fact that the projectors of the orchestra have listened to the desires of many here who have attended these occasional symphony concerts, and have added a soloist, tends to a more pleasing breadth and variety than has been afforded on previous Springfield visits of the orchestra. Nearly every one of the hundred musicians in the orchestra will be employed in the closing number of Monday night's program, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

As Springfield has now in its Auditorium one of the finest concert halls in the country, it is to be hoped and expected that Boston's great orchestra will become an annual visitor here and give at least in the future two concerts each season as it is giving this year for the first time in several seasons. The orchestra today, as it has been practically since its organization, is supreme among all organizations of its kind, not merely in America but in the world. Always a great orchestra it has gained enormously in the last four years under the skilled direction of Dr. Karl Muck, who seems to be, in the full sense of the word, a genius. The orchestra comes to Springfield directly on its return from a first Southern trip where it has been giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Everywhere its audiences tested the capacity of the concert halls where the performances were given and it has come to pass that very few music lovers in the country are able to listen to its playing unless they are regular subscribers.

Miss Laeta Hartley, the soloist of the evening, will be a newcomer in this city. She is a young American pianist who has reached the front rank of her profession. The greater part of her studying was in America. She has already appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist several times last season and the season before and was especially engaged for this concert.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is most attractive and the three pieces on it are each of them a masterpiece of its kind. The Schumann Symphony will be followed by Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in B-flat Minor and the final number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

From the
Boston Post
Nov. 18, 1916.

A SPLENDID SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Masterpieces Heard, Gabrilowitsch Is The Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

When a concert programme—even the programme of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—contains two masterpieces, three of works of genius and a fourth composition of value by a composer who is a past master of his art, it is worth listening to. This was the case yesterday afternoon when Dr. Muck, arranging one of the most interesting programmes of the season, conducted performances of Sibelius first symphony, Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, Debussy's "L'Apres midi d'un Faune" and Chabrier's "Espana." Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a wonderful performance of the concerto.

TWO MASTERPIECES

The two masterpieces on this programme were those of Debussy and Chabrier, each perfect in its kind, and the first of the two perhaps the most original piece of music which has appeared since the Tristan of Richard Wagner—if we accept, possibly, other orchestral pieces of Debussy at his greatest, such as the Nocturnes, or possibly, "La Mer."

Dr. Muck shows thoroughly and enthusiastically he comprehended the composer. The music thrilled the audience as it has thrilled it repeatedly in the past—music which needs no programme or explanation or analysis to make itself felt and understood by everyone.

Then there was Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance of the Rachmaninoff concerto. It was Mr. Gabrilowitsch, more than the admirably written music of Rachmaninoff, who held the tense interest of the audience from the first note to the last. His tone was never more sonorous and many-colored. He had never done a better service to a composer, or collaborated with higher intelligence and greater self-abnegation with the orchestra. It was a pleasure indeed to note the recognition of the great art of this pianist. He has come into his own as a true artist should, with all modesty and as the result of the utmost patience and devotion to a high purpose.

Fromthe
Journal
Nov.18.1916.

MODERN WORKS PERFORMED BY THE SYMPHONY

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Rachmaninoff Concerto in Brilliant Style.

This week the performance rather outshines the program at the Symphony concert. Yesterday the playing of the orchestra and of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, was artistic, eloquent, full of color, gracing the works chosen for performance and so crowning the efforts of the composers themselves.

For this week there is no great classic selection, the program being made up of the first Sibelius symphony, a work laden with Finnish gloom and rude Russian-like tunes; Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, a composition replete with technical brilliancy; Debussy's still strange yet fascinating music prompted by Mallarme's equally strange and cryptic verses, "The Faun's Afternoon"; and Chabrier's picturesque "Espana" rhapsody, a souvenir of the composer's trip through Spain in search of dance music.

The rhapsody is always delightful, Dr. Muck is never happier than when he conducts such effervescent music. In this instance, the best music was reserved for the last.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch and the orchestra were heartily applauded for their performance. The same program will be given tonight.

Next week Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He has chosen the Brahms concerto in D major. The orchestral numbers will be the Haydn symphony in C minor and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," which has not been [illegible] since 1899.

From the Advertiser
Nov.18.1916.

MODERN PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

GABRILOWITCH IS TRIUMPHANT AT PIANO

Sibelius' First Symphony Splendidly Read and Brilliantly Performed

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Sibelius—First Symphony.
Rachmaninoff—Piano Concerto. No. 2. C minor. Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitch.
Debussy—"Afternoon of a Faun."
Chabrier—Spanish Rhapsody.

It will be seen that the program swept from Finland to Spain and was distinctly modern in its tendencies. We have had the first symphony of Sibelius four times in recent years, but it is a far more comfortable work than the composer's fourth one, which we have had only twice. Yet it might have been more educational to have had the fourth again, for it exhibits Sibelius struggling with the most modern form of expression, and we cannot get rid of the idea that the work has something important to say, something that cannot be understood at a single or even a double hearing.

The first symphony is plain sailing. Perhaps some may take exception to the word "comfortable" being applied to so melancholy a work, but the Norsemen, in music, enjoy their gloom, and generally make it a strong feature of their large works; therefore, why should not the auditor enjoy it with them? Muted horns, sudden crashes, sharp contrasts, seemed to indicate that something was rotten in a State further north than Denmark in the first Allegro, but it was all very enthralling from the opening clarinette solo (excellently played) to the sudden pizzicati at the end of the movement. There was good and logical development of figures right along, but this did not prevent Sibelius from giving planty of dramatic power.

The Andante indulged in a rather too lengthy sorrow, and, in spite of some canonic work on the woodwind, it was not as skilfully wrought as the opening Allegro. Sibelius' chief device in this seemed to be sequences, mingled with tears. There was nothing here so powerful as the masculine chief theme of the first movement. But the Scherzo made full amends, for here there was all the heartiness of the folk-dances of the north. Even the kettle-drum joined in the festivities with such important ryhthmic effect that it often became almost an "obligato." We like this movement best of all the four. The finale was splendidly read by Dr. Muck, and brilliantly performed by the orchestra. Many reminiscences from preceding movements appeared and were very clearly defined. Even the bass drum now joined in the strong pulsations of rhythm, an orgie of frenzied power took place, fierce rushes that might have pictured the furies, or Greek Eumenides, were in this movement, which was given with phenomenal abandon, until it unexpectedly came to a final pianissimo pizzicato end. Only our orchestra and our conductor could give such a work in such a manner. It was fully appreciated by the audience and the orchestra was forced to rise in response to continued applause.

After a walk in the corridor the audience were given more northern music, but of a far less brooding character than the symphony. Rachmaninoff played this concerto himself, in Boston, on its first presentation here, seven years ago, but he made no greater triumph with it than Gabrilowitch won yesterday afternoon. It is a well-constructed work with impressive power even from the introduction, the theme of which is well developed later on. There was effective contrast between the powerful chief theme, on the orchestra, and the gentle subordinate theme, given chiefly by the piano, and the working-up of these and of new subject matter was finely carried out. By the end of the first movement it was evident that both the composition and the pianist had won the audience.

The Adagio is melodic enough to be a good lesson to modern composers, its Coda being especially beautiful, and the transference of the chief theme from piano to orchestra, each embroidering it in turn, was given with excellent ensemble, but it is somewhat too long, a frequent fault with Rochmaninoff when he indulges in sentiment.

The Finale gave the finest opportunities to the soloist, and Mr. Gabrilowitch took full advantage of these. Chief theme and subordinate both are chiefly in the piano part, and the second is grandly worked-up afterwards. There was some fine arpeggio playing here and the fugal work of piano and orchestra, in treating the chief theme in the development, must not be ignored. But the best treatment is accorded to the subordinate theme in this movement, and the cadenza work made the concerto [illegible] [illegible]abrilowitch was re-[illegible]or, and his artistic work deserved it, but in chronicling these laurels let us not forget the excellent ensemble of the orchestra, nor the fact that here is a concerto made in good form, using melodic as well as contrapuntal effects, and a model to those wild radicals who believe that if they are to express any emotion in music they must begin by smashing musical form. The pianist, however, carried out the composer's thoughts in a manner that was memorable and wonderful.

Debussy's faunal afternoon was but vague after these two modern bits of symmetrical and melodic composition. We wonder whether Dr. Muck slily intended the auditor to draw the contrast. Nevertheless the delicacy of the orchestration, the pastoral touches, the meditative moods, were eloquently read by Dr. Muck, and they are undoubtedly poetic. Only one recognized that it is a rather circumscribed school which might easily cloy. That it is (or was) a discovery, a new musical flavor, must be readily conceded, and it is probably the best of Debussy's orchestral compositions.

Again, in Chabrier's "Espana," the orchestra made a triumph. This work is so temperamental that it treats the orchestra as if it were a gigantic solo instrument. It has all the freedom and fantasy that might be expected from a single romantic guitarist on a wild night in seville. With his two harps and his pizzicato strings Chabrier manages to catch the full spirit and tone-color of Jota and Fandango. We must praise the difficult work of the bassoons, as well as the striking touches that were given by trombones and bas stuba. It was a feast of syncopations almost throughout.

Thus ended a concert in which the best of the modern schools were united, a concert that proved that symmetry and musical beauty are not dead even in the 20th century.

From the
Herald
Nov.18,1916.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FIFTH CONCERT

Impressive Interpretation of Sibelius Work Is Given—Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune," Chabrier's "Espane" and Rachmaninoff Work Complete Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony, No. 1; Rachmaninoff, piano concerto, No. 2; Debussy, L'Apres-midi d'un Faune; Chabrier, Espana.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave an impressive interpretation of the symphony. The music itself is for the most part profoundly, hopelessly melancholy. There are pages that are gloomy in a defiant manner, as though the composer shouted in the luxury of woe. The first movement is the strongest. There is something savagely elemental about it. The workmanship suggests a well-trained musician who disdaining the smug, conventional thoughts and expression of his colleagues turns towards the conservatory and the professors and exclaims with Whitman:

The spotted hawk swoops by and accuses me—he complains of my gab and my loitering.
I too am not a bit tamed—I too am untranslatable;
I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world.

Some have found that this symphony is the full, wild, tempestuous expression of Finland; that the music is topographical and ethnological; or that it is the voice of an injured and sullenly rebellious people. Yet travelers tell us that Finland is not merely a country of dreary moors and murky skies; that the Finn is not by birth or circumstance necessarily a Dismal Jemmy; that there is good humor, mirth, crushing of cups even in Finland. Surely the Finn that is seen in this country is a cheerful body.

We prefer to think that the symphony is the expression of the individual Sibelius's moods at the time he composed it; that he wrote without thought of geography, social and economic conditions, or Rusia. The first movement might stand by itself, as an overture, fiery, passionate, tragic in its sadness. There can be no question of the composer's earnestness and sincerity. Thus he felt, thus he wrote. But in the movements that follow there should be some relief. A fit of musical depression that lasts over half an hour leads the hearer, although he may admire the pessimistic eloquence that is at times Tschaikowskian, to call out: "Cheer up, old top. All is not yet lost."

Dr. Muck has a happy faculty for choosing the one suitable, inevitable tempo. We have known no conductor who has equalled him in this respect. It was therefore the more surprising to find him taking the tempo of [illegible] Prelude at so slow a pace that the beautiful music suffered thereby. The exquisite fancy of the composer was weighted down with leaden wings. It is a curious fact that Mr. Weingartner, when he conducted this Prelude at a concert in the Boston Opera House, erred in like manner. It was, however, a pleasure to hear the music without the sight of nymphs, a miming Faun, and the presence of a board of censorship, adamant in the matter of bare feet and legs, as young Mr. Smallweed was adamant in the matter of gravy.

There has been much talk about the death of Bizet as an irreparable loss to French music. It is true that "L'Arlesienne" and "Carmen," in spite of sneering M. Marnold and M. Gauthier-Villars gave more than promise of brilliant works to come; but the premature death of Chabrier, from whom so many of the younger school have learned, from whom so many have stolen, was perhaps a still greater loss. Chabrier was no longer a young man when he lost his mind, but the opera that he left unfinished shows what was in store for the world. We have heard "Espana" conducted by Dr. Muck with a finer touch, with a greater delicacy in brilliance and at the same time in a more reckless spirit.

Any pianist that chooses Rachmaninoff's second concerto possesses the virtue of self-abnegation. It is not necessary for Mr. Gabrilowitsch to be anxious about popular appreciation of virtuoso qualities. His many admirable qualities are known to all. The piano in this concerto is seldom dominating; it is for the most part one of the instruments in the orchestra. Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York and Brooklyn eight years ago. We heard it first in Boston when the composer played the piano part seven years ago next month. The concerto is an interesting composition, technically and aesthetically, and the interest is maintained without any direct and obvious appeal to the great public. There is a sturdiness and an independence shown that would alone win respect, even if the themes and the development did not please the ear. And in this concerto there is not the verboseness that partially destroys the effect of Rachmaninoff's symphony and "The Island of the Dead." The first movement is effectively concise. Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave an excellent performance of the piano part whether the music called upon him to be individually robust, poetic or gracefully and ably aiding the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Haydn, Symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9); Brahms, Concerto for the violin (Mr. Witek, violinist); Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

From the
Globe
Nov.18,1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Gabrilowitsch Brilliant in Rachmaninoff Concerto

Dr Muck Conducts Music by French, Russian and Finnish Composers

Dr Muck's program yesterday afternoon represented a Finn, a Russian and two Frenchmen—the first symphony of Sibelius, Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Espana" rhapsody of "Chabrier." The orchestra was a gorgeous instrument of virtuosity and many colors. Dr Muck conducted with an enveloping ardor, to which his men responded in unusual spirit, and showed his perception and versatility in varying styles.

Mr Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, played the concerto with the fervor of devotion, with superb insight, with a poetic appreciation for the introspective vein of the slow movement, mystic, restrained in passion to some even religious, according to the mind and mood of the hearer, and with equal understanding for the barbaric, yet superficial pomp of the final movement. Extréme breadth of treatment and the repose of depth and sincerity of feeling were followed here by the brilliance of the virtuoso and Mr Gabrilowitsch was equal to both. A colorist, a weaver of melody of lyric illusion, a master of rhythm and its magical powers, Mr Gabrilowitsch makes of the piano an eloquent means of interpretation. The cumulative effect he obtained from the opening measures is not easily to be forgotten. He was recalled five times.

To Dr Muck and his inspired control of the orchestra, the soloist owed much. Surpassing in beauty and praise was the ardent spirit, the flaming intensity of feeling in the reading and delivery of this work, not at all times inherently great, but in the first two movements, often deeply emotional, touching moments of beautiful sentiment and nobility of expression. The dramatic climaxes were of fire, and the long breathed phrases of melody nobly sustained.

The first symphony of Sibelius, a stern work uncompromising with any sheer or sensuous beauty, is one to admire more at each hearing. There is the rugged, majestic strength, the pungent flavor of the soil as in the clumsily roistering scherzo, the cragged peaks of conflict, the elegaic lament, the subcurrent of epic feeling which can be granitic but never commonplace. Dr Muck's performance was impassioned, supremely eloquent.

The orchestral coloring in "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the unbroken, shimmering web of legato which Dr Muck obtained were in the last degree sensuously expressive. The broad tempo furthered this langorousness, although it obscured the lightness which obtains in this score. In "Espana" Dr Muck emphasized the brusque folk character of the dances and their music.

Next week the program will be: Haydn, Symphony in C Minor, Brahms, concerto for violin, Mr Witek, soloist; Smetana, symphonic poem; "Wallenstein's Camp."

[42]

From the Post
Nov. 19, 1916.

MAJOR H. L. HIGGINSON CELEBRATES

Observes 82d Birthday Greeting Well Wishers

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON,
Venerable Boston banker who observed his 82d birthday yesterday.

Major Henry L. Higginson, head of the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., was 82 years old yesterday. Enjoying splendid health the venerable banker was in good spirits.

He passed the entire day at home, greeting callers in the forenoon, writing replies to birthday greetings and acknowledgments of numerous birthday gifts.

RECEIVES CALLERS

The afternoon was largely taken up with receiving more callers, watching a part of the military parade from his windows, and taking an afternoon nap, which he says is a mighty good thing to keep a man in trim. In the evening he had dinner with members of his family and a number of intimate friends. He retired early.

Neither his age nor even his birthday kept him at home all day. He simply followed his usual custom of taking Saturday off, because it is a short business day.

Major Higginson decried the lack of experts in the business and political affairs of the United States. "If there were just one thing I could tell the boys of this country," he said, "it would be to tell them to be experts in whatever they set out to do.

"This country sorely needs experts. We have an overabundance of men who are ordinary pluggers, men who are willing to work hard at anything they do, but they are not experts. A willingness to plug is a big asset, but knowing the business from the bottom to the top, theoretically and practically, is what is needed most. There's a scarcity of experts, and a great opportunity for the boy who wants to be of the greatest service.

"I am a working man. I like work, and I hope to work until the last. Work is the real thing that keeps people young, but I think a man should also do some good in the world and be of some service to others."

The major said that he was impressed with what he saw of the military parade. "I saw the Eighth go by. A fine regiment, fine men; they looked fine and had a great stride. They'd make fine soldiers in a case of necessity. We could make good soldiers of all our boys, too."

From the Sunday Post
Nov.19,1916.

LONGY CONCERTS

Georges Longy and Miss Renee Longy announce "special concerts" to be given on the evenings of Feb. 7 and March 21 in Jordan Hall. The first will be devoted entirely to the works of Jean Hure, a French composer, whose compositions are little known in this country; the second to works of Charles Martin Loeffler. The soloists engaged are Mme. Povla Frisch and Mrs. Laura Littlefield. Mr. Longy will also have the assistance of the American String Quartet, players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and others. The accompanists will be Mrs. Dudley Fitts and Mr. Jean Verd. New songs by Mr. Loeffler will be introduced. Mme. Frisch will sing the solo part in his "L'Archet," a work for soprano, female chorus, piano and viola d'amour.

From the American
Nov.19,1916.

MAJ. HIGGINSON AT 82 YEARS YOUNG IN HEART

Boston's Famous Banker on Birthday Delivers Little Lecture to Other "Boys."

Major Henry L. Higginson, Boston banker of international repute, was eighty-two years old yesterday—but he didn't feel it. He has yet to realize King David's eighty-year limit.

From his long experience of life Major Higginson framed a vigorous call for the growing boy to stop swelling. He asked:

"What does the growing boy do today, what specialty does he aim himself at? He doesn't do anything—but swell."

Lack of experts, the banker declared, is the tronble with this country. Expanding along this line he went on:

"America manufactures goods, but not better than any other country does. What are we? Nothing but a nation lacking experts.

"We haven't much of an army. We haven't anything of a navy. There are no experts in government steering. I voted for Mr. Wilson the first time—but not the last.

HARMFUL LACK OF EXPERTS.

"I have devoted myself a good deal to banking, yet I don't consider myself an expert. That's my mistake.

"What are railroads coming to? I can't conscientiously advise anyone to buy railroad stocks for an investment. If they care to gamble, that is another thing.

"The banks shoud refuse to take bonds when the interest on them is not paid. I am not sure they have a legal right to do so. But what are you going to do when they bring up their unreasonable eight-hour law? It follows, naturally, that, when railroad wages and output are constantly on the increase and their revenue is not, something is going to smash.

"I am a working man. Have been one all my life. I understand the difficulties and danger and consequences of overwork as well as any man living. But, when I start on a piece of work, I stay with it until it is finished. You can't limit the hours of work. Suppose you tried to appiy that principle to doctors handling a critical case? Every job must be finished. The farmers are our largest and best class. Where would we come out on the food question if they ever stopped about the eight-hour law?

WORK, HOURS AND WAGE.

"Let the railroad employes have $25 a day if they must have it. The people will pay for it. They always do. I have all respect for labor unions and their necessity, but I don't intend to have any man saying to me: 'You shall work just so many hours and there you shall stop.' No, what we need is experts behind the direction of such moves as the eight-hour law."

Since the Major is over eighty, he was reminded of what David the Psalmsaid and of the recent comment Chauncey M. Depew made on the same. The Psalmist said:

> Though men be so strong that they come to four score years, yet then is their strength but labor and sorrow so soon passeth it away and we are gone.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the audience celebrated Major Higginson's birthday last night at the concert in Symphony Hall. In his honor the overture to "The Magic Flute" was interpolated in the program immediately after intermission. The great audience applauded enthusiastically and arose. Major Higginson bowed in acknowledgement, but did not speak.

From the
Herald
Nov.19.1916.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PAYS TRIBUTE TO FOUNDER

Great Audience Applauds Selection Played in Honor of Maj. Higginson's Birthday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the audience celebrated last night at the concert in Symphony Hall the 83d birthday of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson. In his honor the overture to "The Magic Flute" was interpolated in the program immediately after the intermission. The great audience applauded enthusiastically and rose. Maj. Higginson bowed in acknowledgement, but did not speak. The superb orchestra that he founded and maintains spoke eloquently for him.

From the American
Nov.1916

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON, famous Boston banker, who delivered a little sermon to other "Boys" on his 82nd birthday.

From the
Transcript
Nov.18,1916.

NEWS OF MUSIC

LIGHT PIECES, DR. MUCK AND THE PENSION FUND

A Renewal Next Sunday of Last Year's Experiment—Mme. Wirthlin and Miss Russell for New Singers—The Good Fortunes of a Bostonian Quartet in New York—Concerts in Prospect

TWICE a season there must be a concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra and twice a year Dr. Muck must put together a programme for it that shall interest a miscellaneous public, that shall accord with the standards of the conductor and the band and that shall not be a counterpart of the austerer lists that he makes ready for the twenty-four Fridays and Saturdays of the regular series. With him as with his predecessors, the usual recourse has been the music of Wagner—fragments of the operas or else an assemblage of the overtures and the preludes to them. Always seemingly a sufficient public stood ready to hear them and doubtless would have been as expectant this autumn; since, paradox as it seems of a city that professes to be a capital of music, Wagner comes relatively seldom to our ears.

For the impending concert of next Sunday afternoon, the conductor has preferred another way. Last winter, for the Pension Fund, Symphony Hall was filled by an audience that for the first time heard Dr. Muck and the orchestra in such light music as a waltz by Strauss and a suite from a ballet of Lalo, with a symphony of Tschaikovski for beginning and a "favorite overture" here and there on the programme. The experiment pleased the public and pleased the men, who justly regard a concert which is to swell their income in retirement and old age, as an affair of their own. Accordingly the venture is to be renewed next Sunday when the waltz is Strauss's "Wine, Woman and Song"; the ballet Delibes's pretty and piquant "Sylvia"; the 'favorite overtures" Weber's to "Oberon" and Nicolai's to "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" and the symphony the fourth of Tschaikovski with the scherzo of the plucked strings. There is a considerable public that professes interest in the Symphony Orchestra, if it would only play "light music." Here now is the opportunity of that public to translate words into deeds—at the box-office window—and listen to conductor and orchestra in the music it desires. An equal opportunity, not less pleasurable, awaits those who count the orchestra one of the institutions of Boston with which they should now and then acquaint themselves. As for the subscribers to the regular concerts, it has not been their way to forget that the two matinées for the Pension Fund are their two occasions to prove by their works the regard for all and sundry on the stage of Symphony Hall that they speak week by week in their applause. As Rev. Dr. Sunday might say, Second Corinthians viii., 7:

From the
Herald
Nov.19,1916.

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald, conductor, will visit Boston in January. The first visit to this city will be on the evening of Jan. 11, at Symphony Hall. Prominent on the program stands "The Sinfonia Domestica," by Strauss.

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
NOV 7 19

LOCAL INTERESTS

A SCHUMANN SYMPHONY

BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

DR MUCK'S SENSE OF CLIMAX

Pleasant Concert in Auditorium, With Laeta Hartley as Soloist

Schumann's symphonies are sometimes regarded as caviar to the general, so that there is the more reason for pleasure at the warm reception of one of them last evening. The occasion was a superb performance by the Boston symphony orchestra at the first of two concerts by this orchestra included in the Ellis course, and the symphony in question was Schumann's third, the "Rhenish," in E flat. This was, so far as available records show, the first production here. Such neglect may appear incredible, yet performances of Schumann, as of Brahms, go by favor rather than by popular demand. The public knows the Brahms symphony in D major, and likes it, perhaps it would like some of the others if it knew them as well.

There could be no doubt as to the liking last evening for what was to many of its hearers a new symphony; it was relished from beginning to end, and it gave a happy opening to the program. Yet, it would probably be a mistake to regard the impression made as very deep or very enduring; Schumann's music needs more than most the aid of intimate acquaintance—not indeed to give pleasure, but to make the memory of that pleasure vivid and lasting. His metal is precious, but it is very soft and a little dull of color—fine gold, let us say, mixed if that is not contrary to chemical science with very soft lead. In the first impression such music often charms while leaving behind but the vaguest of memories. Let it then be set down as something to "carry away" that on the night before the great election Dr Muck did delight a large audience with this gentle and smooth-spoken music. When its turn comes again let it be looked on as an attractive and not merely a neutral item in the announced program.

One cause of this vagueness and impermanance of the impression left (which has little or nothing to do with the lasting worth of the music) is the relative dulness of Schumann's instrumentation. It has neither the solid clearness of the classical school, using instruments in the simplest groupings, nor the piquant brilliance of the combinations which the moderns since Berlioz have developed to such amazing perfection. Nor does he gain by the great enlargement of the modern concert orchestra which is indispensable for the full effect aimed at by a thorough-going modern by Liszt; on the contrary one felt frequently last evening that only the consummate perfection of the Boston players and of Dr Muck's conducting kept the great mass of strings from being a detriment. But whereas Mme Schumann, when she first heard this work at Duesseldorf in 1851, thought part of it "unclear," she could hardly have had that impression last evening. But the conductor then was Schumann himself, which hardly gave a fair test.

What Dr Muck most brought out last evening was the freshness and geniality of the work, which flows with a smooth spontaneity none too common in Schumann's music, and perhaps only attained when a lucky flood of inspiration lifted him, as in the E flat major quintet above the vexing shoals of his moody genius. It may not be extravagant to suppose that in this the Rhine may have had its part as in the shaping of Jean Christophe's career. It is by no means picture music, and indeed a smooth musical flow is not among the characteristics of labored realism. But for a fitful tone poet like Robert Schumann to have had his mind recurring, during the month that this symphony was in the making, must have been both a stimulus and a guide. Not many of his larger works are so sure and so direct. This is not a great symphony, and was obviously not composed for one. Only in the noble fourth movement, where a vivid recollection of pontifical rites at Cologne led him near to the sublime, does Schumann depart from the happy modesty of theme and treatment. When theme and treatment so perfectly fit, we need not trouble about greatness; it is much to have such genial charm as Dr Muck last evening made apparent to all. It was ideal conducting and led the way to that powerful climax, in sonority or in emotional tension, which is one of his most striking traits as conductor and program-maker. The audience after this serene loveliness, was to have its full share of thrills before the evening was done.

From the
Herald
Nov.20,1916.

CONCERT IN AID OF PENSIONS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Dr. Muck Brings Out Beauties of Tschailkowsky in Popular Concert — Music Depicted Man's Weakness and Utter Impotence Against a Relentless Fate.

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY AT NEXT SUNDAY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in aid of the pension fund. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, in F minor, opp. 36; Weber, overture to the opera "Oberon"; Delibes, Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia"; Strauss, waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"; Nicolai, overture to the opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

The program was of a popular nature and a large audience readily responded in aid of so fine a cause.

Tschaikowsky, himself, related the program of the Symphony in a letter to his friend Mme. von Meck to whom the work was dedicated. It was inspired by thoughts of faith and death. Its theme is universal and it appeals to any mortal perplexed with the mystery of life. The music depicts man's weakness, his utter impotence against relentless fate. He may hope for consolation in memories, in incidents that flit through his disordered mind, but in vain. Happiness may only be found in observing and sharing the happiness of others until death brings relief.

The orchestra was as a commanding and entrancing virtuoso. In the symphony there were many instances of admirable solo work and superb ensemble. The capricious scherzo was given with extraordinary brilliance and variety of nuances. In other pieces there was sonority and surpassing skill.

Dr. Much, whose art as an interpreter is akin to genius, gave an admirable reading of the symphony and conducted the dance music on the program with the quiet authority, the magnetic force, for which he is justly admired. Under his direction the well-known waltz was effectively recreated with irresistible abandon and effective observance of its subtleties of rhythm.

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. Kreisler will play an interesting program assisted by Carl Friedberg, pianist.

From the Record
Nov.20,1916.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the finest band of its kind in this country—have good reason to feel hurt at the showing made by Boston for their Boston Fund benefit yesterday. Sunday after Sunday the great hall is packed to suffocation when Alma Gluck, Paderewski, Sembrich, McCormack or Kreisler appears. Yesterday when the orchestra, "Boston's pride and joy," played for a fund which will help the members in their old age there were many, many vacant seats on the floor. The rows of standees, a feature of other Sunday concerts, were absent. Are there not enough persons in Boston to fill one hall to capacity on Sunday for an orchestral concert? Are idols of the public the only magnets for Sunday afternoon? Do Boston music lovers feel they owe nothing to the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Let Boston turn out in throngs for the next concert.

Dr. Muck's program was so very light—after the Tschaikowsky symphony—that it probably did not appeal to many who would have attended had there been a concert of heavier music. Yet Dr. Muck undoubtedly arranged his program hoping that it would appeal to many who are not regular attendants. Hearing the orchestra playing the "Wine, Woman and Song" waltz under Dr. Muck was certainly a novelty—the sort that either pleased greatly or not at all.

From the
Herald
Nov.26,1916.

NO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

There will be no Symphony concerts in Boston this week, as the orchestra is making its second southern trip, giving the usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn the soloist will be Miss Susan Millar, the young mezzo-soprano. There will be no soloist in New York.

From the
Globe
Nov.20,1916.

PENSION CONCERT

Plan of Popular Program Again Followed

Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony and Strauss Waltz Included

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the Symphony Orchestra pension fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, op 36; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Delibes, suite from the ballet "Sylvia"; Johann Strauss, waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"; Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Tschaikowsky apparently composed his fourth symphony of "Fate" during a time when he was more free from the spell of melancholy, which so largely influenced his life, and consequently manifested itself in the majority of his works. Here we find less of the lachrymose tendencies which caused the Russian master's fifth and sixth symphonies to have their being.

Nor is one cast into the slough of despond by an expression of poignant grief as displayed in the last-named works, whose underlying current of tragedy causes them to stand unparalleled in symphonic literature.

On the other hand, the F minor symphony shows Tschaikowsky in his happiest mood, but it is an individualistic happiness, which finds its most congenial means of display in the outlet of its exuberance by means of employing the jubilation of the fortissimo. Characteristic, too, is the scherzo, in which the strings play pizzicato throughout.

Dr Muck read the work in magnificent fashion, the scherzo in particular being set forth in a style which had not only the superior virtuosity of its delivery to commend it, but which was a masterpiece in matters of dynamic contrast and rhythmic elasticity. At the conclusion of the symphony the players shared with the conductor the well-earned tribute of the enthusiastic audience.

From the
Boston Post
Nov.19,1916.

PENSION FUND

Tomorrow afternoon brings the first of the two concerts given annually in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra. Following the success of the concert a year ago, Dr. Muck has arranged a program consisting of truly popular music. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony is the most Russian of the six that he wrote, and with many the favorite of them all. The second half of the program promises much that is enjoyable. It opens with the "Oberon" overture, which will be followed by the suite taken from the music of Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," Prelude and Les Chasseresses, Intermezzo et Valse lente, Pizzicati, and the Cortege de Bacchus.

The next number will be Johann Strauss's waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," and the final number will be Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The concert will begin at 3:30.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, will make his annual appearance as soloist at the sixth pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon, Nov. 24, and Saturday evening, Nov. 25. He will play Brahms's Concerto. The Symphony will be Haydn's in C minor, No. 9, in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition. It has not been heard at the concerts for 13 years. It will be followed by Brahms's Concerto. The final number will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp." This will come as a novelty, for it has not been played here in Boston since 1897 under Mr. Paur.

From the Traveler
Nov.25,1916.

ANTON WITEK SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert provided one of those programs where the symphony selected was not the feature number. The symphony in this instance was Haydn's in C minor, small and pretty, but scarcely impressive, even though Dr. Muck and his ployers made all possible of it. Mr. Warnke played the solo for 'cello beautifully.

The big number of the concert was the Brahms concerto, with Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist. It was superbly played by both soloist and orchestra, new beauties croping out throughout its playing. Mr. Witek's beautiful tone, exceptional artistry and the ease with which he overcame technical difficulties aroused such enthusiasm that at the close of each movement the soloist was compelled to bow his acknowledgments time and time again. A goodly portion of the applause following the playing of the adagio could well have been intended for Mr. Longy's beautiful oboe playing.

Smetana, ever interesting, affords ample opportunity in his "Wallenstein" symphony poem for the listener to guess at just what the composer had in mind. It starts in as though "Bedlam had been let loose." Then follows the calm of night which soon gives way to another torrent.

From the Transcript Nov.13,1916,

POSSIBLY Chabrier's rhapsody, "España"—recurring tour de force at the Symphony Concerts for conductor, orchestra and audience—is becoming a little hackneyed. Once more yesterday afternoon it was the final item in a programme no longer or more exacting than usual. Yet the orchestra played it carelessly with slips in entrances—a rare fault among such usually exact virtuosi; the conductor was painstaking but not ardent—a still rarer disposition in Dr. Muck; while the audience took piece and performance as a pleasant matter of course, whereas it used to smite its hands together in applause for both. These agreeing signs indicate a single conclusion: all concerned in the Symphony Concerts have had enough for the present of "España; Rhapsody for Orchestra on Original Spanish Airs," by Alexis Emmanuel Chabrier, and a decent repose for several seasons on a shelf in the library is necessary to freshen it and them. (It once rested there for a full decade.) Of late, too, it has steadily tended to be a commonplace of concerts. The Pops have taken it into their repertory; the makers of music upon two pianos count it indispensable to their programmes; bands of brass have been known to play it.

Brilliant piece though "España" is in hot flow of invention, rhythmic energy and pungency, glow of color and bits of modulation, it suffers in repetition from this seeming virtue of saliency. Nobody who has heard the music forgets it; whenever it appears on a programme the anticipated effect, within such variations as those of yesterday, is fulfilled; nowadays to most ears there is no mystery, no strangeness, no newness in it. The glow remains the glow; the impulsion, the impulsion. The outcome was bound to be stale reaction to it alike on the platform and on the floor of Symphony Hall. Moreover, to forego "España" for a while need not imply the foregoing of the blazing Chabrier. Mottl scored richly for orchestra his piano pie e, the Bourrée Fantasque, and it has been once played, long ago, at the Symphony Concerts. The Polonaise from his opéra-comique, "Le Roi malgré Lui" likewise once played here in Mr. Goodrich's concerts, strikes in its kind hardly less rhythmic, harmonic and instrumental fire than "España" itself.

Similarly does not Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," though it escapes the obviousness and sameness that beset "España," recur quite as often as need be at the Symphony Concerts? Last week at a performance of the Russian Ballet one of Mr. Monteux's orchestral intermezzi was the first of Debussy's early Nocturnes, the piece named "Clouds." How new, strange, fanciful and fitful it sounded because it has gone so long unheard in Symphony Hall! Yet it has that freshness of invention and method, that instant beauty upon ear and imagination that not a little of Debussy's later music lacks. Of those pieces "Rondes de Printemps" would bear rehearing; while at only a single pair of concerts has the public received the pleasure of "Iberia" from Dr. Muck's divining hand. Those that like to reproach his programmes say that he tends to go 'round and 'round a succession of pieces, polishing and perfecting a little more each new repetition. Under actual scrutiny of his lists the reproach does not hold; while, curiously, the performance of "The Afternoon of a Faun" yesterday was less characteristic of the glamorous music—in which tones are as sun-shot mist traversing the summer air—than have been some that preceded it.

For the fate that overtook Wagner's music when it had become classic has now befallen Debussy's, similarly established. The whole world, except the case-hardened care-takers of convention, is agreed upon the beauty of this prelude. Why not then—the conductors seem to reason—make it "a linked" beauty "long drawn out" and take it at slower and slower pace, even as to this day many of them take the more sensuous pages of Wagner's music-dramas? Dr. Muck shuns these languors with his Wagner, yet he seemed to court them on Friday with his Debussy, spinning the web of the music in sustained slowness. He seemed also to yield overmuch to another of the latter-day fashions with the earlier music of Debussy. For a time there was a common agreement that not a little of it—orchestral, piano and vocal pieces and much of "Pélléas and Mélisande"—was a thin-bodied streaming, iridescent music moving in its own lovely haze and delicate suggestion. Then came a Debussy who wrote in stouter-bodied pattern and fuller voice. Meanwhile the detractors of his matter and manner had repeated to weariness that his music was fragile and hushed. Straightaway, as though at once to follow the master's new manner and refute the scornful, his apostles began to play not a few of these earlier pieces in larger and more emphatic voice, ampler design and deeper color. Dr. Muck was of them yesterday when he sounded the music with an intenser note of melancholy and musing, of languor and longing, than such a "dream-fiction" surely warrants.

The rest of the programme, which fell into two contrasting groups—the one southern and shining and the other northern and gray—was of a different voice. Almost in the literal sense of the words, Mr. Gabrilowitsch—as usual for the music first and for himself second—joined the orchestra to play the piano part in the symphonic piece by Rakmaninov, that the composer labels a concerto for pianoforte with orchestra. In form and in occasional details it is a concerto in the stricter sense of the word, yet nowhere does the music set piano and pianist displayfully before the orchestral background. He may prove, as Mr. Gabrilowitsch did, his keen insight into a fairly abstruse piece, his acute sense of his own share in the design and the progress of the whole; his technical ease, diversified richness of tone, alertness to pace, rhythm, euphony or contrast through the whole course of it. Rakmaninov himself is a notable pianist; yet never once does he weave in and out of the concerto purely pianistic embroideries. He asks other virtues than virtuosity of him who plays the piano part, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch, as was to be expected, was loyal to the composer's intent. Like Mr. Longy with his oboe, or Mr. Warnke with his 'cello, the pianist took his place in the orchestra to carry to the best of his ability his share in a symphonic piece.

As such, Rakmaninov's concerto more interests the mind than it stirs the sensibilities. It seems almost always a well-considered and almost nowhere an inspired, music. By every token of it the composer has meditated his design, chosen among his means, adjusted and polished his details. His motives are clear, compact, promising and fruitful. His development and interplay with them does not lack invention, resource and stroke. It has even its sober ardors; but usually the suggestion is of processes of the mind rather than of impulses of the spirit. The workmanship is like the matter. Out of these qualities Rakmaninov once and again distils a grave beauty as in the slow movement, a grave power as in the latter pages of the finale, and a grave loftiness as in the first movement. But through the whole music, in spite of the richness of both Mr. Gabrilowitsch's and the orchestra's tone, went a middle-gray mass of instrumental and harmonic color. Under repetition, the concerto would almost surely make warmer and deeper impression; but for obvious reasons, few are the pianists that choose it.

The other northern piece was that first symphony of Sibelius with which Dr. Muck seems to have permanently enriched the active repertory of the concerts, played with his wonted projecting force upon such music, if not to the wonted applause of an audience that the chance of the day seemed not to dispose to grim power. These are the days of diffusive minds and thin-spread spirits, whereas in the writing of his symphonies Sibelius seems to hold his creative faculties in the tensest of strain and union. What it is the custom to call his brevity and his economy of means are really but the play of this high intensity. In relatively few measures, as in the mournful melodies of the introduction and the Andante he so outpours his bleak lament of loneliness. From this concentration springs the force and the fulness of his instrumental and harmonic strokes. When this red heat of creation, this deep surge of spirit is more, almost, than the composer can bear, it releases itself in the clangors, blow upon blow, of the finale or of many a measure of the allegro energico, tame term for what is often seething tone.

No doubt Sibelius has felt the influences of a Finnish land that for months is bleak, bare, cloud-swept and rain driven, as they that have seen it say. No doubt he shares the Finnish temperament which those same observers say is prone to extremes of depression and elation as witness the contrast of the andante and the scherzo of this symphony. No man may escape his race and his abode; no doubt also Sibelius has his own idiosyncrasies of brooding, restless, grim and impetuous temper. His music may escape them, since each of us practises his calling according to his spiritual kind. But the oftener Sibelius's music is heard the more the secret of its power seems to be this concentrated intensity of creation. The very beauty that haunts his passages of mournful song is as truly of it as the power of his mighty clashes of motive with motive, progression with progession, until the music clangs and clangs again. Out of intensity his modulations strike fire. When he is merry he lets loose his whole soul in his pastime, as in the fantastical scherzo. The outcome is a music deep with the sincerities of brooding and restless emotion, high with the sincerities of passionate power. There are passages in this same symphony that, as it seems under their and Dr. Muck's eloquence, only the all-embracing Wagner can match in mournful puissance.

H. T. P.

From the Transcript nov.23,1916.

CURRENT CONCERTS

Dr. Muck's Revival of a Symphonic Poem by Smetana—The Bettered Miss van Baerentzen—Mr. Ouloukanoff and Russian Pieces

TOMORROW afternoon and Saturday evening for the first times in nearly twenty years, Smetana's tone-poem, "Wallenstein's Camp" will be heard at the Symphony Concerts, where Mr. Paur originally made it known to Boston in 1897. The reviewers then found it faithful and honest work, without striving for effect and with the subject justifying a plentiful use of brass, drums and cymbals. Schiller's play of like title stirred Smetana's imagination in 1859, while he held a conductorship in Sweden, shortly after the composition of "Richard III.," which was played here last spring. Smetana's friend, Proksch, wrote to him most enthusiastically on his choice of subject, and his countryman, Rybak, writes that in this alone of the three symphonic poems, Smetana found means for national expression, and utilized them fully. Order emerging from the loud turmoil of camp life depicted in the opening is representative, according to Rybak, of the evolution of Bohemian music from chaos and confusion. He deplores however the absence of national melodies. The work opens with a tumultuous din of the whole orchestra, which goes on for some pages, swelling and diminishing, with occasional fragmentary horn and trumpet calls. Then comes quiet, and a dance tune variously developed, from which a figure, stated later in a recitative of brass octaves, has been interpreted as depicting the Capucin's sermon. The dance rhythm changes, there comes a temporary burst of the former confusion, then a weird Andante, and finally a march introduced by ar elaborate fanfare of trumpets, and increasing in intensity and proportion at some length until the close.

From the Transcript Nov.11,1916,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE CONTRASTS OF BRAHMS AND RIMSKY-KORSAKOV

Dr. Muck Restores the Russian's "Scheherazade" to the Active Repertory, Leads in It for the First Time and Achieves a Generally Remarkable Performance—The German's First Symphony in More Familiar Voice

WHILE the Russian Ballet tortures tone-poems across the way, Dr. Muck conscientiously exhibits them in the virgin beauty and nakedness of their original conception and intention. There are programmes and programmes. Look here upon this picture and on this: Mallarmé and Debussy embracing in symphonic symbols and indefinable visions, and Nijinsky and the censors disputing over veils; the "Till" of Strauss's unconfined and darting orchestral fancy, and "Till" bridled to the labored miming of flesh and blood; "Scheherazade" of luminous brilliance, discursive continuity and manifold resource, and "Scheherazade" done over into dispointed potpourri, set to riotous Bakst, slinking sultanas in white, and a melodrama of wholesale bloodshed, which Rimsky-Korsakov never ever remotely conceived.

Now, these composers are not Beethovens that their scores should be revered to the last demi-semi-quaver. In fact, the two of them that still live, cheerfully give themselves to be butchered to make a spectacle. The broadcast delights of the spectacle warrant a sacrificial hashing, so long as these same excellent scores still maintain their original symphonic preeminence. And it is this necessary symphonic side of things which Dr. Muck is laboring so conscientiously to uphold. There is at least room for doubt about the advisability of mangling Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a step which the composer's widow, an excellent pianist in herself and a noted composer, has opposed to her utmost power. And those who heard yesterday the beauties of the work in its unified and unaltered form, must have had strong inclinations to take up her side of the argument. To come freshly from the house of desecration, where whole sections are omitted, pages repeated and jumbled every which way, and to hear it brilliantly played in its narrative charm, with so vastly different a tale to tell, is to think new and better things of its composer.

In the first place, the story is so much more cogent and true to the spirit of its source. For it will be remembered that the "Arabian Nights" tempers its horrors by the soothing security of putting them in the third person, as does Rimsky-Korsakov, and as does every playwright with a sense of decent moderation. Scheherazade insinuates her supple self securely through the symphony suite which takes her name, has the first, the middle and the last say, keeping her wits and her head (in the literal sense), and versatile lady that she is, telling us tales of wonders, loveliness, adventure and blood with unflagging aptitude and vividness, modifying our horrified thrills by the perpetual sub-realization that it is only a story after all. And all this musical story, and story within a story, stimulates the imagination to greater scope and greater subtlety than any Bakst or Diaghilev. It is a delightful mixture of dreams from the romantic remoteness of the "Arabian Nights," and the reincarnating vividness of contemporary Orientalism. For the air is laden with heavy perfumes, there is the sensuous lure of silk draperies and the suspicion of uncleanliness beneath. But not too much of this, for squalid reality is death to romanticism. The narration is purified and exalted into a more visionary sphere.

In turn the composer has a rich store of orchestral device, to fabricate this world of dreams. The orchestration throughout is effulgent and transparent, for it is all mere picture-making. There is no symphonic web, but themes barely stated in a single timbre, and brought into sharp relief against some mysterious and luminous background of orchestral glamour. Hence many solo passages, and a perpetual distinctiveness of timbre. It is all much like Liszt with a more set unity of conception and purpose, and a freedom from professional showiness. The theme of Scheherazade, sweet and sirupy, but alluring, is usually given to the violin solo which takes on such a strangely rich quality in an orchestra. It is an insinuating theme, creeping in on every occasion, saying once upon a time and soothing one into submissive receptivity. And when the last wondrous adventure is concluded, Scheherazade finally soothes in like manner the latent blood-thirstiness of her lord.

As for the tales themselves, there is excitement in plenty; and the description suits them admirably. There is a becoming artificiality about it—the sea is the brilliantly painted fairy-tale sort, such as Du Lac might have put into fanciful color, except that Rimsky-Korsakov has done it infinitely better. And that final thrilling tale of the wondrous ship charmed and drawn to gorgeous, crashing distinction! Such a fanfare of trombones and answering trumpets—such a brave ensemble, heightened by breathless chromatic sweeps of flutes and violins, and thrown into staccato rhythms by the tattoo of snare drum and tambourines! It is one better than Liszt, because its superlative brilliance is never hard, but is warmly and delicately imagined. It is a light-hearted fairy-tale, told with a genial and genuine enthusiasm, and a remarkable skill turned to the purposes of the telling. Rimsky-Korsakov had much to thank the abbé for, but he also had much to add of his own in thematic idiom, in the many orchestral effects, which were freshly conceived, and not what Mr. Forsyth calls "bread-and-butter devices," in the fantastically shifting rhythms of the Kalander's Tale, and the general manner of discourse. It is a particularly piece to play, with its requirements for solo virtuosity, and for ensemble where a fault in the brass, or a lack of precision in the rhythmic "accessories," would mar everything. And needless to say Dr. Muck and his orchestra rose superbly to its dazzling brilliance in this his first performance of it, while making it something far different from a mere show-piece.

Those too accustomed to the style of Brahms will look for development and counterplot in "Scheherazade," and they will find more repetition, and bare, single-voiced statement—they will look for thought and foundational solidity, and will find vaporating dreams and empty air. But in fairness both to the German and the Russian, let us not compare. For to appreciate Brahms, we must put fairy tales entirely out of mind. Dr. Muck has made a regular and recurring favorite of the C minor Symphony, and he has also made a master accomplishment of its performance. The very impetus which carried the composer at his work through its many moods and deep course of contemplation, and which brought its manifold development and no less manifold and intricate poetic fervor to a final logical conclusion, this same impetus of inspiration seems to grasp the sensitive and receptive conductor, and dictate every shade of tempo and stress of phrase.

Those who have grown to love this symphony are carried, too, through its mounting course. From dark and rugged splendor into light, through the elevating and deeply penetrating emotion of the slow movement, the diatonic beauty and simplicity of the theme of the third movement, and the ever fresh resource of its working out. And finally the triumphant climax, which sweeps everything along as it approaches, and transfixes everything as it closes. Those whose acquaintance with this symphony runs back into the years, find that its themes and its poetry never fail, but always unfold something new from its vast store, and increasingly bind the affection.

J. N. B.

News

m Springfield, Mass.

dress:

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Great Orchestra to Be Heard in Auditorium Monday Evening

The first concert of the season by the Boston symphony orchestra will be given Monday evening in the Auditorium at 8.15. This is the second concert of the Ellis series, which opened so brilliantly last month with Geraldine Farrar. Boston's great orchestra has been coming to Springfield intermittently, so to say, for many years, and has long since established itself in the admiration of the musical public of this city. Now that Springfield has one of the finest concert halls in the country, it may be expected that the orchestra will give at least one concert here every year, and it is to be hoped that the concerts this season will be successful enough to warrant the orchestra coming here each season twice.

DR MUCK, CONDUCTOR

The soloist at the coming concert will be Laeta Hartley, who is a stranger in Springfield. Miss Hartley belongs to the younger generation of American women pianists. The last few years have seen a number of these American women who have become most successful artists, and none has been more successful than Miss Hartley. She appeared with the Boston symphony orchestra once in 1914-1915, three times in 1915-1916, and she has been specially engaged for this concert here.

The program is one of wide variety and of great beauty. It comprises Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

From the Boston Globe nov.26,1916.

Symphony Orchestra Tour

There will be no Symphony concerts in Boston this week as the orchestra is making its second Southern trip, giving the usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn the soloist will be Susan Millar, the young mezzo-soprano, who is a protege of Mme Sembrich. There will be no soloist in New York.

[44]

From the Boston Globe Nov. 19, 1916.

MAJ H. L. HIGGINSON SAYS BE AN EXPERT

Banker's Choicest Advice on His 82d Birthday

Believes Country Should Protest Deportation of Belgians

"Get ready to live—to make yourself an expert in some line," was the message which Maj Henry L. Higginson said yesterday in his drawing room that he wished to send through the Globe to the coming generation, on the occasion of his 82d birthday.

The major didn't go downtown to his office in State st today. That wasn't because he's 82, or because it was his birthday. The chief reason was that he seldom goes downtown on Saturdays.

Eighty-two? In appearance and in ideas, which he is willing to express without hesitation, he's like a youngster at the crest of the wave—on the right side of 55.

Throughout the 20 minutes he chatted with his messenger, he stood all the time, rubbing his hands together and obviously taking life with a keen zest. Then he ended the message-giving almost before the messenger could grasp the fact, and trotted into another room to greet visitors, and relatives, who had come in.

"Lack of experts," he enlarged on his message, "lack of experts is the trouble with this country. What does the growing boy do today, what specialty does he aim himself at? He doesn't do anything—but swell.

"Now, this country manufactures goods. But it doesn't manufacture them better than any other country, does it? What are we? We're nothing but a Nation, lacking experts!

Army Not Much—Navy Less

"We haven't got much of an Army. We haven't anything of a Navy. What we want are experts. There are none in Government steering. I voted for Mr Wilson the first time, but I didn't the last.

"I have devoted myself a good deal to banking, yet I don't consider myself an expert. That's my mistake.

"Take that boy who brought you up on the elevator," he went on. "He can write and could take notes perhaps as well as you. But could he go down and edit the Globe? He'd try fast enough, according to the standards of the coming generation. But he'd raise—but, but, I'm afraid Gen Taylor would find his income in the—the washtub in a very little while—and you would, too. We need experts.

"Look at the railroads. What are they coming to? I cannot conscientiously advise any one to buy railroad stocks if they want an investment. If they care to gamble, that is another thing.

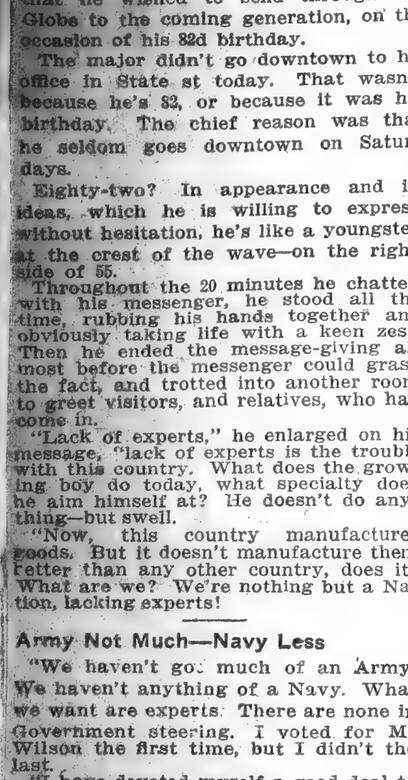

PHOTO BY NORMAN

MAJ HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

"It's a wonder the Boston & Maine didn't become a serious calamity. Suppose this receivership hadn't come gradually as it did, but had come abruptly. Savings banks all over the State would have found they held a lot of bonds not of much use. Some—a problematical number—consequently would have had to close their doors.

"The banks should refuse to take bonds when the interest on them is not paid. I am not sure they have a legal right to do so.

"But what are you going to do when they bring up their unreasonable eight-hour law? It follows naturally that when railroad wages and output are constantly on the increase and their revenue is not, something is going to smash.

"Now, I am a working man, just like you. I have been one all my life. I expect to keep on till I drop. But when I start on a piece of work I stay with it until it's finished, no matter what. And I believe I understand the difficulties and danger and consequences of overwork as well as any man living.

Work Hours Not to Be Limited

"You can't limit the hours of work. Suppose you tried to apply that principle to doctors handling a critical case. Suppose you tried it with this elevator man out here when he was half-way down or half-way up. Simply you can't do it. Every job must be finished.

"Take the farmers. They're our largest and best class. Where should we come out on the food question if they ever stopped to think about the eight-hour law?

"The railroad employes have $35 a week if they must have it. 'Who will pay?' you ask. The people will pay for it. They always do.

"Now, I have all respect for labor unions and their necessity, but (the major's voice took on a harsh tone, which belied his general appearance, dressing gown, in his brown smoking jacket) I do not intend to have any man saying to me, 'You shall work just so many hours and there you shall stop.'

"What we need is experts behind the opposition of any such moves as the eight-hour law.

Should Protest Belgian Deportation

"Also, I think the Government is wrong not to remonstrate against the deportation of the Belgians. That's the worst thing yet.

"Apply this case to your own relatives and friends. What would your feelings be if they were dragged off and sent to Belgium? Would you remonstrate or not?

"You would be bad enough to walk down the street and see three men mauling you. You'd remonstrate and probably fight, even though you got your throat for it. But if you saw your family being carried away willy-nilly"—(a long pause)—"the deportation of the Belgians is the worst thing yet."

Maj Higginson told a witty story of the German Emperor, which cannot be printed.

Maj Higginson, to do honor to the observance of the messenger asked. "Yes, sir, I'll be very glad."

From the Transcript Nov. 25, 1916.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REVIVALS FROM SMETANA AND OLD HAYDN

An Unfamiliar Symphony in Which the Orchestra Shines—"Wallenstein's Camp" for Straightforward and Honest Music-Making—Brahms's Concerto for Violin in Luminous and Quickening Performance—Mr. Witek's Distinguished Playing

PERHAPS, after all, the eighteenth-century symphonies of Mozart and Haydn exact a finer virtuosity of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra than do their admittedly displayful pieces, like Chabrier's "España" or Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." The symphony by Haydn—in C minor, one of the so-called Salomon series, numbered nine in Breitkopf and Härtel's catalogue—revived yesterday, after thirteen years of repose on the shelves of the library, is not remarkable among its fellows. Even for music of the eighteenth century and from Haydn's hand, it sounded unusually thin-bodied, while in the slow movement, wherein in many another symphony the composer was wont to deploy copiously his melodic invention, he is content with a brief and none too fanciful set of songful variations. The first movement, though Haydn's beginnings are usually spacious, is hardly longer-breathed; the minuet is no more than comfortable music diversified by a solo for violoncello in the trio, which Mr. Warnke played with true Viennese lightness of touch and tone; while the finale substitutes quick-fingered counterpoint for the composer's usual gayeties of returning tune. In its species, the symphony was not particularly interesting nor was it applauded as Haydn's symphonies usually are by a company pleasured with transparent melody and dexterous workmanship. In it the moral seemed written large—that what may be called the conventionalized symphonies of Haydn sound most agreeably in twentieth-century ears and that departure from the routine of them brings peril of dulness. Some listeners may even have remembered that during Dr. Muck's first term as conductor of the orchestra, he was urged to experiment with the symphonies of Schubert that are usually put by for "The Unfinished" and the ninth in C major. Accordingly, he revived one of the neglected and it proved far duller than did yesterday the resurrected symphony of Haydn. The chances are that with these elder composers time has sifted shrewdly.

The chosen symphony, however, sufficed to display this finer virtuosity of conductor and orchestra both positively and negatively. They were precise, for example, but not over-precise; since, while they left not a blur upon the lucent surface of Haydn's music, they kept also the light and running motion which is as essential. Of course, the weight of the string-tone, even with reënforced and counterbalancing woodwinds and horns, was far greater than Haydn designed, especially when the whole band interposed in the counterpoint or arabesques of the violins. The eighteenth century in Vienna, and Mozart and Haydn along with it, loved not such emphases. Probably they are inseparable from the performance of their symphonies a hundred and twenty-five years afterward by a numerous orchestra in a large hall to many hearers. At the least, Dr. Muck and his forces are as light-handed as may be with their own numbers. Moreover, this weight and volume of tone never lessen clarity, suavity, euphony, elegance of phrasing, aptness of accent and contrast, elasticity of modulation and progression and a keen sense of the polished poise which was the eighteenth-century manner with its music. The arabesques for the strings in the first movement sounded as though they were played by a single virtuoso; the wood-winds in the Andante were pungent and haunting; the leisurely grace of the minuet was the perfection of rhythm; the finale, a little miracle of fleetness yoked to clearness. Nowhere through the whole symphony was there a single roughness of tone, a single uneven jointure, a relaxed strand in the whole finely woven and lightly tinted web. Slips of any sort may not go unperceived in these eighteenth-century symphonies, whereas a dozen may pass unnoted in the whirl and glow of a modern virtuoso piece. On the score of elegance and finesse, little music is as exacting as that which the Viennese patrons, who must have had delicate ears, demanded of the eminent kapelle-meisters, Herren Mozart and Haydn. Moreover, if there is to be such sense of style as orchestra and conductor displayed yesterday, sentiment, as that same eighteenth-century understood it, must join finger-tips with elegance.

Contrast came at the other end of the concert in a second revived piece, Smetana's tone-poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," unheard in Symphony Hall for almost twenty years. It lacks—perhaps under the prescriptions of the chosen music—any distinctive Bohemian voice and color; but otherwise it is highly characteristic of the simple-minded and frank composer, blood-brother in temper to his countryman of the concert-room, Dvoràk. The pictorial design is as clear as the day—the tumult of the licentious camp; lusty dances; a broad hint in the brass of the Capuchin's maundering sermon in Schiller's like-named play; a return to the tumult; well-imagined suggestion of descending and quieting night; a sonorous "apotheosis" in the Lisztian manner, tempo di marcia, with trumpets and trombones blown to the last inch of breath and drums and cymbals mightily smitten. As clear is Smetana's procedure—vigorous rhythms, thick and bright harmonic and instrumental color; the full power of the orchestra ascending and descending; salient motives, readily and opulently developed into tumult, dance, procession or songful suggestion; the contrasting passage, subdued, ghostly, nocturnal; no little skill and imagination in transition, modulation and artful accord of pictorial and purely musical progress; obvious sensation for the hearers by as obvious an application of the composer's means. A sound and wholesome, a vivid and occasionally inspiriting music is this tone-picturing by Smetana, saved by his native and communicating ardor from the near pitfall of commonplace. And the four trumpets—Messrs. Hein, Mann, Nappi and Kloepfel—did wonders with their repeated and exacting calls, higher in the range of the instrument than many composers—and not a few players—dare to go.

Between Haydn's symphony and Smetana's tone-picture stood Brahms's concerto for violin in as penetrating and stimulating a performance as it has received these many years at the Symphony Concerts even when more celebrated violinists than Mr. Witek have played the solo part. It was good to see him bearing his usual share in the symphony and returning to his usual place for the final number. It was as a member of the orchestra, primus inter pares, and not as a wandering virtuoso from the world without, that, with a true and fine esprit de corps, he played his part in the concerto. In like spirit his associates applauded him and it was pleasurable to see him turning eagerly to acknowledge their greetings almost before he had bowed to the equally applausive audience. At the beginning and at the end it heaped him with deserved plaudits. For not a few of those same wandering virtuosi might have envied the concert-master's performance of his exacting music. Luminously he sustained the fine and bright, or the dark and deep, strand that the solo violin weaves through the pattern of the concerto. Not once did the long line break except where Brahms bids; never did it sag or halt; always it was in rhythmic motion, close-spun transition, upspringing arabesque or pointed modulation, while it ceased not to undulate with the melodic curve that Brahms with all his calculation and counterpoint, seldom forgets. The euphony with which Mr. Witek blended his tone with the voices of the several choirs of the orchestra was edgeless, yet, when it was the turn of the violin to speak out and above them, his speech upon it was warm, vital, dominant. More than was his wont of old, he struck fire in the measures with which the violin enters the concerto and in the rhythmic ardors of the finale. Throughout he played with a breadth, forcefulness and penetration that, after Dr. Muck's manner, energized and opened a somewhat abstruse and none too articulate music; while he conveyed in very just response the sentiment, musing and melancholy, that exhales from the first two movements. For, until it reaches the finale, Brahms's concerto is not a music of ardor, much less of power; while nowhere is it a music of emotion. Sometimes, it is easy to believe that, as he wrote, Brahms felt the over-shadowing and inwardly revising Joachim watching over his shoulder.

Seldom has Mr. Witek played here with so many clear distinctions. As virtuoso and musician he has waxed in his years with the Symphony Orchestra. Little less, though Dr. Muck characteristically and obstinately set himself in the background, was the conductor's share, since it was he that fashioned the large and detailed design of this whole masterful performance of the concerto as a piece of symphonic music. Seldom has it been so clarified, vitalized, poetized as by one who would intensify and release the mood and spirit of the music yet lessen not—much less distort—its intrinsic quality. It is possible to emotionalize the music of Brahms fictitiously; it is possible to play it with as false a dryness; at the golden mean, in the concertos for violin and for piano no less than in the symphonies, stands Dr. Muck, quickening and setting it free, letting light within the dark places, humanizing it always, yet never forcing it out of Brahmsian disdain of shallows and shams. Best of all, the conductor and the orchestra gained yesterday that shadowy glow which is the beauty and the wonder of Brahms's harmonic and instrumental color and that musing moodiness which is half the poetry of his music.

H. T. P.

From the Transcript Nov. 20, 1916.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TWICE AND MISS SCHNITZER

A Pleasant Ceremony for Mr. Higginson's Birthday—The Band in Form Again—Tschaikovski, Strauss of the Waltzes and Others for the Pension Fund and Light and Effective Music—The Pianist's Ardent Vein with Her Romantic Composers

THE Symphony Concert of Saturday evening fell exactly upon Mr. Higginson's eighty-second birthday and Dr. Muck and the orchestra had kept well the secret of the little ceremony with which they had planned to note the occasion. A slip in the programme book informed the audience of it and explained that at the begining of the second part of the concert, the orchestra would play Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute." With stately chords in the brass and brilliant fugal passages for strings, it made appropriate music for such homage, while it happens to be a piece that "the founder and sustainer" always hears gladly. The performance proceeded con amore; at the end, the hall rang with applause that Mr. Higginson, pleased and stirred, rose to acknowledge. A moment later the whole company was on its feet turning, so far as might be, toward the man whom it would thus deservedly honor. So surrounded, he quickly recovered his composure and the little tribute ended as smilingly as it had begun.

The "off-day" for the orchestra, which more than one hearer believed he had discovered on Friday afternoon, passed with the night, and the performance of all five pieces on Saturday rose readily to the familiar standards. Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody went with exactness as well as with fire of rhythm and modulation; Debussy's Faun seemed to muse somewhat less languidly than on the day before and the instruments that spoke his fancies to attain a more melting euphony. With Sibelius's symphony, indeed, conductor and orchestra were vivid almost to a fault. For Sibelius, like every other composer, has his favorite procedures, which the clearness and the precision of the orchestra more than usually underscored. How well he likes, for example, to pass a telling melodic phrase or an ardent augmentation through the different groups of instruments until it has mounted, Mahlerwise, over the whole orchestra! How fond he is of a closely-woven under-body and harmonic background through which a penetrating melody gradually pierces and drives, upward and upward in its course. Nor is he indifferent to the instrumental retort, as it were, that Beethoven and Bruckner use, too, in their wilder and more rugged Scherzi. So, in Sibelius's in this present symphony, bassoons and brass clout each other. Idiosyncrasies all, mannerisms the cold-blooded hearer will, but devices that the composer uses always with clear purpose and as clear a personal power. Even Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the self-denying in Rackmaninov's concerto, had his share in the virtuosity—toward the end of the first movement where he reiterated with sustained and cumulating power the clanging phrases for the piano; at the close of the whole piece where the magnificent sonority of his chords seemed to drive before them—as in Tschaikovsky's more familiar concerto—the whole body of orchestral tone.

For the Pension Fund

Avowedly for the primary benefit of the musicians themselves, the Pension Fund concerts naturally fall into the popular vein, and falling into the popular vein they become a healthful relaxation from the high standards of the season's course, and a necessary outlet for popular music otherwise despised and neglected. Granted all this, the question arises as to what is the most popular and seat-filling music of all. Wagner, from past proof, draws admirers from far and wide—admirers that crowd and fill and overflow. Tschaikovski also works beautifully as an "attraction," and being virtually barred from those concerts of the higher standards, he has become a permanent and a successful resource as well as a logical one. The latest experiment is an invasion of the "Pops" repertory, and a drawing forth of such as Delibes, Nicolai, and Johann Strauss. Yesterday afternoon the balconies were filled, but there were decided gaps along the two sides of the floor seats. So, in Boston at least, Wagner is the most popular of them all. To be sure, Boston is Wagner starved, but nevertheless here is a good answer to the staticisticians who proclaim the waning of Wagner and the supremacy, however ephemeral, of Puccini. For Boston is Puccini starved, too, and does not seem to crave him the more.

Tschaikovski's Fourth Symphony seems to be a favorite with Dr. Muck—he honors no other in the regular concerts, and the Fifth has gone unplayed for many a long year. As with the "Pathetic," the Fourth frays at the edges with much use; the theatrical machinery of its construction begins to show through, and its surface beauties become painted scenery. It is not condemning Tschaikovski to call him theatrical. Weber is theatrical—so is Wagner for that matter. But as theatrical devices become outdated and superseded, the music either becomes gaunt and cumbersome machinery, or lives through the personality, individuality, and genius of the composer behind. And there is undoubtedly something behind the Fourth Symphony in question—no one will deny that. It is not exactly Russian, but the intense and sensitive impressions of fate and misfortune upon a genius complaining bitterly and futilely.

The potency of his story fades with time, as the means of telling it however capable and workable, yet have little of innovation about them and quickly become antiquated. But what Tschaikovski does, he does well and interestingly. The overbearing, clarion, and penetrating theme of fate, with the cataclysmic trombones heightening the force of the trumpets, occurring always so dramatically, the resourcefulness and effectiveness of the plucked Scherzo which is something more than a tour de force, and never fails to charm, the prepared climaxes, and the thunderous catastrophe of the whole orchestra in broken rhythm—such devices indicate the promptings of genius as well as excellent theatrical management, and they will never completely pall. But the second movement and part of the Finale bring satiety. Tschaikovski's themes are unpleasantly obvious. They grab and hug you when you are introduced to them, but they do not prove the firmest and time-tried friends.

Weber is another of those composers born with the theatrical instinct, and obsessed with it and prompted by it through life. Tschaikovski has the advantage of him in years, and the machinery of Weber is decidedly outworn—fairy music has developed a long way since he invented it for Oberon. His melodies, too, are baldly obvious, and his devices apparent. But three overtures still cling to orchestral repertory, and are in a fair way to permanent lodging there, however often they are decried as hackneyed and out of date. Possibly we shall always revolt from time to time, but always return to them once more. For the peculiar flavor of Weber may well be the flavor of immortality. His kind of individuality, his primal force and his national force, Tschaikovski never had. And the delicate delights of the overture to Oberon still endure. Tschaikovski's renown flares and dies—Weber's also flares, but then it settles to an even glow.

The remainder of the programme was a step further down into theatricality—the musical scenery which must be abandoned to oblivion, once it has had its vogue. It was all "Pops" music glorified and enthroned for a day, served with the attentive ceremony due to royalty, and sent back to its rags. The orchestra did not, perhaps, bestow upon it the care, concentration and enthusiasm which brought them so brilliantly and flawlessly through Tschaikovski's symphony, but their conductor does not need inspiration to key him up to his task. He is always sensitively alert and unflaggingly alive to every detail, whatever his natural sympathies. For popular music reveals slackness as quickly as any other sort. Never was a waltz of Strauss exalted to higher perfection, snap and lilt than was "Wine, Woman and Song" yesterday. Delibes has his individuality and charm. And horns never rose more superbly to the Wagnerian motive of "Sylvia," or strings to the exacting pizzicati. But perhaps in taking "Sylvia" conscientiously, Dr. Muck also took it a little too seriously, for its true spirit is anything but pretentious. In any case, the symphonic arrangement of the ballet is quite long, and without the sustaining entertainment of pink tights and performing toes, the interest lags in spots.

Finally, Nicolai, lifted at last from the raucous blare of park bands and the scraping and tooting of theatre orchestras, to full symphonic splendor. But perhaps Nicolai with his little comedy overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" sat rather uneasily under the relentless light of such glorification. And when the great orchestra and the keen conductor have centred their numerous and combined powers for some thirty minutes on such theatrical claptrap, while the audience, though less sensitized, sits also in undivided attention, the modest dance music of small means seems neither to deserve nor to claim all this importance. Also, it falls into a certain sameness—a result which is effectively avoided in the more diversified atmosphere of beer and busting waiters.

m REPUBLICAN

dress: Springfield, Mass.

NOV 4 1916

ate

GIVEN A WARM GREETING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Season in Carnegie Hall in New York

The Boston symphony orchestra, which comes to the Auditorium in the second of the Ellis concerts Monday evening, opened its season in New York Thursday night, and every seat in Carnegie hall was occupied. Dr Muck, according to the New York papers, was accorded a demonstrative greeting. "The symphony," Beethoven's "Eroica," says the Times, "received a particularly noble and stirring performance. There is that in it which appeals especially to the heart in these days; it was evident that Dr Muck felt this appeal, and that he was able to communicate it with unusual eloquence to his listeners. The orchestra was an extraordinarily supple and plastic instrument in his hands, and its playing was remarkably beautiful in tone, in the proportion and balance of the several instrumental qualities, in finish and lucidity of phrasing, full of subtle and significant nuance. There were an immense vitality in the first movement, a poignantly tragic note in the funeral march, and a fiery energy in the variations of the last movement; and it was all a true embodiment of Beethoven's thought, without the obtrusion of a 'reading.'"

From the Globe Nov. 19, 1916.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

This afternoon brings the first of the two concerts given annually in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra. Following the success of such a concert a year ago, Dr. Muck has arranged a programme consisting of Tschaikowsky and popular—truly popular—music. The Tschaikowsky number will be the Fourth Symphony.

The second half of the programme will begin with the "Oberon" overture of Weber, which will be followed by the suite taken from the music of Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia." This is in four parts, comprising a prelude and Les Chasseresses, intermezzo et valse lente, Pizzicati, and the Cartege de Bacchus.

The next number will be Johann Strauss' waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," the particular waltz which is said to have aroused such envy in Johannes Brahms and he could not do as well in this form. The final number will be Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The concert will begin at 3:30 o'clock.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr Ernst Kunwald conductor, will visit Boston on the evening of Jan 11 at Symphony Hall. Kunwald is one of the various orchestra conductors who are striving so valorously to develop symphonic music in America, and prominent on his music program stands "The Domestica," by Strauss.

Anton Witek, concert master, will make his annual appearance as soloist at the sixth pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon, Nov. 24, and Saturday evening, Nov. 25. He will play the Brahms' concerto. The symphony will be Mozart's in D-major, No. 35, in the Breitkopf & Hartel edition, followed by the Brahms' concerto, and the final number will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wellenstein's Camp." This will come as a novelty, as it has not been played here in Boston since 1897 under Emil Paur.

The length of the programme will be one hour and 45 minutes.

[45]

From the Advertiser
Nov. 25,1916.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS CONSERVATIVE

VIRILITY OF HAYDN SHOWN BY MUCK

First and Last Movements Were the Best—Work Is Agreeable and Short

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Haydn—Symphony in C minor.
Brahms—Violin Concerto.
Anton Witek, Soloist.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem. "Wallenstein's Camp."

There is very little to be said about yesterday's symphony concert. One could almost sum it up with a quotation from Canning's "Friend of Humanity and the Needy Knife Grinder,"——

"Story! God Bless you, I have none to tell, sir."

Only the Smetana number had something of novelty in its measures. Not one of the works given broke the commandments of Richter, or dealt in unresolved dissonances, chords of the 13th, or any other of the evils which modern music is heir to.

But Dr. Muck reads a Haydn symphony in a manner that gives it a modern flavor. He is evidently not steeped in the "Papa Haydn" idea, but considers the old composer virile as well as genial. Haydn's symphonies will never grow old-fashioned any more than sunshine. They wear much better than much of the instrumental music of his time. Yet he was behind Mozart in this field. Think of this conventional work being created in the same year as the "Jupiter" the "Clarinette Symphony" and the exquisite G minor.

The slow movement seemed very tepid although some development was mingled with the strict variation form. The minuet was also somewhat stereotyped, but with some contrasts that Dr. Muck made the most of. The first and last movements were the best, and the work was agreeable and short.

Then came the Brahms violin concerto, with its ideal interpreter—Anton Witek. We are reconciled to hearing this work often, for it is a case where familiarity does not breed contempt, but reveals constantly new beauties. This is one of Brahms' works which one first endures but ends by embracing. The reviewer recalls Prof. Baermann once saying to him that only after much study of the second piano concerto was it made clear to him that the many difficulties of Brahms were really essential to the expression of the work. Something of the same kind of change of mind takes place with the repeated hearing of Brahms' difficult violin concerto. There is increased beauty revealed with each repeated hearing.

But the work may never be attempted save by the most earnest musician who is at the same time possessed of a tremendous technique. Such a musician is Anton Witek. We recognize the abnegation involved in interpreting such an ascetic work, a composition that must be above the heads of many of the auditors. It is a bit of educational sacrifice that in itself deserves praise.

But Mr. Witek compelled recognition of his great qualities, and the applause at the end of the long work was very emphatic. He received a cordial greeting before he began, as well. His performance, and that of the orchestra, in the very intricate first movement, made that labyrinth much clearer than we have heard it for a very long time. The ease with which many passages in high position were taken was remarkable, and both in great breadth and in consummate delicacy the execution was commendable. The long cadenza work was full of technical display, and a word may also be added regarding the excellent horn-playing. The last movement is the most popular of the work, and its Hungarian flavor was finely brought out. Recall followed recall at the close.

Then came "Wallenstein's Lager." To the uninitiated we may explain that this is not a competitor of Budweiser or Anhaeuser-Busch, but a tone-picture of a camp, but a camp without trenches, or tanks, or Busy Berthas. Rheinberger once made a rather interesting tone-poem upon this subject, which it might pay to resurrect, although Smetana's is undoubtedly the better work. It was graphic enough to be comprehended by auditors who had never read Schiller's play upon which the composition is founded.

There was the wild boisterousness of the half-savage troops pictured at the beginning, and one could identify the sermon of the Capuchin, the point where the soldiery attempt to kill him, the protecting pair of Croats, etc. These touches [illegible] those who desire all possible detail but even for the casual auditor, who is unfamiliar with his Schiller, there was the splendid picture of the camp of the Duke of Friedland, with its semi-barbaric tints, the fierce and coarse legions, and a vivid portrayal of evening, night and morning. Its direct and military picture made a strong appeal to the present-day concert-goer. Such a camp might be imagined even today in Serbia, or Bulgaria.

Naturally the work was read with some tremendous explosions, with trumpet and drum passages, and it began with an explosion as if a powder magazine had blown up. But it was not all of such a war-like character. The soldiers indulged in folk-dances, which gave a most characteristic flavor to this picture of the 20-years war, and made an excellent contrast to that theme of trombones which ought to get the artists an engagement on the Day of Judgment—it was so thundering and powerful. There was also a good contrast when night in camp was pictured, on muted violins with pizzicato accompaniment.

Trumpet fanfares, excellently played, appropriately ushered in the morning, and the troops marched out to a theme hat was again semi-barbaric in character, and the work came to a triumphant close, in fortississississimo.

It was a very exciting composition, excitingly played. It pictured all the blatant, aggressive side of war, without any of its wretchedness. But a real portrayal of the Thirty Years' War (or of the present European misery) would be too pathetic and sorrowful to listen to.

From the
Boston Post
Nov.25,1916.

SOBER WORKS BY SYMPHONY

Haydn, Brahms and Smetana on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

Anton Witek, concert master, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Witek played the Brahms violin concerto. The orchestral pieces were Haydn's symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9) and Smetana's symphonic poem after Schiller, "Wallenstein's Camp." This work was revived after many years by Dr. Muck, and it made the one patch of color which the concert afforded.

The symphony of Haydn is a delightful work, or it would have been delightful if it had not been played by an orchestra twice as large as is good for the music. When this symphony was first performed at one of the Salomon concerts in London the orchestra numbered 40. Allowing for the size of Symphony Hall, it should certainly still be practicable to materially reduce the proportions of the orchestra when a symphony by Haydn or Mozart is played, to the advantage of the composition. If an orchestra can be extended for the performance of a work by Strauss, why, in heaven's name, can it not be reduced for a symphony by Haydn? Nor was the heaviness of the orchestral tone improved by the treatment of the menuet. The menuet was lumpish. We do not believe that just because a minuet is a dance it should be played as if danced by clodhoppers. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was inimitable in this symphony. He did not feel it necessary to take so deliberate a tempo in the first part of the scherzo.

This symphony was probably devised as a background for the concerto of Brahms. Contrast might have been better than background. The coloring of the Brahms concerto is far too sober to shine by contrast after Haydn, for Haydn himself knew some very pretty tricks of orchestration, even if he did not employ a modern orchestra or demand modern sonorities. Consequently the Brahms concerto only sounded more sober than ever. Not that this concerto fails to take rank among the most substantial works for the violin and orchestra. Virtuosi come and go. A Strauss and a Debussy salute the ears. And Brahms is played today more than ever. Yet the concerto, not perhaps Brahms' most lively and ingratiating work, is played, with other of Brahms' compositions, more than ever. But Mr. Witek has given better performances of the violin part—performances when his intonation was purer and his virtuosity was absolutely flawless.

The effect of Smetena's piece, quite old-fashioned so far as its harmony is concerned, and dating back to a period when modern orchestration and the modern symphonic poem were much newer than they are today, was rather astonishing. This music has real vigor, color, and, at moments, imagination. There is the suggestion of the bustle of the camp, rough merry-making, a rather naive and heavy-footed reference to the Capuchin monk, which is nowhere near in suggestive power to D'Indy's treatment of this episode. There is the thought of the pomp and the glory of war, and there is the singular moment which might correspond to that time when Wallenstein himself was conscious of fate knocking at the door, when a premonition told him too truly of the end of his spectacular conquests. This work was very brilliantly played. It might not have been so striking in other surroundings, but as it was it became the stirring moment of the concert.

From the
Herald
Nov. 25, 1916.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE SIXTH CONCERT

Messrs. Witek and Longy Add to Excellence of Entertainment by Solo Performances—Dr. Muck Conducts — Program Will Be Repeated by the Orchestra This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9); Brahms, Violin Concerto; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp." Mr. Witek was the solo violinist.

Smetana's symphonic poem, based on the first part of Schiller's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, had been performed here only once, at a Symphony concert in 1897. The music was composed in 1858-9 when Smetana was living in Sweden. It is not easy to recognize in it the composer of the opera, "The Sold Bride," the first symphonic poem of the Cycle "My Country"—or the string quartet "Aus Meinem Leben." When Smetana wrote his three symphonic poems in Sweden, he was a great admirer of Liszt, but rather as a believer in Liszt's, theories than as an imitating disciple. "Wallenstein's Camp" endeavors to portray in tones the hurly-burly of the camp. The composer's friend Proksch thought that the subject was a fortunate one; that there was rich and varied material in Schiller's work. Smetana, however, was content for the most part with reproducing bustle and din. As a result the symphonic poem suffers from lack of contrasts. What should be relieving episodes have little character.

There is one exception: the section in which the pizzicato of the strings is interrupted by strange harmonies and "meandering phrases"; the section which to Mr. Apthorp suggested night and darkness. Here is true invention, here is fancy. The poem as a whole is commonplace and noisy. Whether it is worth while to put before the public second-rate compositions of men who in later years deservedly won reputation is a question. We like to think of a man's best work and forget that which is inferior. Smetana was most successful when he was celebrating in music his beloved Bohemia, or expressing his own sadness and misery, as in the string quartet.

There are charming pages in the old quartet of Haydn. Guilmant once said to us, Haydn's workmanship, in quartet, oratorio, mass, piano music, whatever he undertook, is always admirable. But there are symphonies by him in which the labor seems perfunctory, the disposition of ideas too cut-and-dried, symphonies of prescription and formulas. There are other symphonies with which we are too familiar. This symphony in C minor had not been heard for 13 years, but not alone for this reason did the music seem fresh and delightful. Surely there are other symphonies by Haydn that would be even less familiar and would afford as much pleasure to the hearer.

No one can say that Brahms's violin concerto has been neglected at these concerts. Mr. Witek himself played it for the second time and as before in a thoughtful and capable manner. Dr. Muck gave him a masterly accompaniment, if the word "accompaniment" can here be allowed, for as in Brahms's first piano concerto the solo instrument is often only one in the ensemble. One of the features of the performance was the beautiful interpretation by Mr. Longy of the oboe solo at the beginning of the second movement.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Dec. 8, 9 will be as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Lisbt, Concerto in A major No. 2 (Ernest Schelling, pianist); Borodin, Ein Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien.; Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

From the Journal
Nov.22,1916.

WITEK TO PLAY BRAHMS NUMBER

Anton Witek is to be soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. The program comprises Haydn's symphony in C minor, Brahms' concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

Seats are now selling on the stage for Kreisler's second recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Carl Friedberg, the distinguished pianist, will play with Mr. Kreisler Cesar Franck's sonata in A major.

Julia Culp, at the concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday, Dec. 3, will offer a very interesting list of songs, and her many admirers will be glad that the program will be devoted entirely to her singing.

From the
Transcript
Nov.21,1916.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

FROM HAYDN TO MR. KREISLER'S INNOVATION

Old Symphonies, Dr. Muck and His Younger Hearers—The Violinist, with Mr. Friedberg Assisting, Departs from the Usual Course of His Programmes and Surpasses Himself in the Playing of a Sonata by Franck—Other Numbers

FEW are the conductors these days who care about stripping their gloriously colored orchestras to the modest requirements of Mozart and Haydn—strings, conventional wood-wind, and a trumpet and horn or two to swell the tone. Many are those of the younger generation who, unable to deny immortal Mozart, yet inwardly feel, and sometimes outwardly remark, that they have "outgrown Haydn." But when Dr. Muck pays his annual tribute to the two great founders of the symphony, the more musically intelligent of this younger generation find that they are growing up to Haydn as well as Mozart, year by year. Some came ready to be bored by the C minor symphony of Haydn at the last pair of symphony concerts, and enjoyed it thoroughly. For it was an obscure one to 1916, and apparently yet another of the innumerable horde, such as Haydn (or Mozart) could cook to order in a minute. But Mozart (and Haydn too) had a way of doing all things musical with spirit and efficiency at all times, and of rising to genius and inspiration always at the most unexpected moments. So, there was many a surprise and many a delight in this C minor Symphony of Friday and Saturday last, and after Dr. Muck has had his half hour with Haydn, there is little left to be said. For he missed nothing in the finely shaded and balanced grace of the slow minuet, which must have been the composer's tempo to the thousandth fraction, so sensitively and perfectly did he (and Mr. Warnke) catch the rhythm. And for all that, it was not a routine minuet by any means. In the Andante, too, the conductor made the most of the composer's exquisite sense of values in the charming process of clothing his theme in delicately embroidered stuffs. Perhaps this movement was less distinctive, as Haydn goes, but the Finale was sportive, rollicking and serious by turns in a way entirely its own. There are no substitutes for Haydn now-a-days, and there is a permanent need of his peculiar kind of surface liveliness in our musical hearts, a need for the supplying of which we have Dr. Muck to thank.

From the Journal
Nov.25,1916.

WITEK PLAYS BRAHMS WORK BRILLIANTLY

Symphony Concert Master Admirably Supported by Orchestra.

This week's soloist at the Symphony concerts is the concert master of the orchestra, Anton Witek, and his selection is the Brahms concerto in D major. At yesterday's performance the audience was most enthusiastic. The enthusiasm had its cause in Mr. Witek's excellent playing and in the uncommonly interesting character of the concerto.

The concert master of the Boston Symphony Orhestra is always an enviable figure in the musical world. Mr Witek has held this high position for six years, all the while commanding respect for his pre-eminently artistic aims and for his skill as a violinist. He has the innate dignity and sincerity of the true artist. Moreover, he has mastered violin technic, and his conquest of the difficult passages marking the first and last movements of the concerto was no less impressive than the beauty of tone with which he invested his performance of the haunting theme of the middle, lyrical movement.

The orchestra also performed beautifully, and deserved to share yesterday's ovation with the soloist.

Dr. Muck conducted a graceful performance of Haydn's symphony in C minor—a work whose suave melodies will probably endure long after most of the sensational tone puzzles of the present day have been forgotten—and an equally admirable performance of Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," a graphic, picturesque composition long absent from these concerts.

Next week the orchestra will be out of town. At the concerts on Dec. 8 and 9 the program will comprise Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien," Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and Liszt's concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra; with Ernest Schelling as soloist.

From the Traveler
Nov.20,1916.

PENSION CONCERT DRAWS BIG HOUSE

The first of the pair of pension fund concerts of the Symphony Orchestra given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, drew a big house. The concert afforded one of those altogether too rare opportunites of watching Dr. Muck lead his peerless band through a program of popular music. As was to have been expected, the audience was decidedly enthusiastic. The Tschaikowsky symphony afforded an opportunity of seeing the conductor and hearing the orchestra in music of more serious vein. It was received with enthusiasm.

om PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

Nov.17,1916.

e.....

THE SCHELLING CONCERTO

A Slip Corrected and a Criticism Resented by a Relative

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—The omniscience and ubiquity of our "Peggy Shippen" are the glory of her friends and the despair of her enemies—if she has any. Among the former, the writer of this article wishes always to be remembered. But even Homer nods, and there is danger in things seen and heard vicariously.

In Monday's PUBLIC LEDGER, to quote "Peggy Shippen's" own choice words in reference to the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, I find the following:

> Occasionally one does "get left," as did the sad audience of November 3. As the enthusiasts came out that afternoon and scattered among common mortals like myself it was amusing to note the puzzled look on their faces. They all wished to be loyal to the orchestra, and especially to its leader. They would have liked to stand up for Ernest Schelling's work, too. Many had met him at Bar Harbor and other places, and they tried hard to find palliatives and to disguise the bald fact that they had had an awful afternoon.

Now, in justice to Mr. Stokowski, it is fair to say that the program of November 3 was made up of compositions of the following authors: Brahms, Schumann and Korsakow. On the Monday afternoon previous, October 30, the Boston Orchestra gave a concert in the same building, the Academy of Music, at which was performed by Mr. Kreisler a concerto recently written by Ernest Schelling. Many things have been said concerning the power of music, but never until now has any one heard of an effect so stupendous that the result of a concert given on Monday evening sent a different audience away with "puzzled looks" after an "awful afternoon" the following Saturday.

It may interest lovers of music to know that the concerto which was performed by Mr. Kreisler with the Boston Orchestra on October 30 was written at his request by Ernest Schelling last summer, Mr. Kreisler making suggestions from time to time in the course of the composition. The concerto was offered to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and accepted at once by Doctor Muck. Thus composed at the request of the greatest of our contemporary violinists and accepted by what is, as yet, the greatest of our American orchestras, the work has been performed at half a dozen musical and nonmusical cities—Boston, Providence, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia. The work, as performed by Mr. Kreisler, has been uniformly successful, even in Philadelphia eliciting no less than six or seven calls for Mr. Kreisler. It has been alluded to variously as "a composition exceedingly rich in melodic and technical brilliancy" and as "something new and something masterful born in our American music literature," to mention only one or two opinions. Opinion in art is a matter of taste where it is not a matter of want of it.

Can it be that our "Peggy Shippen" has taken her notions concerning music from some uninformed source, signed "F. something or other W.," and its bolstering letter of approbation, anonymously signed "Veritas"?

Thanking you for your valuable space, I sign my name in full.

FELIX E. SCHELLING.
Philadelphia, November 14, 1916.

EVENING SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

annot be leased.

MISTAKE IN SYMPHONY AD.

Announcement, Through Error, Appeared A Week Too Soon.

Through a mistake made in THE SUN office last night, an advertisement to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Susan Millar as soloist, would appear at the Lyric tonight, was printed in two of the early issues. As a result, readers of the paper in the counties were puzzled, it having been announced before that the concert would not take place until next Wednesday night. THE SUN greatly regrets this error. The Orchestra will appear, as originally scheduled, next Wednesday night.

[46]

News

Springfield, Mass.

NOV 4 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SUPERB PROGRAM

Laeta Hartley Is Soloist of Concert of Rare Pleasure in the Auditorium

It is a wonderful satisfaction to go to a concert with the feeling in advance that there will be nothing disappointing; more wonderful still is it to come away from a concert without having this feeling shattered, or even disturbed, to say nothing of having it destroyed. One goes to the Boston symphony concert with the highest of expectations and emerges from the experience with anticipations practically always realized. Such was our experience again last evening when the orchestra under the scholarly Dr Muck gave the second concert in the Ellis series in the Auditorium. The program called it "City hall." Surely this was merely program errata, for "Auditorium" is the official name of the building, although some would have preferred to tack on the name "City hall" when discussion was animated over the christening of the noble structure.

The audience was large last evening, it was reverently attentive, and it was splendidly appreciative of the ever impeccable work of the orchestra which never seems to suffer from too much or too little temperament. Such a body of musicians which includes several soloists of marked talents and special accomplishments might be expected to occasionally stray from the path of musical rectitude through the tendency of the solo player to spread his wings—figuratively speaking—in the ensemble; but this is not a sin of the symphony. The traditions and the training of years tend to dissipate any such tendency that might exist. It seems almost idle, quite superfluous, to pay extended tribute to the orchestra, the merits of which are so well known and so thoroughly placed in the artistic category that excessive adulation becomes a puny compliment indeed.

Let us suffice to say that the orchestra in the long years of its honorable history has never done more superb work than under the calm, dispassionate, but erudite direction of Dr Muck. For the program last evening Dr Muck chose the "Rhenish" symphony of Schumann with which to begin, and it was an extraordinary beautiful rendition of a lovely work that was given. The various movements melting into each other so harmoniously were brought out by the orchestra with telling effect at all times, each a perfect part of a whole that gave the large audience an insight into the Schumann symphony which left nothing whatever to be desired. One might well say that the orchestra plays the "Rhenish" composition con amore, but then this appears to be what the sterling organization does with everything that it essays. If it has more symphony with one composer than another it never betrays that fact.

Following the symphony the soloist of the evening, Laeta Hartley, making her Springfield debut, played the Tschaikowsky concerto and although inviting comparison by the performance of a familiar work Miss Hartley distinguished herself by a most praiseworthy performance of the concerto, into which she read the proper spirit and in which she made a pronouncedly favorable impression, the audience rewarding her with spontaneous and prolongued applause. Miss Hartley is apparently a young pianist who has a very definite future and that she will go far seemed to be the sincere consensus of opinion of those who heard her last evening. Only the "no encore" rule of the symphony prevented another exhibition of her playing.

The orchestra closed the program with an excellent presentation of the Liszt symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," the rendition of which was a fitting close to a program of such excellence as only the Boston symphony gives.

From the Globe
Dec.1,1916.

SYMPHONY AT NEW YORK

"Scheherazade" Delights Audience Under Direction of Dr Muck—Schumann Number Also Played

NEW YORK, Nov 30—The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third appearance of the season this evening in Carnegie Hall.

The program, arranged by Dr Muck, the conductor, comprising but two numbers, a Schumann symphony and the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, had caused considerable comment due to its makeup. New York is more than familiar with the suite because of its frequent presentation in the last year by the Russian ballet. It has been suggested that perhaps the eminent Boston leader is trying to "show up" the ballet, inasmuch as on his last appearance here he played "Till Eulenspiegel," which the Russians were than turning into a dance feature, and next Saturday's Boston program includes still another ballet diversion, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

There was a good deal of sameness this evening to the program, but the "Scheherazade" was so remarkably well done that it banished thoughts of the ballet, and the symphony was restful enough to give a welcome dessert to the day's doings. The orchestra was loudly applauded and forced twice to

From the Pawtucket TIMES
Nov.22,1916.

NEW SOLOIST HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Susan Miller Makes First Providence Appearance With Orchestra.

A new symphony and a new soloist furnished the charm of novelty at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening, and the element of curiosity prevailed strongly in the audience before the programme opened. The symphony was Chausson's work in B-flat, completed in 1890, but never before played in Providence, and Miss Susan Millar, mezzo-soprano, was the soloist.

The programme complete was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, Chausson; aria from "Vologesco," Rinaldo di Capua; "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," Brahms; three songs with orchestra, (a) "Die Nacht," (b) Morgan," (c) "Heimliche Aufforderung," R. Strauss; overture to "The Corsair," Berlioz.

Chausson's symphony, completed nine years before the tragic death of the French composer in a bicycle accident, had to wait for a presentation by a German conductor before it was "revealed to the Parisian public," as the programme book quotes Pierre de Breville. It had been performed in 1891 and in 1892 in Paris, but was never really recognized by the French public until Arthur Nikisch and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra presented it in the city in 1897. Its first performance in the United States was by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia in 1905, 15 years after it was completed.

It is modern in the highest degree, but its classic beauties, particularly in the first and third of the three movements are worthy of the greatest traditions of symphonic art. While failing to win the applause usually bestowed by Providence audiences on the more familiar of the great symphonies it achieved adequate recognition at the close. It was magnificently played by the full orchestra and given a powerful interpretation by Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor. Mr. Schmidt directed the orchestra in the absence of Dr. Muck, who is incapacitated by a severe cold.

Miss Millar, the soloist, is a young woman of charming appearance, with a voice of flexible beauty and a musical sense dominated by the most exquisite taste. She selected as her opening number a recitative and aria from the Rinaldo di Capua's opera of the early 18th century, "Vologesco re de Parti." Just why this beautiful work has been so thoroughly neglected by singers is a mystery to the audience which heard Miss Millar last evening, and to say that the applause bestowed on her was a tribute to the music as well as to the singer is no detraction. Her second number was a group of there songs by Richard Strauss, "Morning," "Night" and "Secret Invitation." All were charmingly rendered, and insistent recalls rewarded the singer.

The variations on the theme by Josef Haydn, by Brahms, and "The Corsair" overture by Berlioz were the other orchestra numbers. Both were of course finely played, the orchestra giving a stirring rendition of the final number.

The third concert of the symphony series will be played Dec. 26, in Infantry Hall, when the soloist will be Irma Seydel, violinist.

From the N.Y. SUN
Dec.1,1916,

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT CONCERT

Schumann's Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" Given.

The second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck disclosed himself in a new light as a programme maker by inviting his audience to listen to only two compositions, namely, Schumann's E flat symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's suite "Scheherazade." The melodious "Rhenish" symphony of Schumann is not played now as frequently as it used to be in earlier days, and perhaps it might be given a little oftener. But there is much new matter to be considered, and most of it calls for more profound examination than this fluent and songlike work.

As for Rimsky-Korsakov's suite, we have indeed not lacked performances of that. We have heard its measures at the same time as we have observed the extraordinary doings of Adolf Bolm and Flora Revalles together with numerous other members of the celebrated Ballet Russe. These doings have occasioned much debate. The composer undertook to illustrate certain incidents in the Thousand and One Nights, while the ballet dealt with very different matters. Hence the jarring of the sects.

Last evening, at any rate, there was no call for dispute. The music was heard in all its original beauty, played by an orchestra which brought out its colors in all their brilliancy. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the organization, performed the solos excellently. The audience seemed to be entirely pleased.

From the N.Y. TRIBUNE
Dec.1.1916.

MUSICAL TREATS ON THANKSGIVING

New York Hears Opera and Symphony That Consecrate Holiday

"PARSIFAL" CHORUS GIVES REAL DELIGHT

Carnegie Hall Audience Finds Reason to Thank New England

By H. E. KREHBIEL

The days which are devoted to a performance of "Parsifal" every season at the Metropolitan Opera House come very near to exemplifying the cumbersome definition which Wagner gave his religious drama. On no other occasion is a lyric drama listened to by so devout a congregation; on no other occasion does the meeting so nearly resemble a festival of consecration. A pity that the pious devotion is not permitted to extend over other days and include other dramas!

"Parsifal" was performed yesterday very much as it has been performed on days set apart for it in former years and with many of the same people—all of those, in fact, concerned with the principal parts. And, as on all the preceding occasions, it was worthy of record that the audience which filled the large theatre was peculiarly intent upon the musical evangel which was proclaimed, peculiarly appreciative of its solemn beauties peculiarly indifferent to the outward things which on ordinary occasions are associated with the opera.

New Singers in Chorus.

There were new singers in the chorus of Flower Girls, and as a consequence some of those evidences of new and fresh study which opera, more than any form of drama, must have periodically, if it is not to sink into a rut of dull conventionality. The principal representations of the Flower maidens were Edith Mason, Mabel Garrison Marie Sundelius, Lenora Suarks, Vera Curtis and Flora Perini, and their delightful singing and graceful acting, like that of the whole chorus of women, recalled the moment when one of the leading musicians of Germany sat with the writer of this record and, suddenly grasping the back of the seat in front of him, remarked:

"Eh! now we have something different& Here is atmosphere and peotry&"

And no wonder; he had known only the flower maidens of Bayreuth—German women to whom Wagner's costumer had sought to give floral charm by dressing them in what the foreign critics of that day called "penwipers"—gaudy hued skirts cut with scallops.

Yesterday's audience were made conscious of all the poetry and atmosphere which captivated Mr. Weingartner, for the whole scene was beautifully sung and acted. And after a compliment to Mme. Kurt for the way in which she also sang in this scene, and Mr. Sembach for his attention to some of the principles of song which German singers are forgetting more and more every day (which fact they will soon regret) we close this record of one of Thanksgiving Day's musical offerings.

Festival from New England

For the second we know not exactly how to clothe our feelings. The festival of yesterday came from New England, and so did the orchestra that gave a concert in Carnegie Hall in the evening. Can and ought we to be profoundly grateful that while we spend twice or thrice as much money every year on our symphony organizations as does Major Higginson, and while we have twice or thrice as many capable musicians as Boston, we must yet wait for the coming of the Boston men, with Dr. Muck at their head, to hear a symphony played as Schumann's "Rheinish" was played last night—with such buoyancy of rhythmical stride, such fresh onwardness, such natural melodic flow, such clarity of communal tone, such euphony, such easy energy which is of the essence of repose, as marked the performance last night? Was it an occasion of thanksgiving?

Dr. Muck was merciful to those who had dined after the old New England fashion in making a programme of only two numbers—the symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," and, no doubt, he meant well and pleased the multitude of native New Englanders in his audience, but there were some old New Yorkers who mayhap he made to sigh heavy-heartedly because he played so well.

From the Transcript.
Nov.18,1916.

Dr. Muck has chosen the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Dec. 22 and Saturday evening, Dec. 23, for the repetition of his eloquent performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" that stirred his hearers eighteen months ago. This time, the measures at the end for men's choir will be sung by a contingent of the Choral Music Society, with Mr. Arthur Hackett, who distinguished himself at the September "Pops," for the tenor solo.

From the N.Y. HERALD
Dec,1,1916.

Boston Orchestra Revives Spirit of "Scheherazade"

Dr. Muck and His Men Make Rimsky-Korsakoff's Music Different from Russian Ballet.

There was a great crowd in Carnegie Hall last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The holiday could not make any difference at the box office, for at each concert of the orchestra the house is sold out. It did make a difference, though, in the attitude of the audience, which had a feeling of thankfulness for the privilege of hearing such perfect playing, but also a feeling of disappointment that half of the programme should have been devoted to Rimsky-Korsakoff's hackneyed "Scheherazade," whose welcome has been worn almost threadbare by the Russian Ballet.

To many the name has come to suggest the wildest kind of orgy, a mad, whirling confusion. No wonder that Mme. Kimsky-Korsakoff uttered a vehement protest against the disarrangement by the Russian Ballet of her husband's music. But she would have been satisfied with Dr. Karl Muck's interpretation, for his restraining influence soon dispelled any unseemly illusions not called for by the music. Perhaps Dr. Muck felt New York needed to be set right, but it is probable tha pride governed his choice; for "Scheherazade" is one of the most effective numbers in his repertoire for disclosing the virtuosity of his orchestra.

The orchestra was more effective than ever last night. Anton Witek's solo violin was wonderfully brilliant and called to mind, as the theme should, the queenly narrator of thrilling tales rather than the dancing figure of a harem favorite. The wood winds, in the sea and Sindbad motives, were as refreshing as a whiff of salt air. As usual, Dr. Muck obtained the most piquant rhythmic effects. Bakst, with all his riot of paint, never achieved anything more brilliant than did Dr. Muck in his orchestral coloring of the second and fourth movements. The song like melody in the third movement was played with delightful tenderness. One ought not, in an orchestra where balance of tone is so carefully preserved and each instrument is so perfect in its own way, single out any instrument for special recognition. Yet flutes, clarinets, first violins and 'cello were so unsurpassingly beautiful that they ought to be mentioned. The audience was unusually enthusiastic. After the movement of the Kalandar Prince, Dr. Muck shared the applause with the orchestra.

The other half of the programme was devoted to Schumann's Smyphony in E flat. It, too, gave the orchestra an excellent opportunity to display its brilliance, especially in the gay movement of the Rhenish festival. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the solemn cathedral scene was of rare beauty. The virile quality of its religious fervor ought to serve as a standard for future readings. Certainly Josef Stransky, who was sitting in a first tier box with Franz Kneisel and Willem Willeke, found it of absorbinw interest. The audience, though, liked the third movement best. Clarinets, bassoons and Mr. Ferir's viola played its tender melody with much tonal loveliness.

At the end of the symphony the applause was so great that Dr. Muck was obliged to come out four times. Finally, putting his hand affectionately on Mr. Witek's shoulder, he made the orhestra rise to share the applause.

From the Traveler
Dec.2,1916.

Schelling for Soloist at Symphony

Pianist Will Play Liszt Concerto at Next Week's Concerts.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

Ernest Schelling, pianist, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts, playing Liszt's Second Concerto. The program will be: Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor; Liszt, Concerto in A major, No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien"; and Weber's Overture, "Euryanthe."

At her concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Julia Culp will offer the following program:

1.—Der Jungling and der Tod, Der Fluss, Des Fischers Liebesgluck, Andenken ..... Schubert
2.—Nuit d'Etoiles ..... Debussy
La chere maison ..... Jacques-Dalcroze
Nuit d'Espagne ..... J. Massenet
Petite fleur des bois ..... Massini
3.—Komm wir wandeln, Im Lenz, In der Mondnacht, Veilchen ..... P. Cornelius
4.—Nicht mehr zu dir zu gehen, Wenn du nur zuweilen lachelst, Standchen, Von ewiger Liebe ..... Brahms [illegible]ny Concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program is: Haydn's Symphony in C minor, No. 9; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"; Liszt, Concerto in A major, No. 2, for piano and orchestra, and Berlioz, Overture to "The Corsair." Ernest Schelling, pianist, will be the soloist.

From the Journal
Dec.2,1916.

CESAR FRANCK SYMPHONY TO BE PERFORMED

Dr. Muck Arranges Another Big Program—Schelling to Be Soloist.

Dr. Muck has been making this year a most remarkable series of programs. The program which he has made for the coming week, Friday afternoon, Dec. 8, and Saturday evening, Dec. 9, is no exception to the rule.

The symphony will be that of Cesar Franck in D minor. This has come to be generally regarded as one of the noblest works in modern symphonic literature, and Dr. Muck conducts it con amore. Under him it has taken its place with the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms in having a performance every other year.

The second part of the program contains a work which will be to all intents and purposes a novelty, Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien." This has not been played here since the season of 1902-03. It is short, full of color and atmosphere.

Both of these works were on the famous San Francisco fair programs.

The soloists will be Ernest Schelling, the pianist and composer, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A major. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture will complete the program.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. The program reads: Haydn's Symphony in C minor, No. 9; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp;" Liszt, Concerto in A-Major, No. 2, for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, Overture to "The Corsair." Ernest Schelling will be the soloist.

From the N.Y. AMERICAN
Dec.1,1916.

CONTRASTS IN CONCERT ADD TO DELIGHT

Boston Symphony Artists Divide Evening Between Exotic Orientalism of "Scheherazade" and Serene, Lofty Melody of Schumann "Rhenish."

THOUGH the programme of the Boston Symphony concert last night was brief in numbers, it was a full evening of delight. Only two selections were given. They were Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade."

Previous to the first visit of the Diaghileff Russian ballet, "Scheherazade" was a favorite programme piece, all-sufficient to convey to the mental eye a series of Arabian Nights' stories as told by the favorite wife of the Sultan. The Russian dancers, however, twisted and turned the fanciful Slavic measures to suit an Oriental pantomime vastly different in character and design from the composer's intention.

Last night Dr. Muck restored the suite to its original purpose, that of a collection of distinctive and highly colored romantic tales.

The several clearly marked episodes, the essence of which is Russian folk music, were delightfully given. In musical texture, import and general significance it sounded the other extreme from Schumann's impressive symphony. On the one hand was the curious exotic measures highly embellished with Orientalism; on the other the pure, serene melody lofty in outline, reposeful in quality.

The orchestra was in excellent form, the fine tonal color of the string choirs adding materially to the attractive interpretations of Dr. Muck.

The audience was enormous, standees plentiful and enthusiasm

[47]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From the
TRANSCRIPT
Dec. 2, 1916.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck's Programme—Mme. Çulp Anev—Mme. Leginska and Mr. Copeland fo Pianists—Assorted Chamber Music-Minor Singers and Virtuosi, with Many Novel Piece in Their Programmes—A Abounding List

OUTSIDE a single number, familia music fills Dr. Muck's programme fo the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening i Symphony Hall, viz.: Franck's symphony in D minor, the crown of his work and a perennial masterpiece in which conductor and orchestra have more than once proved their eloquence; Liszt's concerto in A major, the second, less familiar, and more finely grained of the pair; and Weber's richly romantic overture to his opera "Euryanthe." The novel piece is Borodin's Oriental tone-picture of the Asiatic steppe, vivid and atmospheric music newly restored to the active repertory of the Symphonic Orchestra but played here within a month at the performances of the Russian Ballet. In the concerto, Mr. Schelling, a notable pianist as well as the composer he has chosen to be of late to his Bostonian hearers, will play the solo part.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck at Harvard College in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, Mr. Schelling will also be heard in this second concerto of Liszt. The purely orchestral items of the programme are Haydn's symphony in C minor; Smetana's tone-picture, "Wallenstein's Camp" and Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair"—all recent additions to the repertory of the orchestra.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 22, in Symphony Hall, the ninth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck when they will repeat their eloquent performance of Liszt's Faust Symphony, with the assistance of a men's choir from the Choral Art Society and Mr. Arthur Hackett, tenor. Mr. Paderewski will also be heard for the first time here in Schumann's concerto for piano.

Saturday evening, Dec. 23, in Symphony Hall, the ninth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with the programme and the assistance already noted.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 29, in Symphony Hall, the tenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck.

Saturday evening, Dec. 16, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with Miss Gerhardt, the singer, assisting.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 15, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Gerhardt for the assisting singer.

om NORTH AMERICAN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.
PHILADELPHIA, NOV 26

METROPOLITAN TO DO 'SAMSON' ON TUESDAY

Caruso and Homer Will Sing Title Roles in Saint-Saens Opera

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Philadelphia Orchestra Still on Tour; Alma Gluck to Give Recital

The principal events on the musical calendar for this week are the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow night and the performance of "Samson et Dalila," Saint-Saens's opera, by the Metropolitan Company, of New York, on Tuesday evening.

This fine French opera has not been heard in this city for several seasons. Caruso and Louise Homer will head the cast in the two title roles, and others will be De Luca, Rothier, Bloch, Schlegel, Reschiglian and Audisio. Rosina Galli will lead the ballet and Polacco will conduct.

* * *

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage.

Miss Millar will sing as her first number the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and as her second number three songs by Richard Strauss, with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss, and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program in its entirety follows:

Brahms ..... Symphony in C Minor, No. 1
Tschaikowsky Air, "Adieux les Forets" (Joan of Arc)
Berlioz ..... Overture to "The Corsair"
R. Strauss ..... Three songs with orchestra
(a) "Die Nacht."
(b) "Morgen."
(c) "Heimliche Aufforderung."
R. Strauss ..... "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

* * *

Journal
Providence, R. I.
NOV 19 1916

CHAUSSONS SYMPHONY.

Aanalysis of Work to be Played Here on Tuesday.

The following analysis of Chausson's symphony in B-flat, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening, will be of interest to those to whom the work is new:

"The symphony is fully scored for complete modern orchestra, with four horns, four trombones, bass clarinet, English horn, two harps, tuba, three kettle drums, with the usual strings. It begins softly, an introductory elegiac phrase with strings, horn and clarinet, with a soft rich answer, colored and enriched by the brass pianissimo. The French horn is then heard in a short sentence, softly answered by solo trumpets and trombones. But soon the movement quickens—agitated and suggestive, almost aggravating, motives lead rapidly to a grand fortissimo, with screaming flutes and violins in the highest register, with noisy brass and the loud roll of the kettle drums which lingers diminuendo until the pleasant twang of the harp ushers in a graceful waltz, first offered by bassoon and horn, and later developed with great artistry by other instruments and by the full orchestra with the harps in contrary motion. This movement is full of charming nuance, rich tone color, fascinating motion phrases, rich contrapuntal embroiderings and plaintive melody of almost oriental sense, contrasted with heroic grandeur and massive tone sculpture.

"In the second part one meets with sustained and intense expressions of solemn beauty which recall Sibelius in some of his symphonic utterances and Brahms in its purity of classic thought. It must be heard many times before it can be appreciated, and is a work for the musician and the classicist and in no sense popular or easily understood.

"The last movement is extremely animated and hastens in tempo as the surging insistent theme sternly presses forward, only to make way for a fully scored 'strophe' of decisive and clean-cut proportions, introducing a new motive, which is repeated in another key, to give way to the oboe solo, which sings a plaintive imitation to an accompaniment of weaving strings and trembling flutes. This is repeated by the clarinet, and the phrase subsides almost mysteriously until a hopping, almost grotesque figure of the violins and violas, springs out of the gloom, as it were, and is heard at intervals by the various choirs of the orchestra. After an impressive climax the symphony ends piano, with the impressive and suggestive phrase, with which the symphony began, played this time by the basses, 'cellos and bassoon.

"It is in this last movement that the composer shows his national spirit and strongly reflects the interesting and unique characteristics of modern French music, and for that reason is worthy of further study. Contemporaneous French composers cannot keep away from them any more than the Spanish can from their bolero or the Russians from their own peculiar folk songs. But, to de-

HERALD
ss: Washington, D. C.
NOV

EXCELLENT PROGRAM BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck Director and Miss Millar Soloist at National.

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a program of unusual interest and diversity yesterday afternoon to a large audience at the National Theater.

The soloist was Susan Millar, a young mezzo-soprano, with an exquisitely soft and rich voice of an appealing quality, but lacking in the penetrating characteristics that distinguish great voices. Miss Millar sang Tschaikowsky's "Adieu, forets" from "Jeanne d'Arc" and three lovely songs by Richard Strauss, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Secret Invitation." In these last Miss Millar was especially pleasing.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Chausson Symphony in B flat major was the perfection of art. Such precision, keen appreciation of the value of dynamics, splendid climaxes and continued atmosphere of mood, in this cultured delineation of the human emotions of joy, grief, religious calm and majestic triumph, made the rendition of this lovely symphony a memorable event.

Brahm's interesting "Variations" on a theme of Josef Haydn, Opus 56, was included in the program, which closed with "Mazeppa," a symphonic poem by Liszt.

It was easy to follow the story of the wild dash of the tortured horse, Mazeppa's despair and final triumph throughout the music, but probably Liszt regarded the poem as allegorical of the philosophy that out of pain comes growth and lasting joy.

The orchestra gave this composition a most excellent interpretation. Dr. Muck, a model of dignity and calmness, achieves splendid effects at all times.

M. J. S.

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday evening brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and again it will bring to Providence its entire personnel. The extension of the stage worked out admirably at the first concert. Not only was it good to hear the full choir of the celebrated strings, but the acoustics of the hall were actually improved and never has a concert sounded more brilliantly.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is one of very great interest. It contains something new to Providence, a symphony, and the soloist will also be a newcomer. The symphony is by Ernest Chausson, a man whose untimely death 25 years ago undoubtedly deprived the world of a great genius. The symphony had its first performance in this country in November 1905, in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the distinguished French composer, Vincent d'Indy, who was here as a guest of the orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts. The same season it was played in Boston under the direction of Mr. Gericke. A few years ago it was played in New York by the New York Symphony Orchestra. This year Dr. Muck revived it, playing it with much success in Boston, New York and various other cities of the East. It is a work notable for the wealth of melodic invention. It is full of color and is in no sense one of those cryptic works characteristic of French music of to-day.

The soloist will be Susan Millar, who comes fresh from the teaching of Mme. Marcella Sembrich, for a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony. She will appear twice, singing an exquisite old Italian aria by Rinaldo da Capua and three songs with orchestra by Richard Strauss, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung."

The other numbers on the program will be Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn and Berlioz's "The Corsair" Overture. The program in its entirety is as follows: Symphony in B-flat, Chausson; Aria from "Vologesco," Rinaldo da Capua; Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Brahms; three songs with orchestra, "Die Nacht," "Morgen," "Heimliche Aufforderung," R. Strauss; Overture to "The Corsair," Berlioz.

SUSAN MILLAR.
Mezzo-Soprano, Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
ess: New York City
DEC 2 - 1916

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert

Dr. Muck und die Bostoner erschienen uns vorgestern Abend in Carnegie Hall wieder als die reinsten Freudenspender. Das Programm umfaßte nur zwei Nummern, die auf den ersten Blick etwas sonderbar zusammengekoppelt erschienen, doch gab der Erfolg dem Dirigenten recht, denn selten hat ein verwöhntes, intelligentes Publikum ein musikalisches Dankfagungs-Menu ehrlicher genossen als gestern, als es Rimsky-Korsakoff's „Scheherazade"-Suite nach Schumanns „Rheinischer" Symphonie vorgesetzt erhielt.

Die Schumann'sche Dritte besitzt weder die quellende Frische seiner Ersten, des poetischen Frühlingsgedichts, noch den idealen Schwung der Zweiten, im Zeichen des Kampfes und Sieges stehende, dafür bringt sie auf dem realeren Boden des Volkstümlichen ganz exquisite malerische Werte. Schumann schrieb dieses Werk unter den frischen Impulsen, die er, als städtischer Musikdirektor nach Düsseldorf versetzt, von den fröhlichen Rheinlanden erhielt. Das großartige Werk atmet in allen seinen Teilen die Ursprünglichkeit und Frische neuer Eindrücke und Ideen, und der heiter-populäre Charakter des Ganzen, sowie der schöne Kontrast zwischen Großartigem und Behaglichen hat sich bis heute seinen vollen Reiz bewahrt. Dr. Muck dirigierte die Symphonie ganz groß. Er rückte den zweiten Satz mit seiner graziösen Volkstümlichkeit und seinem reinen Behagen in wirksamstem Gegensatz zu den großen Konturen des ersten mit seiner feurigen Leidenschaftlichkeit. Er gestaltete den an Mendelssohn gemahnenden, träumerischen dritten Satz mit feinster Zartheit und milderte die massive-feierliche Instrumentation des pompösen vierten Satzes mit fein abwägender Hand. Ich möchte die düstere, gelegentlich fast unheimliche Färbung dieses „Feierlich" überschriebenen Satzes, wo bei Schumann die weihevollen kirchlichen Zeremonien anläßlich der Kardinalserhebung des damaligen Kölner Bischofs von Geißel im Sinne hatte, genial anmutend nennen. In dem mächtig aufgebauten Finale stand wieder das gutgelaunte, humoristische, lebenslustige Rheinland deutlich vor uns.

In der „Scheherazade"-Suite erschlossen uns die Bostoner den ganzen „Tausend und eine Nacht"-Klangzauber ihres Orchesters. Man könnte ganze Seiten schreiben, wollte man diese Wunder an Wohllaut, Zauber und Duft, diese ganze geistvolle Virtuosität schildern, ohne daß man alles erschöpfen würde. Da wo ein jeder Mann ein Virtuose, wie denn das ganze Orchester einem Riesenvirtosen vergleichbar war. Der sehnsuchtsvoll klagenden, schwelgerischen Sologeige von Konzertmeister Anton Witek muß aber doch ganz speziell gedacht werden. In diesen wie Improvisation, wie glühende Rhapsodie anmutenden Klängen, die sich wie ein Band durch die verschiedenen farbigen Stimmungsbilder schlangen, konnte man den ganzen mystisch-bunten Orient erblicken. Die übrigen Virtuosen müssen sich mit einem begeisterten Kollektivlob begnügen. Dr. Muck schwelgte in seinen glühendsten Farben. Der Beifall wurde jedesmal zur Ovation.

TIMES
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Excellent Rendition of Works by Sibelius, Smetana and Chabrier—Susan Millar the Soloist.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave a most liberal and varied program of modern music.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 1, E Minor, is a large and delightful composition, full of beautiful themes and with plenty of orchestral color throughout; though in parts, if it had not been played with such perfect understanding, it might have appeared disjointed. The clarinets and flutes stood out by reason of the exquisite rendering of their parts. The last movement is very fine, with a rather remarkable manner of ending, as if the composer had told his story in a very brilliant way and then ended simply with the words, "I have spoken." The audience, which completely filled the Academy, received it with much enthusiasm, and the applause was so abundant that Dr Muck, after being called repeatedly, had to have the entire orchestra acknowledge the greeting with him.

Tschaikowsky's "Air des Adieux" was sung by the soloist of the evening, Miss Susan Millar. To sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, indeed, an honor, and whether Miss Millar felt the distinction too keenly or whether her voice was too small to carry over a large orchestra, it is not yet time to say. But we trust it was the former, for Miss Millar is young and charming, and her voice has a fine tone. Her interpretation of the Strauss songs, "Die Nacht," "Morgen," "Secret Invitation," followed the symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana, which was not as interesting as the rest of the program.

The Debussy Prelude, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," last heard here as accompaniment to one of the Russian Ballet's concoctions, is a dainty fantasy, and to say that it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enough, but the Rhapsody "Espana," by Chabrier, is not to be so easily disposed of. To hear Dr. Muck direct it is a thing never to be forgotten—without any more perceptible movement than in conducting an andante, and without the floating motion of arms and hands that some very well-known and able musicians affect, he conducted with all the brilliancy and scintillating rhythm that could be desired by the most seductive of Spanish dancers, and raised a light composition to the more serious level of the rest of his program.

It was a brilliant concert, splendidly performed.

m AMERICAN
ress: New York City

Boston Orchestra Scores New Triumph.

By MAX SMITH.

Brahm's Symphony in C minor, as played yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, would have made the second matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a notable occasion. This even without the delights provided by a programme which included Smetana's unfamiliar symphonic poem, "Valdstynuv Tabor" ("Wallenstein's Lager"), Debussys Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody, "Espana."

The visiting organization, guided and stimulated by its distinguished leader, gave a performance of the German master's first symphony which not only served to display in the brightest light the powers of this incomparable body of musicians but cast a halo about the work itself.

In view of the fact that Dr. Muck won his first success in New York as an interpreter of Brahms and yesterday once more achieved such impressive results with the same composer, it seems remarkable he has never been known in his fatherland as a "Brahmsianer." Yet perhaps that is the very reason why this disciple of Wagner gives such stirring readings of Brahms's symphonies.

Your dyed-in-the-wool Brahms specialists are too apt to treat the music of this great melodist with the coldly dissecting hand of a surgeon.

Evidently it was Dr. Muck's intention yesterday to throw absolute music and programme music into sharp contrast. It must be confessed that the former, with its undefined yet glowing undertow of emotional life, carried off the victory.

Within the latter class of composition, however, the conductor also had drawn striking distinctions. What a gulf lies between Smetana's sonorous and emphatically dramatic tone-poem, setting forth the military life in the first part of Schiller's "Wallenstein" trilogy, and Debussy's chiaroscuro picture—so exquisitely painted—of the dreamy imaginings of a Faun. And how conspicuous, too, is the difference between Debussy's impressionistic canvas and his countryman, Chabrier's, vivid and exhilarating elaboration of Spanish dance rythms.

[48]

m HERALD
lress: New York City

e

GIRL SMOKES AS REVERED BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Fair Music Devotee Sets Advanced Style and Makes Brahms and Tobacco Chums.

There is no telling where the feminist movement will lead. Little by little women are usurping all the rights of men. Only yesterday afternoon in the staid "high brow" atmosphere of a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, a woman was seen smoking in the lobby with the men.

It was in the east corridor where, between the numbers of the programme, men of the orchestra and their friends from the audience, men and women, had gone to talk over a Brahms symphony which had just been played. The corridor was so crowded that with difficulty a young woman, modestly dressed, with a lighted cigarette held now in her hand behind her back, manlike, and now in her mouth, walked back and forth puffing with all of the enjoyment that one experiences after having deprived one's self of a smoke through three-quarters of an hour of music. She was accompanied by a young man, and together they chatted gayly, unmindful of the stares from the women and the smiles from the men in their vicinity.

Smoking among women has become so general that it arouses no comment in restaurants and cafés. It is seen even in the lobbies of certain hotels where there are sheltered seats and in the theatres where refreshments are served at tables between the acts—not to mention in taxicabs. But so far without a place to sit a "perfect lady" has hesitated to open her silver cigarette case in public.

But now that the concert halls have been invaded what is to prevent further expansion of women's smoking rights? It is only one step from the lobby to the street. Next season, perhaps, the after dinner cigarette may be transferred to the street, and what is to prevent women from smoking as they stroll up Fifth avenue of an afternoon?

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY STIRRINGLY PLAYED

Brahms' first symphony, which was performed last season with sensational results by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its Thursday night patrons, was played yesterday afternoon for its Saturday audience in Carnegie Hall. It had a stirring performance, such as is heard in New York only when the players from Boston and their director, Dr. Karl Muck, come for their concerts.

There is nothing new to record of its performance. It was as thrilling as last year's, and was applauded until Dr. Muck called upon his men to rise and share the honors with him.

Going from Brahms' serious music to something lighter, the second half of the programme was devoted to three short works. Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp" was played with spirit, but not so effectively as the symphony. As on Thursday's programme, one of the works used frequently by the Ballet Russe was heard. This time it was "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" instead of "Scheherazade." To close the entertainment and send the audience home in a happy mood Chabrier's rollicking, rhythmic "Espana" was presented.

From STANDARD UNIO EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

DR. MUCK PRESENTS SIBELIUS SYMPHONY

Gives Rare Delight by Revival of Powerful Composition by Finnish Composer.

MISS SUSAN MILLAR SINGS.

Sembrich's Beautiful Pupil Has Still Much to Learn.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its second concert of the subscription series at the Academy of Music, playing a programme of wide variety but one so skillfully constructed by Dr. Karl Muck as to create a homogeneous effect.

The symphony was by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer. It was his first in E minor and was new to most of the audience. It was composed in 1899 and given first in America in 1907. Only two other American performances are recorded in the notes of the authorative Philip Hale. This rarity of revival is hard to understand, for it is a work which last night made an impressive appeal by the richness and originality of its orchestration, the profundity of its thought and the strength of its emotion. Sibelius is known to most concertgoers only by his haunting "Finlandia" and the plaintive "Death of the Swan," yet he has written three symphonies besides that given last night, and if approaching his other work in wealth of ideas, they must form a treasure to which the musically curious must long to be introduced.

The solemnity and mysticism of the Far North sings through this first symphony of his, but with it there's the northern vigor and hardiness, the adventurous daring, the healthy masculinity that music needs in these days when voluptuous decadence is felt in so much new work. In the first movement, the mystic element predominates, but is shaken off with the rugged defiance of a fighting man working to an enraged climax. The andante has qualities of love and tenderness that calm brutal outbursts. The scherzo is an uproarious outburst of joy, and the finale is dark with forceful dignity, ending in a blaze of unrestrained life.

After years of unsatisfactory symphonic selections, the renewed interest that Dr. Muck has brought to his concerts with the Chausson symphony of last month and the Sibelius work of last night makes expectation keen for the next announcement.

There was a soloist at the concert last night, a Miss Susan Millar, a tall and beautiful young woman, who had studied under Sembrich without apparently making much progress in the art of song. Her voice, a light mezzo-soprano, sounded very weak and blurry, and, although her selections were all of great natural charm, they lost most of it through the lack of color and feeling in the interpretations. The songs were Tschaikowsky's "Adieux Forets" from "Jeanne d'Arc" and "Di Nacht," "Morgen," and "Heimlich Aufforderung," by Strauss.

The orchestra accompanied the soloist and also played Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," the prelude to Debussy's "L'Apres—Midi d'un Faune," and Chabrier's "Espagne Rhapsody." The playing was as usual too fine in every way to evoke any emotion milder than thanks for hearing it.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Finely Varied Program, With Sunsan Millar, Singer.

Is it possible that Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been reading the biography of that model program maker, Theodore Thomas? At any rate for his second Brooklyn concert of the season, at the Academy last night, Dr. Muck applied the Thomas principle of adapting his program so as to hold the attention of his audience with most happy results. We have traveled fast and far since Thomas taught New York to love orchestral music and Dr. Muck was able to place his chief dish at the opening of his feast where Thomas used to place it in the middle, but the arrangement of the rest of the program presented a succession of agreeable contrasts and the audience was dismissed with Charbrier's brilliant and not too heavy "Espana" rhapsody. The result was that many of the dispersing auditors expressed their pleasure in terms more or less like those of the woman who declared "I have enjoyed every moment of it." That is an unusual tribute to hear after one of Dr. Muck's programs, and it was due, not to the supernal beauty of any of the compositions played, but to a skillful arrangement which made each one seem right in its place.

The chief attraction of the concert was Sibelius' "First Symphony," which suggests a musical adaptation of the old proverb to read "scratch a Finn and you find a Russian." The first two movements particularly, both andante, have a curious suggestion of the tragic spirit underlying Tschaikowsky without a resemblance in melody. Such melody as it has is very beautiful but poignantly sad, and the effect, although deeply impressive, was so somber that neither movement evoked more than the ghost of applause. The scherzo, however, with its incisive rhythms and its biting, vivid harmonies, aroused a heartier response, and after the noble closing movement there was enthusiasm which was not satisfied until the members of the orchestra arose in response to a well earned tribute. It was a beautiful performance of a symphony which it is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will bring to Brooklyn again, before the memory of its vitality and power have faded from the minds of those who heard it.

Then came the song "Farewell to the Forests," from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," sung by Susan Millar. Miss Millar is a young mezzo with a pleasant voice and sensitive musical feeling, and she sang with taste and intelligence, but she lacks as yet the authority to dominate either an audience or an orchestra. She was at her best in her group of Strauss' songs, of which the "Morgen" was most sympathetically sung.

The other orchestral music was Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," which resembles the composer's other descriptive pieces which have been played here, in its broad and sunshiny out-of-doors atmosphere, in its spirit and virility; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," whose limpid smoothness was in welcome contrast to the Finnish and Bohemian vigor, and the Charbrier rhapsody which, if it bears today the suggestion of a glorified Broadway restaurant, is yet a spirited and cheering going-home selection.

TRIBUNE
ess: New York City

NEW FEATURES IN CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Assisted by Susan Millar as Soloist.

The second concert of the winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given in Infantry Hall last night, was marked by several distinctive features, which included a symphony never played here previously, a singer never before heard in this city and a selection by her which was new to most musical people in the audience. The enlargement of the stage for the inclusion of the entire orchestra, though inaugurated at the preceding concert, was new enough, too, to cause further favorable comment as an improvement. The audience was as usual large and representative of the musical and social life of the city. A disappointment was the inability of Dr. Muck, the conductor, to be present owing to illness. Ernest Schmidt took his place.

The symphony with which the concert program opened, Chauson's Symphony in B-flat, had its first performance in this country in 1905, and has been played but a few times since. Now Dr. Muck has revived it and is making it a feature of his season in many cities. In the places where it has already been produced by this orchestra it has been received with marked favor and it was accorded similar endorsement here. It is a work full of rich color and melodic beauty. It can hardly be considered a popular piece, but appeals chiefly to the trained musician, though even to the ear that appreciates music but cannot dissect its charms it and gives delight.

The other two numbers on the program by the orchestra were Brahm's Variation on a Theme by Haydn and Berlioz's Overture to "The Corsair." They were rendered admirably, their poetic beauty being fully revealed by the musicians.

The soloist, who was on her first visit to this city, was Miss Susan Millar. She has the distinction of being the first pupil Mme. Marcelle Sembrich has given to the concert stage and she reflects credit upon her teacher. She has sung this season with this orchestra in several cities and has won praise for her work, and last night's audience found pleasure in her selections. The first of these was an aria from an old opera by a composer who has not figured prominently in modern concert programs, Rinaldo de Capua, who produced "Vologesco," from which Miss Millar chose this selection. Her second number was three of Richard Strauss's songs "Die Hacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung," all being sung with the orchestra. Miss Millar's mezzo-soprano voice, while not yet strong and full, is of pleasing quality and she sang so satisfactorily that she was warmly applauded.

The program was rendered in the following order:

Chausson .....
....Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20
I. Lent: Allegro vivo.
II. Tree lent.
III. Anime.
Rinaldo di Capua ..Recitative, "Chi mai senti" and Aria, "Dal sen del caro sposo," from "Vologesco re de' Parti."
Brahms—Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
R. Strauss—.....—Three Songs with Orchestra:
(a) "Die Nacht" ("Night"), Op. 10, No. 3.
(b) "Morgen," Op. 27, No. 4.
(c) "Secret Invitation," Op. 27, No. 3.
Berloiz ..Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21.

Providence, R. I. Bulletin
ess: Providence, R. I.
NOV 22 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SECOND CONCERT AT INFANTRY HALL

Chausson Symphony is Feature of Programme.—Dr. Muck Unable to Conduct Because of Illness.—Susan Miller, Protege of Sembrich, is Soloist.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Dr. Muck, who is suffering from a severe cold, was unable to conduct, his place being taken by Ernest Schmidt, one of the orchestra's first violins. The feature of the programme was the Chausson symphony, a work never before played here, although in former seasons it has been included in the orchestra's repertory.

The soloist was Susan Miller, a mezzo-soprano, a pupil and protege of Mme. Sembrich.

The programme follows:

Chausson....Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20
I. Lent: Allegro vivo.
II. Tres lent.
III. Anime.
Rinaldo di Capua..Recitative, "Chi mai senti" and Aria, "Dal sen del caro sposo," from "Vologesco re de' Parti."
Brahms—Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
R. Strauss—.....—Three Songs with Orchestra:
(a) "Die Nacht" ("Night"), Op. 10, No. 3.
(b) "Morgen," Op. 27, No. 4.
(c) "Secret Invitation," Op. 27, No. 3.
Berlioz.....Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21.

Under the baton of Herr Schmidt the symphony was admirably played. It is a work noble in outline and, while its general characteristics are those of the modern French school, it bears the impress of marked individuality.

The Brahms variations on a theme of Josef Haydn's are polished and poetic musical fragments which show the German master's genius for the technique of orchestral composition. They were played with much delicacy, the last three in particular being models of smooth and dainty treatment.

Miss Miller's recitative and aria from an old 18th century Italian opera was formal in style and pleasingly melodious.

Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" made a brilliant ending to the programme. Byron's poem gave the composer the needed inspiration for his genius for descriptive writing. The overture was played with the tremendous fire and the tenderness which alternately appear in its fascinating measures.

The audience was not quite as large as at the opening concert.

WORLD
ess: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY FILLS CARNEGIE HALL

Karl Muck proved once again, at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall, that when he so chooses he can arrange an interesting programme of orchestral music. It was the second matinee this organization has offered this season and the audience filled the large auditorium.

The introductory and dominating composition was the great Brahms first symphony in C minor, a work sufficiently academic to appeal to the pre-eminent leadership qualities of Dr. Muck, yet one which carries a wealth of poetry. In the majestic first movement, which fairly breathes of the outdoors, the orchestra played with that unanimous snap and tonal vitality which are two of its distinguishing characteristics.

In the calm andante, which followed, and the closing movements the musicians continued their mechanical superiority of play and they left little to be desired in portraying the moods that make this symphony of Brahms one of the finest, in form and content, which the world has known.

The applause was so insistent at the conclusion of this work that Dr. Muck rightly asked the musicians to acknowledge it with him. After the intermission came Smetana's vivid symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp." Though it was technically a brilliant piece of work, it could have had more abandon. Next was offered Debussy's masterly "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," and its performance far exceeded that recently offered here by the Daighileff Ballet Russe orchestra when Nijinsky interpreted its terpsichorean features. The final number was Chabrier's colorful rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana."

EVENING POST
ess: New York City

DEC 1 - 19

...ved the recital.

Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

The large audience which heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night hugely enjoyed the performance of the two works on the programme: Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite. The Schumann composition has perhaps never been played here with greater finish and the performance of the Russian suite was "simply immense." It was a performance which evidently Dr. Muck and his players gave con amore; a performance which revealed the enchanting melody and orchestral coloring of this semi-Oriental piece of programme music in the most entrancing manner, and which made the audience wild with delight. An amusing example of Bostonese occurs in the programme book, where the "Scheherazade" is said to be "after the Thousand Nights and One Night." It is usually called "The Thousand and One Nights," but that, of course, is not sufficiently grammatical for Boston, in the neighborhood of which the owls sing "To whit to whom."

FINE PROGRAMME SUPERBLY PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Delights Its Patrons at Second Concert

That it is easier for the Boston Orchestra to dispense with a solo attraction than any other organization of its kind has frequently been demonstrated, but seldom if ever more emphatically and convincingly than yesterday at its second afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall. The list of orchestral pieces was so admirably chosen and arranged that the participation of a singer, a violinist or a pianist would have been felt as an intrusion, an interference with the opportunity of the band and its fine master to disclose the full and varied qualities of its composition and skill.

There was the C minor symphony of Brahms, with its profound and serious beauty of thought and workmanship; Smetana's vivacious delineation of the bustle of Wallenstein's camp, called forth by the poetry of Schiller; Debussy's prelude to the eclogue of Mallarmé, entitled "The Afternoon of a Faun," which even the gross materialism of the Russian dancers has not been able to rob of its intangible loveliness, and Chabrier's "España" to give the brilliant close beloved of virtuosi. To attempt to tell how superbly all this music was played would be but a waste of words. The orchestra does not need it; its patrons will not expect it.

H. E. K.

om EVENING SUN
ldress: New York City

ate

By way of restoring a classic from Russia in danger of being danced to death, the Boston Symphony Orchestra up at Carnegie Hall last evening played Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade"—of a sea tragedy, not a Sultan's harem—in sequence to Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony of the bells of Cologne. A full house here, too, made the men stand up after the symphony. Conductor Muck let them do it again right in the middle of the Russian suite. For New York found it worth while to hear the persistent woodwinds mimicking waves around Sinbad's ship, the horns and tubas protesting when that ship went down. The music "visualized" itself, an "aquarelle" with no thought of a ballet bounder.

To-night in Brooklyn the Bostonians were to give the Finnish Sibelius's First symphony, while Susan Millar had mezzo-soprano airs of Rinaldo da Capua and songs of Strauss. Tomorrow's [illegible] the great Brahms First symphony, both these latter programmes adding Smetana's "Wallenstein," Debussy's "Faun" and Chabrier's "Spain."

Speaking of the ballet "Faun," a former announcement had said this number was by Delibes. Perhaps it was Debussy, after all, who put the cop in "Coppelia." But if so, who was this man Delibes who copped the "Faun"?

EVENING STAR
ess: Washington, D. C.

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Miss Susan Millar as its soloist, gave the second of its season's concerts in Washington at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with a full audience. The program had much to interest the deeper student of music. It included the Chausson Symphony in B flat major, opus 20; Brahm's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, opus 56a, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," with Tschaikowsky's "Air des Adieux," from "Jeanne de'Arc," and a group of three songs of Richard Strauss, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Secret Invitation," by the young soloist, who was graciously recalled three times after her final number. There was close interest at all times, made manifest by generous tributes of applause. The farewell given Miss Millar was a warm expression of compliment and esteem.

PRESS
: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SECOND CONCERT

Dr. Muck Gives a Fine Reading of Brahms' C Minor Symphony.

Brahms ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
Tschaikowsky ..... Air des Adieux from "Jeanne d'Arc"
Berlioz ..... Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21
Strauss ..... Three Songs with Orchestra
a. "Die Nacht" ("Night"), Op. 10, No. 3
b. "Morgen," Op. 27, No. 4.
c. "Secret Invitation," Op. 27, No. 3.
Strauss ..... "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
SOLOIST .....MISS SUSAN MILLAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra called together another splendid audience to the Academy of Music last evening. There were not as many disappointed ones turned away as at the first concert, when Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, but the house was filled to capacity, as it always is when Dr. Karl Muck and his Boston musicians come here, and in spite of the absence of an eminent soloist the program, as far as the orchestra was concerned, was very much more satisfying than at the previous concert.

When the management of an orchestra and the public come to understand how entirely unnecessary is a soloist at a symphony concert the public will be benefited by the addition of orchestral numbers, and the conductor will be able to arrange a program that is more coherent and more finished.

Last night both suffered through the misjudgment in selecting as soloist Miss Susan Millar. It is only gracious to the young lady to pass her with as little comment as possible. She has a charming personality, and has a mellow mezzo-soprano voice, but it is lamentably weak and seems to lack a proper placement of tone. She will probably yet win for herself a place on the concert stage, but it was most evident that she was brought forward too soon.

But eliminating the soloist, the concert, as a whole, was most enjoyable. The symphony is always looked upon with the greatest amount of interest and when that is presented with such a finish as was the Brahms C Minor last evening, all else may be passed as a secondary matter. It is in the symphony that the audience look for any deviation from a set quality of tone or a reading that may be indulged in by the temperament of the Boston conductor or his musicians. Both met in every way anything that might have been desired by the most exacting. It was a revelation in musicianly exactness, and there was a response that was emphatic in the expression of appreciation.

The Boston Orchestra was last evening in prime shape in every part of its program. In the symphony the conductor and his musicians carried the audience with them in such a way as to hold them spellbound through the long breadth and unanimity of tone, voluptuous, appealing and satisfying.

Dr. Muck's Wonderful Grasp.

If Brahms may still be considered by some as a sentimentalist, musical mood must be acceptable to all lovers of the divine art, when interpreted as last evening. From clarity of the first movement clear through to the glorious final it was one constant appeal of floating melody and delightful sectional playing. There is no greater test of a conductor's grasp of the work than the illusive pizzicato passage, which leads over to the wonderful poem sung by the horns.

The splendid manner in which Dr. Muck handled this episode, and then gorgeously realized the sweep and lofty beauty of the remainder of the movement, stamps his work as one of the noblest efforts he has ever given us.

"Till Eulenspiegel" was an easy task after the concentration of the symphony had brought a relax to something that was more sprightly in its handling. The strings, the wood wind and the brass simply danced tantalizingly through the strains of the merry Strauss music, which charmed and stirred, and flooded the house with the great musical energy of the modern master. It is a number of all numbers to hold a masterhand and care in interpretation to keep it from becoming banal through a false idea of the humor to be conveyed musically. Berlioz's Overture "To the Corsair," introduced between the big number, was given in a most acceptable way.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Nothing in yesterday's output of musical endeavor equalled in charm the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the evening. Nothing finer than the understanding and interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Dr. Muck and his men, can be conceived. It held the great audience spell-bound, save during the intermissions. After the second episode, the whole orchestra was called to its feet, an unprecedented thing in the middle of a work, it seems to me. Before the Russian composition, Schumann's beautiful and stirring "Rhenish" symphony was superbly played.

EVENING JOURNAL
ress: New York City
DEC 1 - 1916

EVENING JOURNAL

BOSTON BAND IN THIRD N. Y. CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in New York for the second of its five visits of the season and for the first of the current pair of concerts Dr. Karl Muck last evening, at Carnegie Hall, presented Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

It was an evening of many orchestral delights. The Boston virtuosi have rarely exhibited their prowess with greater effulgence than they did in Rimsky-Korsakov's resplendent tone tableaux of the storied Orient. All its glow and glitter, its slumbrous fires and flashes of Eastern color, its glamorous passion and strange, unwonted romance were reproduced with a nervous, vibrant fidelity that beat at one's pulses, set one's imagination aflame.

One wonders whether or not Dr. Muck has set himself the task, in a mood of quiet bedevilment, of lifting the curse that the Ballet Russe, recently splashing about in our midst, set upon so much otherwise unminced music. At the first pair of concerts last month Dr. Muck rescued "Till Eulenspiegel" from the Nijinskian clutch. Last evening "Scheherazade," in the brilliance of its original splendor as revealed in the Bostonese version, made this music, as Diaghileffed, seem merely an enfant baksterrible. On Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will rescue Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" from the pall of the dropped scarf. But perhaps this is all mere coincidence. In any case, to inquire no further into the matter, Dr. Muck did a notable service in restoration for Rimsky-Korsakov.

The "Rhenish" symphony of Schumann, whilst not offering an opportunity for wondrous orchestral display similar to that provided in "Scheherazade," did, however, evoke some of the finest eloquence of Dr. Muck and his men. The symphony is a soaring song in Schumann's most intensely dramatic manner. The first movement is really a prelude to the whole work, fully in the spirit of "aufschwung," and it was in this spirit that its song was sung. The slow movement alone seemed to lack the requisite variety, due to a lack of sufficient elasticity of rhythm. But the scherzo was thoroughly "in character" and the so-called "cathedral scene" was a joy of golden brasses.

rom TIMES
ddress: New York City

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Schumann's Third Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade.'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came again to New York yesterday and gave a concert in Carnegie Hall in the evening. The program, which, like those of its first visit, had no place for a soloist on it, was made up of two numbers—Schumann's third symphony, called the "Rhenish," and Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." The symphony had not been heard here in some time; it has been rather neglected lately in favor of the first and fourth of Schumann, and even these have appeared with diminishing frequency on the programs of orchestral societies. But it seemed very much alive last evening. Its substance is fresh and vital, and the orchestration, if it has some of Schumann's faults in this art, has also great beauties. The performance was much to be commended for its great vigor and rhythmic incisiveness, its color, and its finish.

Rimsky Korsakoff's suite had been last heard here as a ballet, given by the Russian Company. In this form it is a deliberate and preposterous perversion of the composer's purpose. He meant the music as a form of imaginative program music, for which he has given the suggestion in the title and in an argument printed in the score with sub-titles for the four movements. The suggestion is vague—deliberately vague—as Mr. Hale remarks in notes upon the program.

There are unmistakable features in it: the narrative phrase that recurs again and again with the most ingenious variations in its presentation, the oriental scenes of the Bagdad fête and especially the magnificient picture of the sea in the first and last movements, which has not been surpassed by the attempt of any of the program muscians before or since Rimsky Korsakoff. These go for naught or are senselessly changed to other intentions in the spectacle of the ballet depicting the king's harem and the faithless and bloody doings there.

The performance was a gorgeous reproduction of Rimsky Korsakoff's gorgeous pictures. Dr. Muck conducted it with immense and contagious enthusiasm. The orchestra rarely has an opportunity to present its powers as a virtuoso more fully; both as a body and in the numerous solo effects with which the score abounds. The audience was excited to an unwonted enthusiasm.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH SUSAN MILLAR

Gifted Pupil of Sembrich Heard in Concert Begun With Brahms's First Symphony

PROGRAM

Brahms ..... First Symphony, C Minor
Tschaikowsky—"Air des Adieux," from "Jeanne Darc."
Berlioz ..... "Corsair" Overture
Strauss ..... Songs with orchestra
(a) "Die Nacht."
(b) "Morgen."
(c) "Heimbiche Aufforderung."
Strauss ..... "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

The Boston Symphony gave the second of its five concerts at the Academy last evening under Doctor Karl Muck's direction. The house was nearly filled. Susan Millar, a young American mezzosoprano, was the soloist. She is the first pupil Marcella Sembrich has introduced to the concert stage, and the present is her debutante year. Great expectations are entertained of her. On the evening of November 9 she sang for the first time with the Orchestra at Cambridge in an engagement providing for six appearances.

She was evidently nervous last evening and it was kinder and more just to withhold an exhaustive appraisal of her merit till the sense of an ordeal ceases to beset her. The vocal art is still in its beclouded dawn: the "paramount impulse not to be withstood" has not yet entered into full control. The voice is evidently there as material to work upon, but last night the songs were bigger than the singer as she now is. She was dwarfed by them and by her distinguished association. The first notes of the Tschaikowsky aria and some others were nearly lost in the plenitude of sound from the orchestra, with which the voice could not successfully compete.

The inner meaning of the great lyrics of Strauss was by no means completely realized. Though a certain dreamy sentiment was imparted to "Die Nacht," the most impressive feature of "Morgen" was the violin obligato, and interest was distracted to the active harps that seconded the "Secret Invitation." All in all, in its present development, it seemed a voice better fitted to the lyric uses of the music room than to the filling and thrilling of so large an auditorium. But let the last word of what it seems so thankless and ungracious to say be that a lovely voice and a charming presence await their fuller and more satisfactory disclosure.

The orchestra itself was in its finest estate. The driving energy, which Doctor Muck's art has reconciled with the last generation of tonal refinement, was maintained without an instant's flagging and with an opulent resonance of tone through the great Brahms first symphony till the instruments swung into the chorale-like measures at the very end. The chief inspiration of the evening to many came, no doubt, in the celestial Andante, with its unctuous oboe and clarinet, its lyric first violins, answered by an exquisite outpouring from the second violins and the violas, and last but not least the upraised voice of Mr. Witek's violin. The concertmeister was often to the fore. He handled that critical glissade from the top of the E string in "Till Eulenspiegel" very cleverly. The Berlioz overture went with plentiful esprit, and not a dull moment for the players or the hearers. The conclusive jovial symphonic poem of Strauss with its frisking and whisking of the irrepressible mischiefmaker is always played conamore by the Bostonians, who relish the opportunity for virtuosity given every choir. It is not the highest type of music, but it is lots of fun.

F. L. W.

WORLD
ess: New York City
Dec 1 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Schumann and Rimsky-Korsakoff Works Played—Four Other Entertainments.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third appearance of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall.

The programme, arranged by Dr. Muck, the conductor, comprising but two numbers, Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony and the Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, has caused considerable comment due to its make-up. New York is more than familiar with the suite because of its frequent presentation in the last year by the Russian Ballet. It has been suggested that perhaps the eminent Boston leader is trying to "show up" the ballet, inasmuch as on his last appearance here he played "Till Eulenspiegel," which the Russians were then in the throes of turning into a dance feature, and next Saturday's Boston programme includes still another ballet diversion, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

There was a good deal of sameness last evening to the programme but the "Scheherazade" was so remarkably well done that it banished thoughts of the ballet and the symphony was restful enough to act as a welcome dessert to the day's doings. The orchestra was loudly applauded and forced twice to rise.

[illegible]

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City
ate NOV 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Two Notable Works Chosen as Themes by Superb Musical Organization.

DR. CARL MUCK CONDUCTS

Thanksgiving Program Rendered at Carnegie Hall—Germain Schnitzer Heard in Recital.

The Boston Symphony Society, with Dr. Karl Muck in command, paid New York its second visit of the season last night, and Carnegie Hall was once more the scene of their labors.

Schumann's musical description of life in the Rhineland, entitled "Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish") in E Flat," was the first of the two works which Dr. Muck had chosen for his Thanksgiving program. The other was Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite Schererazade after "The Ten Thousand Nights and a Night."

Schumann's expressions of life in the Rhineland were so serene, so joyous and so refreshing that one could not help but contrast his descriptions with the sorrow and scenes of human suffering that now sadden the same land. So in the midst of all the mirth and gaiety there is usually an underlying note of sadness.

Dr. Muck, as is his wont, threw himself into the mood of the composer, and left nothing to be desired. The "Scheherazade" was likewise skillfully rendered.

The program for to-morrow afternoon includes: Brahms's symphony in C minor, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"; Debussy's prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Chabrier rhapsody, "Espana."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 27 1916

THE SCHELLING CONCERTO

It Was Mr. Kreisler and Not the Music That Was Applauded

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—In reading the letter signed Felix E. Schelling in the PUBLIC LEDGER of November 17, it brought to my mind an incident that occurred after the Boston Symphony to which he refers. There met in the foyer of the Academy of Music a group of musical persons—professional and amateur—all students of music and all ardent supporters of music in Philadelphia, among whom there was but one opinion expressed, namely, indignation that such a great artist as Fritz Kreisler should "palm off" such trash as the Schelling concerto for violin and orchestra on so friendly and faithful an audience as he always has in Philadelphia. We all felt cheated and hurt, and rejoiced the following morning that "F. L. W." so well expressed in his criticism in the PUBLIC LEDGER the opinion and feelings of most of the members of that great audience. Mr. Felix Schelling is laboring under a sad delusion if he thinks for one moment that the "six or seven recalls" he mentions were because of the music. They were for Fritz Kreisler in spite of the music.

We are all aware of the friendship existing between Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Ernest Schelling and between Mr. Muck and Mr. Schelling, but it is pretty hard on a patient public to be sacrificed on the altar of the other fellows' friendship. No one questions that Mr. Muck is a scholarly musician and a fine conductor of a wonderful orchestra, but as a program maker he certainly has not given entire satisfaction in Philadelphia, and there have been a good many complaints on that score even in Boston, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a religion and to criticise it an unforgivable offense.

HELEN TURNER.

Philadelphia, November 20, 1916.

rom EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress: New York City
Date

Not all the music lovers were at the opera. In Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony and its leader, Dr. Karl Muck, received a cordial welcome. The programme contained only two works, and they were played with that unanimity and beauty which mark the work of the Boston players.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony depicted admirably the happy spirit of the Rhine valleys before Prussian militarism filled them with despair.

Rimsky Korsakoff's "Sheherazade," played in its entirety, was superb in its voluptuous beauty, alternating with barbaric movements.

[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting
Journal
m dress: Providence, R.
NOV 19 1916

Two features of especial interest are found in the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its second concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. The first of these is the Symphony, which will be heard in Providence for the first time. This is Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B-flat major. When the distinguished French composer, Vincent d'Indy, came to America in the fall of 1905 by invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts he brought with him the manuscript score and parts of this symphony and it was played in Philadelphia under his direction. Later in the season it was played in Boston by Mr. Gericke. Then it was not touched until Dr. Muck put it on the second Boston programme for this season. Its performance in Boston created much enthusiasm, which was repeated when it was played early this month in New York.

The other point of interest to which attention has been called is the first appearance here of Susan Millar, who has been engaged for a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She has already sung in Cambridge and later is to sing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich is launching on a musical career. She will sing as her first number an aria from a forgotten opera by an almost forgotten composer, the opera being "Vologesco" and the composer Rinaldo da Capua, who flourished in the first half of the 18th century. For her second number Miss Millar will sing three of Richard Strauss's songs, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." All of these will be with orchestra. Andre Maquarre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged "Die Nacht" and "Heimliche Aufforderung," while Richard Strauss's own orchestration will be used for "Morgen."

The other numbers on the programme will be Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Berlioz's Overture to The Corsair."

* * *

[illegible]
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MEZZO-SOPRANO

Susan Millar, Protegee of Marcella Sembrich, to Be Heard With Orchestra.

CARUSO IN SAMSON ROLE

Behrens Opera Club to Offer "Cavalleria Rusticana" and the "Coppelia" Ballet.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist is Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano. She is the first pupil that Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage. Miss Millar will sing the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and three songs by Richard

SUSAN MILLAR.

Strauss with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program includes Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

om SUN
ldress: New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SMETANA MUSIC

Old Programme Piece "Wallenstein's Camp" Fades Before Brahms Symphony.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised the C minor symphony of Brahms, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"; Debussy's prelude to "L'Apres midi d'un Faune" and Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody.

It was unfortunate for the Smetana composition that it had to follow the symphony of Brahms. Even the customary intermission of ten minutes was not sufficient to make one forget that he remembered. The "Wallenstein" music is not played very often, while the symphony is. Yet the latter is much the fresher of the two.

The symphonic poem is programme music of the oldest type, naive to the last degree. Of course, there are trumpetings and revellings and the dull beatings of horses' hoofs and all the rest of it; but of what use are such doings? In what manner do they create the illusion of art?

Naturally the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play the work as well as it is possible to play, but why do it at all? It seems such a waste of orchestra. Or was the sardonic Dr. Muck cunningly trying to show us that after all Bohemia was not much of a country?

The French pieces on the list were of much better material, but have we not had a feast of that Faun of late? What must each conductor feel it incumbent upon him to trot out his own special brand of afternoon atmosphere and his own particular manner of entering into the subtle soul of the wild thing of the woods? There has been a plethora of this French Peter Panning. We grow weary of the oaten flute and the sour grapes.

There has been something of the Brahms C minor symphony also; but this is a dry wine and does not palate upon the epicurean taste. How often is too often to listen to the tenth symphony? Has it a fellow outside the nine of Beethoven? Dr. Muck conducts it as if he loved it. The Bostonians play it as if Dr. Brahms had got his degree from Cambridge. Sometimes the good Dr. Muck conducts without enthusiasm, though never without importance. But give him Brahms and he rises to his best. He made the audience very happy yesterday.

SUN
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT CONCERT

Schumann's Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" Given.

AUDIENCE IS PLEASED

Solos Performed Excellently by Anton Witek, the Concert Master.

The second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck disclosed himself in a new light as a programme maker by inviting his audience to listen to only two compositions, namely, Schumann's E flat symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's suite "Scheherazade." The melodious "Rhenish" symphony of Schumann is not played now as frequently as it used to be in earlier days, and perhaps it might be given a little oftener. But there is much new matter to be considered, and most of it calls for more profound examination than this fluent and songlike work.

As for Rimsky-Korsakov's suite, we have indeed not lacked performances of that. We have heard its measures at the same time as we have observed the extraordinary doings of Adolf Bolm and Flora Revalles together with numerous other members of the celebrated Ballet Russe. These doings have occasioned much debate. The composer undertook to illustrate certain incidents in the Thousand and One Nights, while the ballet dealt with very different matters. Hence the jarring of the sects.

Last evening, at any rate, there was no call for dispute. The music was heard in all its original beauty, played by an orchestra which brought out its colors in all their brilliancy. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the organization, performed the solos excellently. The audience seemed to be entirely

TIMES
ss: Washington, D. C.
NOV 26 19

NOVEL SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Dr. Karl Muck Presents Composition of Great Beauty.

If Dr. Muck wishes his orchestra to be estimated by the soloist he presented in two of the five numbers on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, then he would stamp this organization, under his regime, as decidedly on its decline. Does Dr. Muck think so lightly of his capacity audiences in the National Capital that he willfully subjects them to such an imposition?

We remember that he alone among the symphony conductors refused to submit his programs several years ago when there was a general cooperation to make the symphony concerts as broad in their scope as possible, and to prevent the repetitions that had occurred the season before. If Washington submits, at least it is aware of this discourtesy.

Symphony a Novelty.

The symphony was the Chausson B flat major, a novelty to us. It was filled with a wealth of orchestral color, of lovely phrases, and imposing dynamics, and it was executed with that beauty and nicety in tone that the Boston players have at their command. The composition is purely Wagnerian, reminiscent frequently of themes of Wagner, and built up in all the splendor of his big orchestral masses. There is much pure beauty throughout the three movements, which have the character of a dramatic recital of varying episodes.

The dignity of the opening, the rich orchestration, and the truly scintillant close to the first movement, were delightfully given. The slow movement held much pastorale beauty, while in the finale a wind and 'cello episode was very lovely, and a chorale, like the "Grail," was richly developed to the close.

Miss Millar, Soloist.

Susan Millar, called mezzo-soprano, we think; one could not determine, her voice was so weak against the background of the orchestra; Miss Millar is not eligible to rank as an orchestra soloist. Intrusted with some of the biggest and broadest selections in music literature, the Tschaikowsky aria from "Jeanne d'Arc," "Adieu, forets," and three of the noblest songs of Richard Strauss, "Die Nacht," "Morgen," and "Heimliche Aufforderung," one gleaned from them little more than lovely orchestral settings. The voice did not register, nor did the interpretations. It was amateur.

In the Brahms variations on a theme of Haydn, Dr. Muck gave delineations that were full of charm, particularly in the joyous "vivace," and in the half-lullaby "grazioso." For the brilliant dramatic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, the audience was unresponsive, due, doubtless, to the inadequacy of the Strauss songs that preceded it.

J. MacB.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City

BRAHMS SYMPHONY IS HEARD AGAIN

Famous Boston Organization Makes It Principal Offering at Carnegie Hall Concert.

GREAT AUDIENCE ATTENDS

Other Interesting Numbers Rendered—Albert Spalding's Program Proves Rather Dull.

Brahms's Symphony in C minor was the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and, as usual, there was rarely a vacant seat, save where some hard-pressed critic had failed to arrive on time, and even the critics hate to miss a Boston Symphony performance.

The symphony was Brahms's first. The rumor of its coming preceded it many years; but when finally it was performed, when its composer was 49 years old, it created enthusiasm wherever it was played, both in England and in Germany. The prelude to "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" was another interesting number, especially in view of the fact that all are becoming so familiar with fauns and the like since the advent of the Russian Ballet.

Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Valdstynuv Tabor," and "Espna" rhapsody for the orchestra, by Chabrier, completed a delightful afternoon of music. Perhaps, after all, Dr. Muck is relenting a little, influenced by New York's evident appreciation and admiration for his splendid work, for his programs are less severe, and one might say less "highbrow," and a thousand times more enjoyable. And if he was welcome before, he is now beginning to be greeted with expectancy and eagerness.

POST
Washington, D. C.
NOV 29 1916

The Boston Symphony attracted its usual distinguished audience yesterday afternoon to the National Theater. Mrs. Bones and her party occupied the presidential box; the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff occupied the adjoining one and had with them Mrs. Richard Townsend and several members of the embassy staff; Mrs. Lansing, wife of the Secretary of State, and Mrs. Baker, wife of the Secretary of War, were guests of Gen. and Mrs. Crozier in their box; Mrs. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior had a party in the adjoining box; the Rev. Ward Denys and Mrs. Denys and the daughters, the Misses Denys, had their box Mrs. A. T. Brice and Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had as guests in their box Justice and Mrs. Robb, Mrs. Willis Rodenberg and Miss Hartman, and Mrs. Preston Gibson had a party in Mrs. McMillan's box. Others in the audience were Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. de Blanpre, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. George Peabody Eutis, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mme. de Sibour, Mrs. John Lejeune, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Joseph Stoddard, Mrs. Victor Kaufmann, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Mrs. Lee Stubblefield, Mrs. Hampson Gray, Mrs. Tom Williams, Mrs. Jack Biddle, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reesi Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, Mrs. Bagl Miss Bagley, Mrs. Ward Brown, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Mrs. Theodore Noy Mrs. Clarence Wilson and Mrs. Char W. Fairfax.

om EVENING SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
te NOV 24, 1916

TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

SUSAN MILLAR

The young mezzo-soprano, who is a pupil of Mme. Sembrich. She will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 29.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 26 1916

Boston Symphony—Tuesday.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, November 28, at 4:30. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage.

Miss Millar will sing as her first number the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera "Joan of Arc" and as her second number three songs by Richard Strauss with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen," and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Andra Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program in its entirely is as follows: Chaussen, Symphony in B flat; Tschaikowsky, aria "Adieux les Forets" (Joan of Arc); Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; R. Strauss, three songs with orchestra, (a) "Die Nacht," (b) "Morgen," (c) "Heimliche Aufforderung;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Mazeppa." Soloist, Susan Millar.

om EVENING NEWS
ldress: Baltimore, Md.
te

TO SING HERE AT THE LYRIC ON WEDNESDAY

SUSAN MILLAR

Miss Millar is the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Second of Series Given at the Academy.

Brooklyn's elite filled the opera house of the Academy of Mustic and gave a warm welcome to the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second in the series of five philharmonic concerts given last evening.

No higher compliment could have been paid so splendid a body of musicians than was accorded them by a house that was filled from pit to dome with an audience that gave strict attention to the programme and showered applause on musicians and soloist.

The latter, in the person of Miss Susan Millar, has a well modulated and musical mezzo-soprano voice of considerable range. She appeared at her best in her first number, Airs des Adieux ("Joan of Arc"). Tschaikowsy, which was splendidly rendered and brought the artist several encores.

Her second number, a group of songs by Richard Straus, brought out the versatility of the soloist. Under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra gave splendid support to each number. Of the orchestra little is necessary to be said, other than of the highest commendation, as prior appearances in this borough have firmly established it in the hearts of the music-loving portion of the community.

Dr. Muck's selections of last evening were by modern composers, his first number, Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39, "Sibelius," being one of great breadth and technique, and it was given a finished rendition.

A symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," Smetana, has a charming atmosphere which was well accentuated. The remaining orchestral numbers, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy, and Rhapsody "Espana," Chabrier, rounded out the programme. Dr. Muck's reception was so pronounced as to leave no doubt in his mind, if he ever had any, as to the position he holds with music lovers in Brooklyn.

STANDARD UNION
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSICAL NOTES

Susan Miller, announced as soloist for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which is to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Dec. 1, under Institute auspices, is to all intents and purposes a debutante. She made her debut as a public singer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, and she has been engaged for a series of six appearances with the orchestra. She is a mezzo-soprano and is the first pupil that Mme. Sembrich is launching on a public career. Her voice is said to be one of extraordinary beauty.

om TIMES
ldress: New York City

te

DAY OF NOTABLE MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Spalding, Bauer, and Thibaul Heard

The music in New York yesterday was given in three notable instrumental performances besides a repetition at the opera of Bizet's "Pecheurs de Perles." The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its matinée concert, Albert Spalding his third and last violin recital, and Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud united in an ensemble performance.

Dr. Muck's program for the Boston Orchestra included Brahms's first symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana." The orchestra and the conductor were in their finest vein, and they have rarely given a finer performance. The symphony was superbly played, the austere grandeur of the first movement, the impressive introduction to the finale, the deeply romantic beauty of the slow movement, were profoundly felt and reproduced with a magnificence of tone that left none of the subtleties of the score out of account, and with a balance of the tonal values that kept the flow of the "melos" continually in the listeners' ears.

Dr. Muck had a deep sympathy with Brahms's thought and an equally deep understanding of his orchestral speech that is so fine and so characteristic when it is understood and truly interpreted. He has an equal insight into Debussy's thought that moves on another plane; and the performance of the prelude—which still seems the finest of the composer's orchestral pieces, written with a greater spontaneity than many of his later works, and when he had no anxiety about a Debussy formula to be maintained—was of exquisite charm, and had the freedom of an improvisation. Smetana's piece was not known to most of the audience. It lacks distinction and definiteness. Its effect is noisy; except the andante episode with the plucked strings, an interesting and suggestive passage. Smetana was at his best when he let the national spirit of Bohemian music inspire him. This work is far from showing the free inventiveness and originality of the Bohemian tone-poems, or of "The Bartered Bride." And as for Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody, it may be accused of a touch of vulgarity; but it has that which makes the listener catch his breath and beguiles him with its brilliant coloring.

ENQUIRER
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 19

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Brahms' First Symphony the Feature of Last Evening's Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, constituted the principal feature of the programme. By many good judges and experienced concert-goers this symphony is regarded as the finest of the four That is a mere matter of taste, and those to whom the idyllic second or the tragic third makes a stronger appeal need be at no loss to justify their opinion. All must agree, however, in recognizing and applauding the beauty and dignity and emotional exaltation of the one that was so admirably played last evening, and its performance under Dr. Muck's inspiring and illuminating baton was greatly enjoyed.

Perhaps it is as an interpreter of Brahms' music that Dr. Muck is at his best. He reads that master's complicated scores with an easy mastery of their manifold difficulties and a clear understanding of their contents, and the full significance of the one in C minor has not been more convincingly and impressively exhibited than it was upon the present occasion. Other numbers in which the orchestra did justice to its reputation and in which it was heard with an unalloyed delight were Berlioz' picturesque overture to the "Corsair" and the "Till Eulenspiegel" fantasia of Richard Strauss.

The assistant artist was Miss Susan Miller, a good singer with an agreeable soprano voice, whose delivery of the air "Adieu les Forets," from Tschaikowsky's opera of "Jeanne d'Arc," and of a group of songs by Richard Strauss, comprising "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Helmliche Aufauderung," was much and deservedly acclaimed, although she was too nervous to do herself justice.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City

Date DEC

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Orchestra set a good example to all programme builders by their offering this afteroon in Carnegie Hall.

In the brief space of one hour and forty minutes they present a comprehensive programme including Johannes Brahms' First Concerto, a symphonic poem by the Bohemian, Frederich Smetana, and, as a tribute to the sweetness and light of the French spirit, Achille Claude Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" and Emmanuel Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody."

[51]

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
NOV 29 1916

MANY HOSTS AT CONCERT

Society Well Represented in Audience at Boston Symphony.

Miss Helen Woodrow Bones occupied a box at the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mrs. Joseph E. Davies and several other ladies were with her.

Mrs. Richard H. Townsend was with the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who occupied the adjoining box. They also had several members of the embassy staff as their guests.

Mrs. Lansing, wife of the Secretary of State, and Mrs. Baker, wife of the Secretary of War, were guests of Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier in their box; Mrs. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, had a party in the adjoining box; the Rev. Ward Denys and Mrs. Denys and their daughters, the Misses Denys, had in their box Mrs. A. T. Brice and Ralph Cross Johnson, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had as guests in their box Justice and Mrs. Robb, Mrs. William Rodenberg and Miss Hartman. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a party in Mrs. McMillan's box.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. de Blanpre, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mme. de Sibour, Mrs. John A. Lejeune, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Joseph Stoddard, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hauge, Mrs. Frederick E. Chapin, Mrs. Lee Stubblefield, Mrs. Hampson Gary, Mrs. Tom Williams, Mrs. Jack Biddle, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. [illegible]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 25

SEMBRICH'S PUPIL TO SING HERE

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich placed on the concert stage. Madame Sembrich regards her as the possessor of very unusual talent.

Miss Millar will sing the "Air des Adieux," from Tchaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and three songs by Richard Strauss, with orchestral accompaniement. The orchestral setting of one of them, "Morgen," is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Air, "Adieu les Forets" (Joan of Arc) Tschaikowsky
Overture to "The Corsair".....Berlioz
Three songs with orchestra.....R. Strauss
(a) "Die Nacht."
(b) "Morgen."
(c) "Heimliche Aufforderung."
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..R. Strauss

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
NOV 26
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, November 28, at 4:30. The concert gains interest in the presentation as solist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage.

The program in its entirety is as follows: Symphony in B flat (Chausson), aria, "Adieux les Forets" ("Joan of Arc") (Tschaikowsky); "Variation on a Theme by Haydn" (Brahms), three songs with orchestra, (a) "Die Nacht," (b) "Morgen," (c) Strauss); "Heimliche Aufforderung" (R. symphonic poem, "Mazeppa" (Liszt).

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

SUSAN MILLAR TO BE SOLOIST

Second Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Wednesday.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career.

Miss Millar will sing as her first number (the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and as her second number three songs by Richard Strauss, with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung."

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1916

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15. The concert brings forward as soloist Susan Millar, a young American mezzo soprano beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil Mme. Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage.

The programme is as follows:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Air, "Adieu les Forets" (Joan of Arc").
Tschaikowsky
Overture to "The Corsair".....Berlioz
Three songs with orchestra.....R. Strauss
(a) "Die Nacht."
(b) "Morgen."
(c) "Heimliche Aufforderung."
Solo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
R. Strauss
Susan Millar.

n AMERICAN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 2 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, November 29, at 8:15 o'clock. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzosoprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage.

Miss Millar will sing as her first number the Air des Adieux, from Tschaikowsky's opera, Joan of Arc, and as her second number, three songs by Richard Strauss, with orchestral accompaniment.

EVENING STAR
ress: Washington, D. C.
NOV 26 1

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Special interest arises in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Mme. Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage. Mme. Sembrich regards her as the possessor of very unusual talent.

Miss Millar will sing the "Air des Adieux" from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and three songs by Richard Strauss with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestral numbers are Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 25 1
Date

THE second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy Monday evening. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage. Madame Sembrich, it is said, regards her as the possessor of very unusual talent. Miss Millar will sing as her first number the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera "Joan of Arc" and as her second number three songs by Richard Strauss with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre, of the orchestra. The orchestral program is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Berloiz, Overture to "The Corsair"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Coals, in contradiction of the proverb, might now be welcomed in Newcastle with a civic demonstration of joy. But just on that account Dr. Karl Muck of Boston need not assume the New York audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are panting after Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." Those pieces are both good music—I insist they are both good music!—but they have been played here, and played well, so many times in the last twelvemonth that most of us are ready to faint at mention of their very names. And still Dr. Muck does not give us Debussy's "Ibéria," d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Bruckner's eighth symphony, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," Schönberg's "Five Pieces."

Neither does any local conductor. How about Dr. Kunwald, from Cincinnati, out of the west?

PRESS
s: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1916

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, November 27, at 8.15. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage. Madame Sembrich regards her as the possessor of very unusual talent.

Miss Millar will sing, as her first number, the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and as her second number, three songs by Richard Strauss, with orchestral acompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss, and that of the other two songs is by Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Brahms.....Symphony in C Minor, No. 1
Tschaikowsky Air, "Adieu les Forets" (Joan of Arc).
Berlioz.....overture to "The Corsair"
R. Strauss, Three Songs with Orchestra:—
(a) Die Nacht.
(b) Morgen.
(c) Heimliche Aufforderung.
R. Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

* * *

NOV 25 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Susan Millar Heard as Soloist at Orchestra Concert.

Vocal music apparently occupied more than its usual share in the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Academy of Music last evening.

Actually, however, there were quite as many orchestral selections as is customary, the seeming preponderance of the vocal selections being due to the fact that for her second offering the soloist, Susan Millar, had a trio of Strauss songs. Her first selection consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Air des Adieux," from "Jeanne d'Arc," a dramatic composition which she interpreted with considerable feeling.

Her rendering of the Strauss songs was extremely artistic, also.

In the case of two of the songs, the orchestration was that of Andre Maquarre, first flute of the orchestra.

The opening composition of the concert was Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, given under Dr. Muck's baton in an authoritative fashion. The overture to Belioz's "Corsair" and Richard Strauss' orchestral setting of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" rounded out an exceedingly interesting program.

ENQUIRER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. The concert gains interest in the presentation as soloist of Susan Millar, a young American mezzo-soprano, who is now beginning her career. Miss Millar has the distinction of being the first pupil that Madame Marcella Sembrich has placed on the concert stage. Madame Sembrich regards her as the possessor of very unusual talent.

Miss Millar will sing as her first number the Air des Adieux from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Joan of Arc," and as her second number three songs by Richard Strauss with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Heimliche Aufforderung." The orchestral setting of "Morgen" is by Richard Strauss and that of the other two songs is by Mr. Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Brahms .....Symphony in C Minor., No 1
Tschaikowsky—Air, "Adieu les Forets" (Joan of Arc)
Berlioz.....Overture to "The Corsair"
R. Strauss—Three Songs with Orchestra:
(a) Die Nacht
(b) Morgen.
(c) Heimliche Aufforderung
R. Strauss..."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

From the American Dec. 3, 1916.

Dr. Muck has been making this year a most remarkable series of programs. They provide varied and pleasing contrasts. The program which he has made for the coming week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (the seventh pair of Symphony concerts), is no exception to the rule. The Symphony will be that of Cesar Franck in D-Minor.

The second part of the program contains a work which will be to all intents and purposes a novelty, Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien." This has not been played here since the season of 1902-03, in Mr. Gericke's time. The orchestra included it in one of its San Francisco programs in the Spring of 1915, but it is reaching a Boston program for the first time under Dr. Muck.

The soloist will be that admirable pianist, Ernest Schelling, who has worthily won a place in the favor of the Boston public. He will play Liszt's Second Concerto in A-Major.

From the Herald Dec. 9, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES SEVENTH OF CONCERTS

Borodins' "On the Steppes of Central Asia" Played After 13 Years—Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor Gives Fresh Pleasure—Performance Generally Remarkable.

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor; Liszt, piano concerto in A major, No. 2 (Ernest Schelling, pianist); Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

Borodin's orchestral sketch had not been played at these concerts for over 13 years. It should not have been neglected so long, for it is charming music, singularly effective by reason of color and suggestiveness obtained by the simplest means. The music was written for an exhibition of tableaux representing episodes in Russian history, but it is much more than music for an occasion. Hearing this beautiful composition, the symphonies of Borodin, one of his string quartets, the famous chorus and ballet music in "Prince Igor" and his songs, one wonders if this accomplished and aristocratic chemist, often dismissed as an "amateur" by essayists and compilers of biographical dictionaries, was not after all the most musical and imaginative member of the famous Russian Five.

What shall be said of Franck's symphony at this late day? We remember the first performance here in 1899—how the symphony was considered by some as "dismal"; how many protests were sent to Mr. Gericke; indeed, one subscriber went so far as to call the music "immoral." Now this symphony is enthusiastically applauded, and by some of those who were distressed if not shocked 17 years ago. Repeated hearings only enlarge the admiration. There are few modern works so skilfully constructed, which at the same time are so crowded with noble and lofty thoughts, and always without stammering or unworthy expression. One may point out the wonderful manner in which thematic material is developed; the contrapuntal ingenuity. Another may marvel at the richness of the middle parts, at the mighty, elemental, sonorous bass. Still another may call attention to the vitality of the music, to the dramatic portrayal of the struggle between doubt and jubilation, to the mysterious fluttering and dark hints that follow the melancholy song of the middle movement. To us the glory of this symphony lies in its spirituality, which does not fade into mysticism or symbolism. As in other compositions of Franck, there is the suggestion of a man caught up into the seventh heaven where he heard the multitudinous angelic choiring and saw the beatific vision.

The performance was as remarkable as is the symphony itself. It is true that Mr. Mueller did not play the English horn solo in the allegretto, but, on the other hand, new beauties were revealed in the middle or scherzo section.

Mr. Schelling gave a clean-cut, musically intelligent, brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, brilliant rather than romantic. Perhaps that is the way the piano part should be played, but we should have preferred greater warmth, richer and more varied color, in the lyric measures. The concerto itself is in some respects finer than the one in E flat major, yet there are a few places in which the music almost falls into vulgarity. In the early part of the work there is a curious reminder of the composer's "Mazeppa" theme, but this reminder should rather be characterized as a Lisztian mannerism.

How many times has the overture to "Euryanthe" been played in Boston? The "Weberian flourish" now seems old-fashioned; possibly the "chivalric spirit" does not make a strong appeal in 1916; but the short largo in the overture, whether or not it was an afterthought of the composer, still works a spell.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major, No. 35; Tschaikowsky, Suite No. 1 in D minor. Miss Elena Gerhardt will sing these songs with orchestra: Wagner, Stehe Still, Traeume, Schmerzen; Hugo Wolf, Verborgenheit, Der Freund, Er Ist's.

om REPUBLICAN
dress: Springfield, Mass.
te NOV 29

Plans for Sunday Concert in Auditorium

The Masonic quartet of Waterbury, Ct., and Miss Erma Seydel, solo violinist with the Boston symphony orchestra, will give a concert at the Auditorium Sunday. Arthur H. Turner will act as accompanist and conductor. The entertainment will be one of the series of Sunday afternoon concerts arranged by Kenneth Robbie, secretary of the Young Men's Christian association. The program will begin at 3.30.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Dr. Carl Muck displayed no lack of eclecticism in his programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. It was made up of the Brahms C minor symphony, Smetana's symphonic "poem," "Wallenstein's Camp," Debussy's orchestral prelude, "L'Apres-midi dun Faune" and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

There was, of course, nothing of orchestral novelty in this list, except the Smetana piece, which has not been heard here in at least six or seven years, Mr. Stransky, chief devotee of the Bohemian, restricting himself largely to the Moldau exgurgitations. If there must be Smetana, it is well to have something else, even if the something else prove not essentially something different.

But the especial high flight of the Bostonians occurred in the Brahms symphony. Dr. Muck displayed in his programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. It was made up of the Brahms C minor symphony, Smetana's symphonic "poem," "Wallenstein's Camp," Debussy's orchestral prelude, "L'Apres-midi dun Faune" and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

There was, of course, nothing of orchestral novelty in this list, except the Smetana piece, which has not been heard here in at least six or seven years, Mr. Stransky, chief devotee of the Bohemian, restricting himself largely to the Moldau exgurgitations. If there must be Smetana, it is well to have something else, even if the something else prove not essentially something different.

But the especial high flight of the Bostonians occurred in the Brahms ernize" his orchestral music. It is significant that the late Gustav Mahler, who was not himself averse to strengthening the orchestration of Schubert or Schumann where it seemed the better to carry out the intent of the composer, in the case of Bach made special efforts to reveal his music in its original shape and color and atmosphere, even to the reconstruction of the harpsichord for the basso continuo. If Bach must needs be "adapted" for modern audiences, then so much the worse for these audiences.

The Philharmonic Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, played Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Schumann's symphony in C, Tchaikovsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol." Efrem Zimbalist, who made his debut here with Glazounov's concerto for violin and orchestra, played it yesterday. It sounds less worthy serious consideration the oftener it is heard. A large audience attended this concert and applauded everything rapturously.

symphony. Dr. Muck played it in the full realization of its greatness. The Debussy prelude had its own glamorous suggestion, the truly ineffable poetry of which it is robbed in the crude undelineation of the Ballet Russe's posturings.

Debussy and his brother Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, were drawn upon for the middle section of Walter Damrosch's afternoon concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at Aeolian Hall yesterday. The former's "Danse Sacree" and 'Danse Profane," written for harp and strings, had been heard here before, but the Ravel piece, for harp, with strings, flute and clarinet background, although written ten years ago, was said to be new here. Carlos Salzedo, who played the solo harp in this music, is an accomplished virtuoso on the instrument from whose usual monotony he obtains distinctive subtleties of effect.

Mr. Damrosch's programme was opened with a portion of Bach's suite in C, in an adaptation made by Felix Weingartner. Bach is probably the most tortured of eighteenth century composers, and with least reason. His music is as vital to-day as when it was written. Yet pianists contort his organ pieces and his piano compositions as well, violinists disport with anything and everything of his that suits their vanity of purpose, and now orchestral conductors "mod-

From the Journal Dec. 9, 1916.

SYMPHONY BY FRANCK WINS NEW OVATION

Schelling Plays Concerto by Liszt in Brilliant Style.

An eloquent performance of Cesar Franck's symphony—one of the noblest examples of symphonic writing offered to the world since the old masters went their way—gave high merit to the Symphony concert yesterday. The Symphony is one of the few modern works for orchestra that do not suffer by comparison with the time-honored symphonies; and like Bruckner's symphony, and one or two of Brahm's, it bears repetition well. In fact, it is among the small number of late 19th century compositions that now appear regularly, every other year or so, on the Symphony program.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra were applauded for a long time after the impressive performance. This first part of the concert was indeed noteworthy.

The second part brought the performance of the Liszt concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra, with Ernest Schelling as soloist of Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," a characteristic Russian work not heard here for more than a dozen years, and Weber's brilliant "Euryanthe" overture.

Mr. Schelling did well enough with Liszt's showy concerto and was awarded the meed of applause.

The same program will be played again tonight. Next week the program will comprise the Mozart symphony in D major, the Tschaikowsky suite in

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1916

NEW MEZZO PUZZLES WITH VARYING TONES

Susan Millar, With Boston Orchestra, a Musical Sphinx of Fine Training

One of the pleasures of going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the uncertainty whether Doctor Muck is about to bore us sublimely or enrapture us sublimely. For sublime he always is. If his programs are sometimes heavy, they are never petty. If he feels in the mood for closing our eyes with some especially beefy and indigestible piece de resistance, some gastritic pudding, some absurdly trifling entree, the sauce of greatness is spread over it all. We go away happily deluded that we have had a well-planned dinner, when in reality the chef de cuisine had first planned our stomachic destruction, and then, in a moment of human weakness, repented, and saved us with the spices of his wit, his intellect and his dexterity.

Last night in the Academy of Music Doctor Muck was in a benign mood, and his menu was appetizing and neither too solid nor too thin. The cerebrals were permitted to feast on Brahms and Strauss, and the emotionalists on Tschaikowsky and Berlioz, and even on Strauss, too. A piquant touch was given the proceedings by the appearance of a new mezzo-soprano, Miss Susan Millar, the story of whose artistic patronage by Marcella Sembrich was told in the EVENING LEDGER last Saturday. So seldom does such an eminent band thus honor a young girl (she is nothing more) that it was not strange she seemed a little out of place, a little out of the spiritual key, with the orchestra. There could be no doubt that she was hampered by some deep, if hidden, embarrassment, and small doubt that this was the familiar disease—stage fright. At any rate, something kept her voice and spirits down, though she held her head up with truly Henleyan bravery. It is a queer and haunting voice, this; rich, sweet and fresh, superbly schooled and committing no errors. But it is a voice that does not reach out. It was barely audible in the rear of the parquet at moments. How much of this was due to a realization of her debut here, and how much to the strength (or weakness) of the organ it is difficult to say. Possibly it was but her immaturity that kept her middle register from equaling her glorious, full and mellow upper notes. When Miss Millar soared, she went to heights; when she descended, she did not even suggest the depths. In vocal color she is like Louise Homer at her happiest, although she has not (at least, not yet) the slightest grasp on dramatic points, and the "Air des Adieux," from Tschaikowsky's "The Maid of Orleans," was somewhat flatly received on that account.

In pure lieder she gained immeasurably, yet even then she did not make one feel that the beauty of the lyrics and the music was matched by an approximate beauty of interpretation. "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Secret Invitation" are fairly familiar by now. The Culps and the Gerhardts have shown us what can be done in that way. So Miss Millar was a bit disappointing. The Messenger from Mars, dropping down to Broad street in quest of a novel sensation and having only Martian ideas of music, might have thought that it was some strange form of writing in which the singer accompanied the orchestra. Let the reader not infer that Miss Millar is a poor or even an undistinguished artist. She is just that most feminine of matters—a riddle. Whether there is an answer only the years can disclose. We should guess that there was one and that it was "Yes."

For the rest of the evening there was the glowing "Corsair" overture, made brighter and more distinct through the orchestra's playing. There were the pranks of Till Owiglass, that Robin Goodfellow with no milk of kindness in his breast, a triumph of saturnine and leaping spirits in which the musicians caught precisely the right impish mood.

In all this clatter and bustle and melodic stir there was the first symphony of Brahms, like the white radiance of eternity stained by life's dome of many-colored glass, of which a poet once spoke. Perhaps it is not Brahms's masterwork; but it is sad and wonderful and full of thought and desire. In it remains the tumult of big passion. Its magic has not yet faded. Perhaps it never will.

B. D.

From the Herald
Dec. 10, 1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The orchestral feature of the eighth Symphony concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Tschaikowsky's Suite for orchestra in D minor, opus 55. This will come as a novelty to practically all the patrons of the Symphony concerts, for it has been played here only once, and then nearly 18 years ago, under Mr. Gericke. At that time the fourth movement, "Marche Miniature," which, according to the composer's direction may be played ad libitum after the intermezzo, was omitted. The suite is in six parts, the first is an introduction and fugue; the second, a divertimento; the third, intermezzo; fourth, "Marche Miniature"; fifth, scherzo, and sixth, gavotte.

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, who has not been heard here for three seasons.

The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 35.....Mozart
Three songs with orchestra.....Wagner
Stehe still Traeume
Schmerzen
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf Verborgenheit
Der Freund
Er ist's
Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43..Tschaikowsky

The length of this program is 1 hour and 50 minutes.

From the Globe
Dec. 9, 1916.

FRANCK'S SYMPHONY NOBLY PERFORMED

Dr Muck Reads Belgian's Music Impressively

Virtuoso Performance of Liszt's Concerto by Schelling

Cesar Franck's noble symphony towers higher in lofty beauty of thought at each hearing. Simplicity, directness, spontaneity and spiritual radiance make its inspiration a thing intimate and universal. Its message is for all minds, all hearts. Whether troubled or at peace, they will find comfort, courage or blessed triumph in these pages, according to their need. Here are visions of an ideal wherein Franck dwelt undisturbed by petty Parisian barking at his heels.

Dr Muck's performance of it yesterday was one at once noble in restraint and in ardor. The wondrously close knit structure of the first movement was exposed as some majestic piece of architecture of fine proportion and pure line. The clarity of such a performance shows again the economy, the sustained vitality of this music. How difficult to find a superfluous bar; how free from the restive signs of labor, of sparring for time. The themes grow in their own significance, their plastic beauty, as does the composer's use of them in their marvelous organic relationship, the "cyclical form" whereby the germinal thoughts of the first movement return in the last as does the song of the English horn from the slow movement, enriched, mellowed and reminiscent as the story of an old friend told over the wine.

Liszt's second concerto in A major for piano and orchestra invites a superficial performance from the unthinking. It reminds of the Hungarian rhapsodies, for it is brilliantly rhapsodical. It might seem a scintillating improvisation. The middle section, gives the piano little that is reflectively or poetically songful. There are the signs of theatricalism, the effects of tinsel rather than the depth of gold, but these rest heavily upon the manner in which they are played. Dr Muck treated the orchestral accompaniment with surpassing brilliance. The spirit of the Hungarian abandon was incarnate in these measures. Mr Schelling played as a virtuoso, but did not sweep the keyboard as merely one and nothing more. Some have made the thundering introduction in the bass fit only for tympani, Mr Schelling was cordially received.

Borodin was not an orchestral technician. Seen at his best in the smaller forms—the dozen or so good songs and some chamber music—he was not equal to the longer flight of symphonic development with the same ease. He has established a mood in "On the Steppes" beginning with the violin's high organ point on the fifth, and the songs heard in the distance are pictorial, but there is not even the suggestion of the sinister power of the Russian desert, its wastes, its deadly isolation, which Gretchaninoff has painted so vividly in his song for voice and piano. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" closed the program.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1916

WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony's Second Concert — "Cavalleria," with Hinrichs to Lead, by Behrens Opera Club.

FOR the second time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a far from satisfactory concert last night at the Academy of Music. Before a house crowded almost to capacity, they went through an unbalanced program in a slipshod manner, with Muck directing without conviction, with Wittek, the concertmeister, squeaking like an amateur in the obligato passages. It was decidedly an "off night," and it was the second one this season.

Only in the Brahms C minor symphony was the orchestra in anything like the form which has given it such a splendid reputation in years past. By no means the most interesting of symphonies, the work yet served to bring out something of the big possibilities of the organization and Dr. Muck directed with a vigor that was totally lacking in the rest of the program.

The steady decline from then on may have been due to the fact that the symphony was followed by a distinct shock in the appearance of Susan Millar, soprano, heralded as the first pupil put forth by the great Mme. Sembrich. Why Miss Millar should have been chosen for such a concert it is difficult to imagine. She has little or no voice and what she has is produced so far back in her throat that it comes forth dead, without the slightest resonance or color and with hardly sufficient volume to carry above the violins alone. She attempted an aria from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc" and three Strauss songs, but even the familiar "Morgen" was totally beyond her and the Tschaikowsky aria was hopeless.

The failure of the soloist may have served as a damper upon the orchestra, for their accustomed brilliancy and power were lacking in the "Corsair" overture of Berloiz, and they made of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" a funeral dirge.

Admirers of the Boston players will not soon forgive them the two concerts they have presented this season. In a year marked by so many supreme moments in music as this one has been, it seems a pity to see them lower the high standards which they themselves set in the past.

From the Globe
Nov. 25, 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program of Three Numbers Played

Haydn Symphony of Marked Clarity —Mr Witek Soloist

Dr Muck's program included three numbers: Haydn's symphony, in C minor—composed in 1791 and in Alfred Wotguenne's catalog No 142—the Brahms D major concerto for violin, Anton Witek, soloist, and Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp."

All symphony programs cannot be expected to maintain the level of interest of that two weeks ago, or of that two weeks hence after the orchestra returns from the second Southern trip.

The one of yesterday teaches sobriety, reflection, humility.

It is well upon occasion to hear Haydn. His good cheer in these troubled his thoughts, whatever their profundity, his thought, whatever their profundity, the sunny warmth of his melody and the lucid clarity of his scoring, in a day when the strings were fluent and brilliant conversationalists, when the wood wind, without clarinets, rejoined them in pointed dialogue and the brass—a modest pair each of trumpets and horns—discreetly affirmed on occasion, is altogether profitable and improving to the modern ear wherein rubbish at times successfully masquerades. Dr Muck's performance was aglow with freshness and good spirits. The unanimity and quality of the strings was beyond praise.

Would it not be well to lay aside a work like the Brahms concerto unless it can be done with distinction? Those recalling Mr. Witek's playing of four or less seasons ago, when the Beethoven concerto was glorified in his hands, may well have been perplexed at that of yesterday, a performance thoughtful and conscientious, but of curious intonation, of faulty line and wanting in exalted spirit. The beauty of much of the orchestration was revealed, memorably the noble introduction for wood winds to the song of the slow movement, with the oboe's serenely beautiful announcement of the theme. Mr Witek was cordially applauded by colleagues and audience.

Wallenstein's noisy piece should be scored for the band of a military camp with a platoon of trumpets, piccolos, drums and cymbals, to be played each morning at sunrise accompanied with strong drink to cheer the spirits of the soldiers. The performance was resolute.

Week after next the program will be as follows: Cesar Franck's symphony, Liszt's A major concerto for piano (Mr Schelling soloist), Borodin's "In the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

STAR
BALTIMORE.
ress:

SUPERB WORK BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed its powers in great degree at its concert at the Lyric Theater last night. The concert was its second in Baltimore this season. Susan Millar was the special soloist. The program was too generous in its length for a regular symphony orchestra audience. Its two hours, however, could have been less monotonous with certain omissions and substitions.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, Scheherazade, in four movements (after The Thousand Nights and a Night), was the big piece of the concert. It required about three-quarters of an hour for performance. Seldom have Dr. Karl Muck and the orchestra he conducts wrought so well as they did in this composition last night. An orchestral score of such marvelous intricacy as to seem almost impossible to write was played clearly and definitely. The work of the orchestra was superb and showed the suite to fine advantage.

After such a composition the remainder of the program (and there was one hour of "remainder") seemed superfluous, owing to the extent and positiveness of its atmosphere; but, of course, there has to be more at this kind of a concert—and so it was. Miss Millar sang Tschaikowsky's air des adieux from Jeanne d'Arc. The orchestra played Beethoven's Grand Fugue in B flat major for the first time at its concerts here (and may it be the last for some time). Miss Millar sang three songs by Richard Strauss, of which the third number of opus 27, sung last, has been orchestrated by Andre Maquarre, first flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effectively. Then the orchestra played Liszt's sixth symphonic poem, Mazeppa.

Miss Millar's voice is not one of great volume, and so it seldom dominated the music of which hers was the principal part. However, Miss Millar has a voice of genuine beauty, which is rich and full, and she sang in a graceful and polished manner.

BULLETIN
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert of Series at Academy of Music

Johannes Brahms' Symphony in C minor, which had the place of honor in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the current series at the Academy of Music last night, was first played in 1877 and to this day devoted study and various interpretation have not lifted it from among the numerous major works in which composers have postulated ambition rather than genius. It is without inspiration, cryptic, sometimes dull and frequently incoherent to ears not practiced in the appreciation of thematic legerdemain.

The "Till Eulenspiegel" symphonic poem, the second number in importance on last night's program, is a characteristic example of the music with which Richard Strauss, according to his earlier and less charitable critics, debased the orchestra and made it a vehicle of mere noise. The dignity and beauty of the orchestra ensemble, the vivid magnificence of the incomparable string choirs and the polish and elan of each orchestra division, gave to both these compositions a dignity by no means inherent in the score. Dr. Karl Muck conducted the orchestra with his usual frosty precision.

The soloist was Susan Millar, a pupil of Marcella Sembrich, who recently made her debut under Dr. Muck's direction. She sang the familiar "Air des Adieux" from Tchaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," and three songs of Richard Strauss, "Die Nacht," "Morgen" and "Secret Invitation." Miss Millar possesses a soprano of rich and exquisite quality, which seems as yet to be but partly developed. The Berloiz overture to "The Corsair" completed the program.

From the POST
December 3, 1916.

Ernest Schelling, pianist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. He will play Liszt's A-major concerto. The orchestra pieces will be Cesar Frank's symphony; Borodin's charming and colorful "Steppe-Sketch From Middle Asia," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

Mr. George Copeland, pianist, will give his first piano recital of the season in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Copeland will be assisted by Miss Elizabeth Gordon in a Debussy work for two pianos. His programme follows:

Bourree.....Bach
Sonata I—Sonata II.....Scarlatti
Mazurka—Valse—Mazurka.....Chopin
Sonata appassionata.....Beethoven
En Blanc et Noir (pour deux pianos).Debussy
Miss Gordon and Mr. Copeland.
Esquisse (first time).....Stantchinsky
Etude pour les arpeges composes (first time).....Debussy
Etude pour les sonorites opposees (first time).....Debussy
Spanish dances:
Recuer dos.....Grovlez
Malaguena.....Albeniz
Danse Espagnole.....Granados
Soleil a Midi.....Jongen

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Dec. 7 at 8 o'clock. The programme with one exception consists of works which have already been heard at the Boston concerts. The exception is Liszt's concerto in A-major for piano and orchestra, which Ernest Schelling will play.

From the Globe
Dec. 3, 1916.

Ernest Schelling Soloist at This Week's Symphonies

At the seventh pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the symphony will be that of Cesar Franck in D minor. This has come to be generally regarded as one of the noblest works in modern symphonic literature, and under Dr. Muck it has taken its place with the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms in having a performance practically every other year. It was last played here two years ago next Spring, which happened to be the second performance in successive seasons. Dr Muck put it on one of the programs of the San Francisco concerts.

The second part of the program contains a work which will be to all intents and purposes a novelty, Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien." This has not been played here since the season of 1902-03, in Mr. Gericke's time. The orchestra included it in one of its San Francisco programs in the Spring of 1915, but it is reaching a Boston program for the first time under Dr Muck.

The soloist will be the admirable pianist, Ernest Schelling, who has worthily won a place in the favor of the Boston public. He will play Liszt's Second Concerto in A major. Weber's overture, "Euryantha," will complete the selections.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. The program with one exception consists of works which have already been heard at the Boston concerts. The exception is Liszt's Concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra, which Ernest Schelling will play. He is to play the same work Friday and Saturday of this week at the Symphony concerts in Boston. The program reads: Haydn's Symphony in C-minor, No. 9; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp;" Liszt, Concerto in A-major, and Berlioz, Overture to "The Corsair."

From the Journal
Dec. 9, 1916.

RECITALS BILLED FOR NEXT WEEK

Oscar Seagle, baritone, who has heretofore been heard in Boston only once, will give a recital of songs and operatic numbers, Monday afternoon, in Jordan Hall. Mr. Seagle has held a prominent place in Paris for years as an exponent of voice production, and was for a long time associated with Jean de Reszke in his work. For the past few seasons he has gained like success in New York, where he ranks high among concert singers. Mr. Seagle's program is made up of Italian, French, German and English songs.

Harold Bauer's program, "Composers of Today," announced for his second recital next Saturday afternoon in Jordan Hall, will be deferred until January. Instead Mr. Bauer will give a Schumann-Chopin program, as follows:

Fantasia in C major, Op. 17.....Schumann
Ballade in F major.....Chopin
Ballade in F minor.....Chopin
Ballade in A flat.....Chopin
Ballade in G minor.....Chopin
Papillons.....Schumann
Toccata.....Schumann
Etude in C minor.....Chopin
Nocturne in F sharp minor.....Chopin
Scherzo in C sharp minor.....Chopin

From the Globe
Dec. 10, 1916.

Eighth Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The orchestral feature of the eighth Symphony program next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Tschaikowsky's first suite for orchestra in D minor, op 43. This will come as a novelty to practically all the patrons of the Symphony concerts, for it has been played here but once and then nearly 18 years ago. Mr Gericke presented it March 17 and 18, 1899.

At that time he did not play it in its entirety, having left out the fourth movement, "Marche Miniature," which, according to the composer's direction, may be played ad libertum after the intermezzo.

The Symphony audiences are quite familiar with the third suite in G major, which was a favorite with Mr Gericke and Mr Fiedler. Its final number is a set of variations which end with the very brilliant Polacca. The first suite, which Dr Muck has chosen, is in six parts. The first is an introduction and fugue; the second a divertimento; the third, intermezzo; fourth, "March Miniature;" fifth, scherzo, and sixth, gavotte.

The soloist will be Elene Gerhardt, who has not been heard here for three seasons. Miss Gerhardt will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first will be three songs by Wagner, "Stehe Still," "Traume" and Schmerzen." The second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf, "Verborgenheit," "Der Freund" and "Er ist's."

The first number on the program will be Mozart's Symphony in D major No. 35, announced for a fortnight ago, but replaced by the Haydn C minor Symphony.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr Ernst Kunwald director, will appear Thursday evening, Jan 11, in Symphony Hall.

From the Herald
Dec. 3, 1916.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY

The program of the Symphony concerts for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include Cesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, one of the noblest works in modern symphonic literature. Dr. Muck conducts it con amore. It was last played here two years ago next spring; it was the second performance in successive seasons. Dr. Muck put it on one of the programs of the San Francisco concerts. The second part of the program contains a work to all intents and purposes a novelty, Borodin's "On the Steppes: a Sketch of Middle Asia." This has not been played here since the season of 1902-03, in Mr. Gericke's time. The soloist will be Ernest Schelling, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A-major. The program as it stands reads: Franck, symphony in D-minor; Liszt, concerto in A-major, No. 2; Borodin's "sketch" and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will include Liszt's concerto in A major, which Ernest Schelling will play; Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9; Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," and Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair."

EVENING WORLD
ess: New York

The Boston Orchestra's programme for its concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon included Brahms's first symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody. A brief word from a clever and intellectual woman, which reached me last night, shall serve for my comment upon it. She writes: "Imagine the Boston Symphony giving a programme so wonderfully tender as this! From beginning to end it was of rarest sweetness and majesty. The Brahms number deeply moved me."

[53]

From the American
Dec. 10, 1916.

Miss Gerhardt as Symphony Soloist

THE orchestral feature of the eighth Symphony program, which will be played Friday afternoon, December 15, and Saturday evening, December 16, will be Tschaikowsky's First Suite for Orchestra in D-Minor Opus 43.

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, who has not been heard here for three seasons. Miss Gerhardt will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first will be three songs by Wagner, "Stehe still," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf, "Verborgenheit," "Der Freund" and "Er ist's."

The first number on the program will be Mozart's Symphony in D-Major No. 35.

From the
Transcript
Dec. "81916.

CURRENT CONCERTS

Mr. Schelling with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge—Haydn and the Smetana of "Wallenstein's Camp" Again—Mr. Gardner Individualizes Himself as a Violinist

FOR the third symphony concert of its series, Cambridge received Thursday evening two numbers from the last programme of Boston: Haydn's little known Symphony in C minor, and Smetana's tone picture of Wallenstein's Camp; one from the very beginnings: Berlioz's "Corsair," and, as a foretaste of music to come, Mr. Ernest Schelling and the less familiar of Liszt's two concertos. This one does not show Liszt at his best by any means. One feels, while listening to it, that he was not held and moved by a unifying impulse of inspiration, but rather turned suddenly loose in his two favorite media, that he might run riot in them. There are no indelible themes to characterize the whole—Lizst has done far better in each medium, with a definite subject before him. This is little more than a great mass of color and motion, with a fine dash and go to it all. The part to which Mr. Schelling had set himself offered him small opportunity for individual expression. It is never mere virtuosity—simply broad sweeps of pianistic tone to heighten the effect. Mr. Schelling threw himself into it with a will, and all the abandon which his nature would permit, but one would have preferred a Paderewski, even in his most excessive moments—he would have slapped on color far more bravely. In the softer and more poetic passages, Mr. Schelling revealed, in stress and pause, a sense of dramatic contrast, for these portions were nothing more than foils to the splendors of a Lisztian orchestra at its largest. In his choice of last night, he gave himself little chance to communicate his peculiar abilities and charms.

Call Haydn trivial and superficial if you will, but there is no denying the fact that his music wears well. This semi-obscure symphony in C minor, given one more performance before being put away again, for years, possibly, has nevertheless its defined and charactered beauties, which shine forth the more strongly and convincingly on a second hearing. But if there is anything to prejudice us in Haydn's favor, it is Dr. Muck's emphasizing and subduing each part and passage to perfection, and guiding his responsive orchestra with his sensitive fingers through every finest shade of tempo and stress. To hear the orchestra tempered and balanced to the delicate ornament of the Andante, the lively and even spirit of the minuet (a minuet to carry away and remember), and the sportive buoyancy of the brief finale, is to wonder whether any orchestra in the world could improve on such a performance. And then, too, the intimacy of Haydn is suited to Sanders Theatre, as the brilliance of Liszt is suited to Symphony Hall.

If Haydn's C minor symphony is a revival which we put away with regret, "Wallenstein's Camp," consigned to the dust once more, gives us a feeling of relief at a duty performed. Its rough and ready crudities in form and statement are frank and outspoken enough—they are also faithful to the subject, but we have soon had enough of them. It is a lesser work in every sense—the themes are of half-way importance, and the various incidents occur in entirely casual and loose succession. The slow portion is theatrical in the cheapest sense; the fine flourish of trumpets emphasizes the mediocrity of the march theme it so elaborately introduces. There is a clamorous, rugged satisfaction in a single hearing—but once is enough. If Berlioz's "Corsair" is also a lesser work, it is the lesser work of a greater genius—which is an important point. In contrast with the former, it is well-knit, more skillfully put together in every part, better calculated and graded in climax, and more effective in color scheme. Where the other impresses with the blare of mere noise, this conveys a fine, inspiriting zest.

From the Monitor
Dec. 9, 1916.

DR. MUCK'S MEN PLAY FRANCK AND BORODIN WORKS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Ernest Schelling, Soloist—Seventh program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Dec. 8: Franck, symphony in D minor; Liszt, concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra; Borodin, orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia"; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe."

In the D minor symphony Franck attained, without any doubt, the object which Nineteenth Century composers most diligently sought. He wrote music that has unity. He produced something that gives the impression of wholeness, that conveys a sustained, organic and original message. He expressed both himself and his time, and he did it in a way appropriate to the orchestra. But it is a question whether the complete, expressive and appropriate message of his, the one in which the man and the period are summed up, is not solely in the last two-thirds of the work. It is a question whether the first movement, whatever its merits in point of thematic structure, or whatever its appeal in point of loftiness of mood, is not, in the most searching analysis, superfluous. For what it says was either nearly as well said before Franck entered musical history, or else it has been better said since; while what the allegretto and finale say was never hinted at by any previous composer, and has never required retelling by a later one.

For all purposes of present-day composing, Franck had sufficient material to make a symphony, either in the strict, four-movement form, or in the free, tone-poem style, right in the first third of his plan. He could have gone on elaborating what he started with and have come out with a piece that would deserve performance once a decade, if not oftener, by an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His composition would have been a welcome resource to the program maker on a day when a moderately interesting selection was needed to set off the performance of a distinguished soloist, or when gray background was desired for some brilliant orchestral production. The score, standing on the library shelf, would attract a conductor seeking something for revival as effectually as would a score by Bruckner or Mahler, to say the least.

But Franck went further than his duty merely as a composer demanded, and gave voice to his thoughts as poet and seer. He wrote the allegretto and finale. And in the pages of these movements he enlarged men's artistic vision, just as Beethoven did in the scherzo and finale of his fifth symphony. That these pages, however, make a practicable piece of music without the first movement, could not be asserted. Misadjustments of key would arise from an independent performance of them. And anyway, the three-movement work was what Franck wrote as the D minor symphony, so that whatever is less than that could not pass as his intention. At the same time, the allegretto alone is a possibility, making a vivid incidental piece, as the program which the dancer, Miss Isadora Duncan, lately gave in New York proved. On that occasion, used as an interlude, it was fervently and persuasively presented by an orchestra which Oscar Spirescu led.

The symphony, in all its divisions, was read with clear outline, judicious balance of tone and exalted interpretive purpose by Dr. Muck. In particular, as to balance, the string section of the orchestra was well subordinated, though Franck himself looked out for this point in no small degree by his restrained scoring. The unfamiliar short number by Borodin turned out a happier choice than the Smetana "Wallenstein" symphonic poem, which was played two weeks ago. Its delightful tunes and rhythms recalled the visits of the Russian dancers. It deserves a more prominent place in the repertory than it has held. The solo number was conscientiously played all around, the visiting artist doing his day's work diligently, the men in the orchestra playing their notes accurately and giving a good bargain in tone. But there was little in the interpretation of the concerto to disturb the calm course of anybody's thinking or to do anything but reaffirm that Mr. Schelling is an accomplished pianist, and that the Symphony men can toss off a performance of the easier music of Liszt as gaily as they can overtures of Weber.

From the Transcript
Dec. 9, 1916.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A HACKNEYED OVERTURE AND A CLEAR MORAL

Borodin's Tone-Picturing in an Unfamiliar and Vivid Piece—Liszt's Rhapsodic Second Concerto, with Mr. Schelling for Dry and Exact Pianist—The Renewed Glories of Franck's Symphony, Eloquently Played

FOR the first time in the present course of the Symphony Concerts what may be called fairly a hackneyed piece stood yesterday on Dr. Muck's programme—Weber's overture to his opera of "'Euryanthe." Moreover audience, orchestra and ever so little, perhaps, the conductor himself gave unmistakable signs that they so regarded it. According to Dr. Muck's custom with "brilliant overtures," it ended the concert, but before it began there was a more numerous exodus than usual from every part of the house. The band set to the music in a performance plainly routine and perfunctory as of men staled to the task. Only in the relatively few measures of the largo were there beauty of tone, finesse of phrasing, atmospheric suggestion. The rest the orchestra ran off dutifully, capably, but with little of the ardor of pace, progression and climax, the theatrical emphasis, the romantic exuberance, the heat and light presumed to make the overture perennially fresh and kindling. Nor to some ears, did the conductor, outside the largo again, bestir himself to the illusion of the theatre that he often works with these operatic overtures.

Exactly how the custom arose at the Symphony Concerts of the playing of Weber's overtures in alternate seasons and even oftener, as though they were at a musical par with the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms no one seems able to explain. By clear token, however, it has prevailed too long and the overture to "Euryanthe," along with those to "Oberon" and "Der Freischütz" might well be withdrawn for a while from the active repertory to almost certain increase, when they are restored to it, of zest for them alike in audience and orchestra. Now they have been played so often that both instinctively follow them by rote or feel the shortcomings more than they do the virtues of the music. But the retort will come—a conductor must find playable overtures somewhere. They are useful pieces with which to begin or end the second part of a Symphony Concert; not a few of them are imaginative or fanciful, eloquent or entertaining; as many more have been known to please listening ears. True, indeed, but to turn to the appendix of Mr. Howe's history of the orchestra, which lists every piece that it has played in thirty years, is to discover that not a few such overtures have been overlooked until they have passed from both repertory and memory. Mr. Gericke was diligent and fruitful in discovery and revival among them. Since his departure, twelve years ago, and alike, under Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler, the active list of them has narrowed until now it is settled in a routine that nowhere else infects the Symphony Concerts. It is high time for broadening and freshening.

The rest of the programme did not lack fresh interest and one piece—Borodin's symphonic sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"—was novel to all but the relatively few that had heard it as an intermezzo in a recent performance here by the Russian Ballet. In a sense the sketch which is barely ten minutes long and a transparent music, is only a trifle; but such brevity saves Borodin from his usual pitfall of slightly varied repetition of his musical thought without much development or advance, while it concentrates the suggestion of his melody and rhythm, harmonic and instrumental color. There is tone-picturing in the piece—of a vast expanse of high plateau in thin dry air under a clouded sky and lifeless light, picturing that would hold for Canadian as well as Asiatic wastes. Into the music enters the winding caravan and the escorting soldiers in persistently rhythmed pace. Sharp upon the ear, near or distant, fall the marching songs of both. The Asiatics chant wearily, mournfully; the Russians sing in heartier and brighter strain and mode. The train recedes; afar the reiterated refrains blend curiously; again solitude descends upon the roof of the world. The design, stirring Borodin's imagination and lying well within his invention and procedure, completely accomplishes the end. The music works illusion of place and scene; keen rhythms keep it in characterizing motion; the Asiatic and the Russian melodies have pith, point, individuality; they and the whole piece are seemingly stripped and skeletonized; yet they do not lack vitality, character, color. For once there was not an allowance to make for Borodin. He fluously fulfilled his purpose without a superfis the or a halting measure. The sketch often lavished cameo among music that he edged. [illegible]ly factured and rough-

Fresh, too, relatively, Liszt's piano concertos in which second, [illegible]ling played the virtuoso part. Neither piece has been frequent in recent years at Symphony Hall and for half a century the concerto of yesterday has escaped the fate of its hackneyed fellow. Perhaps it asks more of the pianist. If he be virtuoso, musician and ardent spirit at all worthy the names, the changeful, exuberant, mounting course of the first concerto, the vivid transformations and the glowing expansion of the melodies, the flights and flares of the ornament, the hot creative intensity of the whole will sweep him forward, riding, as it were, upon the music from the first measure to the last. Not so with the second concerto. It lacks melodic distinction; the reincarnations of the motives are by no means as inventive and eloquent; the fine ardors of the earlier piece decline now and then into something like mere procedure with the job. What remains and what [illegible] showers upon the [illegible] unconsciously Liszt [illegible] the earlier concerto as a composer who was also a pianist; the later as a pianist who was also a composer.

As a pianist Liszt was wont to take fire, and so in this concerto in A major the solo part runs in rhapsodic vein. Sometimes it is as though the piano would silence the orchestra by the blows of its chords; again it answers it as out of barely interrupted musings: now it continues with its own song and its own fancies, letting the orchestra merely pick them up and embroider; or once more it springs actively to the marshalling of the whole music. Finally it seizes it altogether for its own, shivers it into dazzling fragments, pelters it with ornament, bestrews it with color, whirls it from pattern to pattern, like the falling glass in a kaleidoscope; alternately melting and welding it in the glow of superheated ardor. The progress of the orchestral part becomes a mere shaky scaffolding for the design; the instruments of the orchestra mere palettes for more and more color. It was Mr. Schelling's good forunte to play this unique piano part lucidly and exactly in the dry light of highly intelligent, carefully meditated, technically flawless accomplishment. It was his ill fortune and still more his audience's that he played it altogether without rhapsodic ardor, romantic glow or re-creative fire. If such a paradox were possible, it was a Brahmsian performance of Liszt.

What Mr. Schelling missed in the concerto, Dr. Muck and the orchestra outpoured upon it whenever they could do so without injustice to the painstaking pianist. In Borodin's sketch they heard the composer's voice, caught his colors, etched an incisive music upon the ear. They were most eloquent, however, in the biennial repetition of Franck's symphony in D minor, a modern classic now beyond peradventure, as firmly set in any catholic orchestral repertory as is the first symphony of Brahms—and every whit as enkindling upon players and hearers. The first movement rose out of the tonal shadow in which it begins into the tonal magnificence into which it expands in a true might and majesty of line and sweep. So may a great and noble building rise, perhaps, in some exalted moment before an architect's imagination. Through these spacious and luminous chambers rang the voice which is the voice of Franck and of none other, singing, as in the best remembered of the recurring melodies, in tones poignant with spiritual eagerness, piercing and peering into ecstasy; or plangent, as in many a "great crescendo" or "great climax" with the power and the riches of a spirit charged with pure and deep emotion; or bright, as the world and human nature are bright, with the zest and the victory of life well lived and high ends stressfully and ardently gained. Substance, structure and spirit are perfectly matched in this music of Franck and yesterday the performance was as closely wrought within them.

The playing of the second movement—the little picture that Franck has paused, as it sometimes seems, to draw of himself while he stood apart from the spiritual contest of the rest of the music—was as perfect in its quality. The dreamy Franck withdrawn into his own tender visions may plausibly speak out of the melody of the English horn as it fell yesterday upon touched and almost seeing ears; the musing playfulness of the scherzo-like passages is the "bon père Franck" whom his Parisian intimates knew and loved. Then the return in the finale to the passionate stress of the spiritual conflict, the upward surge higher and higher, glowing and more glowing, sweep upon sweep power upon power, into the spiritual victory and the deep radiance of glad triumph for a soul that was very human with all its ecstatic exaltations. As that soul flood the music, so Dr. Muck and the orchestra flooded their hearers with its passion power, ascent and joy. Not even in the finale of Brahms's companion symphon do they scale higher or brighter height of eloquence.

Once more the wonder grew that at lea half a generation in music—the symphon dates from 1889—was deaf to it in Franc in Germany, in the United States, in th whole world, almost, that hears high syn phonic music intelligently, receptivel gladly. Time and again, there is occ sion for wonder over the lot of music th is at first rejected and scorned; then, lo afterward, accepted and acclaimed. As now seems, what ear hearing, what mi understanding, what imagination kindli could have failed of response to Franck music? Yet Bizet's "Carmen," as clear a masterpiece in its kind, was similarly fated to fall and rise again and in this day and year there are not a few who still sit cold and doubting before the wondrous beauty of "The Fire-Bird" and the wondrous power of "Pétrouchka." Some one ought to write a book about these paradoxes of [illegible]

From the Transcript
Dec. 11, 1916.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

FRANCK'S SYMPHONY TO UNUSUAL APPLAUSE

His Music, Wagner's and Their Hold Upon the Public in Frequent Repetition—Mr. Copeland's Distinctions and Limitations Again—Two of Debussy's New Studies for the First Time—Mme. Carreno Uneven in Familiar Pieces, and Mr. Graveure Various in Sentimental Song

WHEN Dr. Muck and his orchestra came to the end of Franck's symphony on Saturday evening, the applause was longer and louder than any heard in Symphony Hall for such a piece since the revived Liszt's Faust Symphony, nearly two years ago. Even at the close of the first movement, the plaudits had been so insistent that the band finally rose to receive them; while at the close of the whole symphony, the listeners were not content until the conductor had returned a third time and the orchestra, once more standing in acknowledgment, had begun to disperse for the intermission. Moreover, while the performance continued, the audience not only listened intently, but stirred and rapt, plainly reacted upon Dr. Muck and his forces and indeed hearer upon hearer. To such happy estate has Franck's symphony now deservedly come at the Symphony Concerts. It is institutional in that the public of the concerts now expects to hear it every other season; but not so institutional that many ears take it—and the performance—for granted as they are prone to do with certain symphonies and overtures of Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann similarly repeated. As the signs go, repetition of Franck's symphony seems to quicken most hearers to new enjoyment and conductor and players to new eloquence, even as does such of the music of Wagner as the range of the Symphony Concerts permits.

With the pieces of both composers o or two reasons for such enjoyment and citement stand clear. The more signi cant motives of Wagner's music—like t phrase of fate in the prelude to "Trista or the measures of suffering and salvati in the prelude to "Parsifal"—arrest a stir even careless ears. Forthwith t expand into melodies that with all ner's intricate adorning, intertwining transforming of them, are yet more p nant until the hearer falls completely w in the illusion and the stimulation of music. It is so also with the motives Franck's symphony. No sooner are t heard—and they are readily recognizabi than they engross. No sooner do they pand and bear their part in the whole d sign and the whole voice of the sympho than they thrill. They are not baffling t the lay ear as, unfortunately, is one and an other theme in Brahms's symphonies; the are not musical thoughts of no keen im pression and warm emotion in themselve as are many a motive in Strauss's ton poems or Mahler's symphonies, which b comes significant and puissant only wh the composer vitalizes it in the magic augmentation and transformation, instr mental and harmonic dress. Wagner's pe vasive motives and Franck's with the are of immediate and intrinsic beauty a eloquence.

So, too, with what may be called t emotional design of Wagner's preludes of Franck's symphony. The listener m be deaf to the contrapuntal invention a imagination of the prelude to "Die Meist singer," but before it has proceeded fi measures he knows it for a glowing romantic, pictorial, heart-warming a songful music. Similarly, he may nev have heard of Franck's theory and practi of the "cyclic form" or of Mr. d'Indy learned exposition thereof, but he quic discovers, and more and more deeply fe the long and luminous ascent of the Pari an's symphony from darkness into radian and the magnificent march of the fina triumphant motive through tonal str and conflict. Most modern music, thou the composer may swear it is "absolut yet has an informing and cumulative e tional design. It is better, with W ner and with Franck, to write this gramme in the large phrases of the mu itself than, with Strauss and Liszt, in t minutiæ of the printed leaf.

From the Traveler
Dec. 9, 1916,

Tschaikowsky Number to Be Given for First Time Since 1899.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

There is a double treat in store for music lovers in next week's Symphony concerts in the presentation of Tschaikowsky's First Suite for orchestra, which has not appeared on the Symphony program since 1899, when Mr. Gericke was conductor, and in the appearance of Elena Gerhardt as soloist. It is three seasons since Miss Gerhardt has sung with the orchestra. The program will be:

Mozart—Symphony in D major, No. 35.
Wagner—Three songs with orchestra:
(a) Stehe still.
(b) Traume.
(c) Schmerzen.
Hugo Wolf—Three songs with orchestra:
(a) Verborgenheit.
(b) Der Freund.
(c) Er ist's.
Tschaikowsky—Suite, No. 1, in D minor, op. 43.

[54]

From the Advertiser
Dec. 9, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES PLEASING PROGRAM

ERNST SCHELLING VERY SUCCESSFUL IN CONCERTO

Afternoon Devoted to Concert Of Moderate Moderns—Franck Well Performed

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Program.

Franck. Symphony in D minor.
Liszt. Piano Concerto, No. 2, A major. Ernst Schelling, Soloist.
Borodin. "Eine Steppenskizze."
Weber. "Euryanthe."

Entirely a 19th century program, a concert of moderate moderns. Not any dissonant experiments, yet contrasted enough to avoid all trace of monotony. What is there to be said that is new regarding Cesar Franck's D minor symphony? Every concert-goer is familiar with the great work, yet in this case familiarity only breeds increased esteem. It is a work which bears repeated hearing, since good counterpoint never grows threadbare, and Franck was as thorough as any contrapuntist of modern times.

The manner in which the important three-noted figure of the first movement (first cousin to Wagner's Fate motive and Beethoven's "Muss es sein?") is treated, is always enthralling, and its clearness as given by our orchestra is always a subject for praise. The first movement is the most perfect gem of the entire work and it was grandly performed.

The melancholy brooding which characterizes much of the work is by no means lachrymose; Cesar Franck was far removed from being a Mrs. Gummidge; and the lack of a Scherzo is not seriously felt (there is a central theme of Scherzo character), since its lightness might have jarred on the three movements written. Schumann once wrote a symphony without a slow movement; why should not Franck compose one without a Scherzo?

The playing of the English horn in the slow movement was especially commendable, and its sombre tone-color suited finely to the pensive character of this impressive movement. The material carried over into the Finale from the two preceding movements was very clearly brought into the foreground in Dr. Muck's reading. The playing of the brasses was phenomenally good, and the noble and sincere work aroused absolute enthusiasm.

Then came Mr. Schelling with the second Listz concerto. Not quite so peppery a work as the E-flat concerto with its triangle tinklings and its emphatic opening figure, but less of a rhapsody and more of a true concerto. The elements of the regular three movements can easily be discovered in its long single-movement form. The chief theme at the beginning, with its many subsequent metamorphoses, is as attractive and impressive as anything that Liszt ever wrote. Excellently did Mr. Schelling give this theme in various phases, and the violoncello, too, made a good effect with one transformation.

The ensemble of the scintillating work was excellent, for there was a poet at the piano and another on the conductor's stand. Dr. Muck is revealing all the glory of Liszt to Boston. We only wish that we could import Dr. Villiers Stanford from England to our city to hear the Faust Symphony, which is coming again soon; it might convert him from writing sentences like these:—

"In writing he (Liszt) was always a virtuoso first and a composer afterward . . . He produced two pianoforte concertos which by virtue of their wonderful technical effectiveness still survive. . . Two grandoise, but unconvincing symphonies—Dante and Faust."

Mr. Schelling was fully up to the technical requirements of the difficult work and fairly won a triumph in it. He was recalled over and over again, and his excellent work deserved the ovation. In the Coda of the finale our kettle-drummer let himself loose in good and fortissimo earnest. Why not give this artist a solo for once? Why not produce Tausch's Concerto for kettle-drum and orchestra? It would be a curiosity at least.

The scene now shifted from Hungary to the Orient. It has been often said:—"Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar"; but Borodin, direct descendant from Imerian princes, who in turn claimed their direct descent from King David, has come into his Orientalism by inheritance. His "Sketch of the Steppes in Central Asia" is almost a companion piece to David's "Le Desert." It is such a graphic picture that we wonder that it has been heard so seldom in the Symphony concerts.

The loneliness of the Steppes, the peaceful Russian song that is given, the Oriental melody that follows and intertwines, the approach and departure of the Caravan into the distance (a little of the "Turkish Patrol" business here, however), and the final suggestion of wide and desolate expanse, are all dramatic points which are well worked up and sufficiently clear "program-music" to make a strong appeal to every auditor. The horns and English horn were in the foreground in this work, which was short and picturesque.

Finally came the dramatic "Euryanthe" overture, which smells a trifle of the footlights, as much of Weber's music does, but which is brilliant and exciting none the less. Dr. Muck plunged into "medias res" with the very first measures of the work, which were made furiously rapid and powerful. Contrasts were not lacking, and sharp ones, too, and the second theme with its tenderness and the beautiful slow episode in the centre of the work (the scene of the ghost) were very effective, while the climax of the end was superbly worked up. Altogether, then, a concert of varied style, even though it was devoted to what in European politics would be called the members of the "left centre"—the conservative moderns.

From the Journal
Dec. 7, 1916.

DR. MUCK TO LEAD FRANCK SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck has made up the following program for this week's Symphony concerts: Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck; symphonic sketch, "On the Steps of Middle Asia," Borodin; "Euryanthe," overture, Weber; concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra, by Liszt, with Ernest Schelling as soloist.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, will give a recital at Steinert Hall this afternoon.

George Copeland's first recital of the season will take place at Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon. In the performance of Debussy's "En Blanc et Noir" he will have the assistance of Miss Elizabeth Gordon.

At Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon the soloists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, the famous pianist, and Louis Graveure, barytone, one of the most brilliant singers of the day.

The seat sale for the "Messiah" performances by the Handel and Haydn Society will open next Monday at Symphony Hall.

Osar Seagle, barytone and former assistant to Jean de Reszke, will give a recital at Jordan Hall next Monday afternoon.

From the Journal
Dec. 16, 1916.

GERHARDT HAS SUCCESS AS A SYMPHONY STAR

On the Symphony program this week are numbers that have not been presented for a long time. Elena Gerhardt returns with songs by Wagner and Hugo Wolf, which have not been heard since this admirable German artiste was here three years ago. The Mozart symphony in D major is being performed for the first time in seven years. The Tschaikowsky suite in D minor now is, at last, being presented in its entirety here. When it was heard before, in 1899, the Marche Miniature was omitted.

It is altogether one of the season's choicest programs. The grace and elegance of the Mozart symphony can hardly be brought out more effectively than at present, under Dr. Muck's direction. Miss Gerhardt's beauty of voice and beautifully finished artistry gave rare distinction to the performance of three Wagner songs, "Stand Still," "Dreams" and "Sorrows," and three Wolf songs, 'Retirement," "The Friend" and "'Tis Spring." The Tschaikowsky suite is divided into six parts, each one of which has a piquancy all its own. To most of the Symphony patrons the whole suite, and not the Marche Miniature alone, comes as a novelty.

Miss Gerhardt was recalled several times after each of her appearances. It was a notable triumph for this talented lieder singer—a handsome and generous recognition of her artistic efforts. Dr. Muck conducted a most sympathetic accompaniment for her.

Paderewski will be the soloist at next week's concerts. These will be his only appearances with the orchestra in Boston this season. He has chosen to play the Schumann concerto in A minor. Undoubtedly he will add encore pieces, this being his exclusive privilege at the Symphony concerts. The first and only other number on the set program is Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which had such a sensational success when it was performed here two years ago. The Choral Music Society and Arthur Hackett, the tenor, will assist.

[55]

From the Herald
Dec. 16, 1916.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S 8TH CONCERT

Mozart, Wagner, Tshaikowsky and Others Figure on the Program—Miss Elena Gerhardt Sings with Her Accustomed Warmth of Feeling—Vocally Well Disposed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 385); Wagner, songs with orchestra: Stehe Still, Traeume, Schmerzen: Wolf, songs with orchestra, Der Freund. Verborgenheit, Er ist's (Miss Elena Gerhardt); Tschaikowsky, Suite No. 1 in D minor, op. 43.

This symphony in D major of Mozart is ranked as one of the lesser ones, and there are traces of the fact that the composer thought of it first in the form of a serenade: witness the Andante and the Minuetto. It is said that he wrote it in great haste; but he had the gift of inventing before he set pen to paper. There are charming pages in this symphony, which is peculiarly Mozartian throughout. No wonder that the Austrian Emperor, who attended the concert when the symphony was first performed, was greatly pleased; and that the audience, as stated by a contemporary musical magazine, applauded in a manner "unexampled in the concert history of Vienna." There is the simplicity in this music that is described by Walt Whitman as "the art of art, the glory of expression, and the sunshine of the light of letters." This simplicity of Mozart is too often a stumbling block to those who are moved by the roar or ingenious trickery of the modern orchestra and do not concern themselves with the character of the musical thoughts, often thin, pale, inconsequential but robed in instrumental garments of gorgeous or extravagant colors.

Tschaikowsky's Suite had not been heard at these concerts since March, 1899. When Mr. Gericke brought it out, the amusing Marche Miniature was omitted, for, although the score contained it, the parts then at hand were without it. The music evidently pleased the audience yesterday, but as a whole the Suite is one of Tschaikowky's minor works. The salient features are the Fugue and the Marche. The former is impressively worked out. The latter though to some it suggests a somewhat like treatment in a movement of the "Nutcracker" Suite, will always tickle hearers. We remember when the Suite was produced in Berlin by the Philharmonic Society then led by Franz Wuellner. We sat behind Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, the author of a bitter pamphlet against "Tristan and Isolde," a savage critic, a thoroughly equipped musician. Berlin was not friendly, then, toward Tschaikowsky or other contemporary composers of France and Russia. Old Dorn and his companions nodded approval of the Fugue and were highly entertained by the Marché Miniature. This was in 1883. Alas, the fleeting years!

The Divertimento and Intermezzo are pleasingly melodious and adroitly colored; but the Introduction to the Fugue is weak and long-drawn out, and the Gavotte, having little character, as a finale is far inferior to the pompous and brilliant Polonaise that ends the Third Suite. In the Introduction to the Fugue and in the middle movements, except the Marche,' there are too many examples of Tschaikowsky's worst mannerisms: as the frequent repetition of inconsiderable phrases tossed from one section of the orchestra to another.

Miss Gerhardt brought nothing new. Even "Stehe Still," unfamiliar perhaps to some in the audience, had been sung by her at a Pension Fund Concert; but she sang the songs of Wagner and Wolf with her accustomed warmth of feeling, her indisputable sincerity, and, when occasion demanded, with the "Innigkeit" that puts a hearer in close communion with a singer. She sings with such gusto, to use a favorite word of Hazlitt, that even when her intonation is occasionally insecure, an audience is unmindful. Yesterday, as a rule, she was vocally well-disposed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in which a male chorus from the Choral Music Society and Arthur Hackett, tenor, will assist, and Schumann's piano concerto, played by Mr. Paderewski.

From the SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
DEC 17

[illegible] SYMPHONY

Schumann's lovely Symphony in E flat major, "Rhenish," will be the feature of the third Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, January 3. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, who will play the admirable Concerto in E minor by his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

From the Post
Dec. 16, 1916.

MOZART'S SYMPHONY ENJOYED

Miss Gerhardt, the Soloist, Well Received

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 5) and Tschaikowsky's 1st Suite, op. 43, in D minor, and these songs, sung by Elena Gerhardt: "Stehe Stille," "Schmerzen," "Traume," Wagner; "Verborgenheit," "Der Freunde," "Er Ists," Wolf.

A WELCOME REVIVAL

Mozart's symphony was revived after an absence of years from these programmes, and the revival was undoubtedly a welcome one, for the symphony is exceedingly fresh and brilliant. The writing in the first movement is remarkable for its impetuousness, its bold dissonances, rhythmic force, and, in one or two places, striking modulations. Of the last three movements, what need be said save that they each, in the proverbial classic manner, showed Mozart at his best, a master of melody and of perfect form, and of very simple but beautiful and often highly original instrumentation. The finale is exceedingly bright and humorous.

Miss Gerhardt has a beautiful voice. Its texture and its inherent loveliness grow on one. It has the substance and quality of the best German voices, and it is not subjected to the unskilful and unpleasant treatment that German singers too often bestow on their voices. We would rather hear songs originally composed with orchestral accompaniment than to hear songs with accompaniment orchestrated from a piano version, even if the orchestration be the composer's own. But the songs heard yesterday made an immediate appeal and they were interpreted with exceptional sympathy. One wishes, for that matter, that there were not so much sympathy for so sentimental an outpouring as "Verborgenheit," but if this song is to be sung, then Miss Gerhardt is particularly well equipped by voice and by her sincerity for its interpretation.

Tschaikowsky's Suite is of uneven worth. So far as national coloring goes, it might have been written by any gifted German. But national coloring is not everything. Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch once said to us that he believed the Russian composer who had gone deepest, and who represented his country most significantly and characteristically in music was not the Rimsky-Korsakoff of "Sadko," "Antar," "Scherazade, or the Mussorgsky of "Boris" and "Khovantschina"; or the Balakireff of "Thamar" or the Borodine of the symphonies, quartets, songs, and the opera "Prince Igor," but—Tschaikowsky, who, by and large, in quantity and quality, remained the greatest Russian of them all. The music heard yesterday is not Tschaikowsky at his greatest or even his most sustained excellence, but much of it is entertaining and well written, and this pleased the audience greatly. The poorest movements of the suite, for us, are the waltz and gavotte which brings the conclusion. This is trivial stuff, open to more than a suspicion of routine and midnight oil. The finest piece of the six is undoubtedly the fugue, with its romantic introduction. The "March Miniature" is witty, although written in a way not wholly new. The orchestration of the suite is often piquant, and occasionally there is a dash of Slavic color. The performance was warmly applauded.

From the Record
Dec. 15, 1916.

Have Gala Program

The Symphony Orchestra concerts next Friday and Saturday will present the gala program of the year. There will be two numbers, Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A-minor, with Paderewski as soloist. In the Liszt symphony the male chorus will be that of the Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend conductor.

For the second part only the concerto is announced, but Paderewski will undoubtedly add encores. Like De Pachmann and Sembrich there seems to be a special dispensation for him which allows him to break the no-encore rule. By the way, Paderewski's deferred recital will be given at Symphony Hall, Sunday, Jan. 14.

Sunday night, at the Copley Theatre, Albert Spalding, the violinist, and John Powell, the pianist, will give a recital for the benefit of French musicians. It is given under the auspices of the Division of Music at Harvard.

From the
Globe
Dec. 16, 1916.

EIGHTH CONCERT

Dr Muck Conducts Suite of Tschaikowsky

Elena Gerhardt Interprets Ably Songs by Wagner and Wolf

The eighth Friday afternoon Symphony concert was held yesterday, Dr Muck conducted. Elena Gerhardt was the soloist. The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in D K 385 and Tschaikowsky's first suite in D minor.

The minuet of the symphony is charming, and the last movement a frieze, engrossing in the delicacy and elegance of its pattern, one in which figure pursues figure with a fleetness and lightness that when heard as yesterday is ravishing. Friends appear engaged in enlivening conversation, illumined with flights of brilliant repartee. Wit flashes from one to another among the string choirs, and all is exuberance and zest. And with vivacity, a patrician elegance goes along, a finesse in which Dr Muck and the virtuosi, particularly of the viol family, displayed their fleet skill, not forgetting the ponderous contrabasses who flourished up and down florid passages with the traditional nimbleness of coloratura soprano and a more even scale than is known to most of them.

The first two of the six movements of Tschaikowsky's suite are too long, overdeveloped. The sequential repetition of material becomes wearisome notwithstanding the fugue. The miniature march, played yesterday for the first time at these concerts, is a pretty toy and greatly amused the audience. The scherzo and garotte each have entertaining salon music piquantly scored.

Mme Gerhardt still interprets with depth and sincerity of feeling. Her voice continues a faithful instrument, tonally more pleasing in the lower half, but still capable of dramatic effects above. Wolf's "Er ist's," the last of her second group, is incongruous when weighted with full orchestra. Its radiant exuberance is too volatile, too fine fibred and subtle for so positive a pedestal. A quartet of strings and piano would serve it better. Nor is "Verborgenheit," with its intimate soul speech, part petition and part soliloquy, best suited to so large a frame. These are miniatures. The same perhaps to less degree might be said of "Der Freund."

It but recalls the irrelevant entrance into a Symphony concert which the singer as soloist runs the risk of making. Formerly a permissible thing to give a lyric song with piano, it is assumed now that all must be sung with orchestra. If there is no logical score to be played, arrange one, and songs such as these of Wolf, at best out of their happiest perspective in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, lose something more of their character besides, when accompanied orchestrally.

Wagner's dramatic songs are of a different mold. "Stehe Still," with its nobly impassioned creed, is a dramatic poem worthy of the thought of the text. Mme Gerhardt gave impressive interpretation to this to "Schmerzen" and "Traeume." She was warmly received. Next week the "Faust" Symphony with a chorus of men from Mr Townsend's chorus, Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Schumann's concerto in A minor with Mr Paderewski, will be the program.

HERALD
ess: New York City
DEC 17 1916

Vacation Association to Give Concert at Metropolitan Opera House—Other Entertainments.

ENERGETIC women of society, who provide public attractions in aid of local and foreign philanthropies, have arranged entertainments to meet the requirements of all sorts of fancies.

Seriousness of the most attractive kind is promised in the concert arranged by the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday night, January 16, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, director, will appear. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloists. The concert, under the direction of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker and Miss Anne Morgan, chief officers of the Vacation Association, will be one of the important incidents in music this winter.

The directing committee also includes Mmes. Rogers H. Bacon, August Belmont, Daniel Guggenheim, Montgomery Hare, Alexander Kohut and Ponsonby Ogle and Misses Mabel Beardsley, Theresa D. O'Donohue and Maude K. Wetmore. Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie is chairman of the Brooklyn Committee and Miss Alice C. Kirkpatrick of the New Jersey Committee.

• • •

om PRESS
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
DE

• • •

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra falls on New Year's night. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the fine Second Concerto of his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. The symphony will be the brilliant work of Cesar Franck in D Minor, which the Boston Symphony has not played here since 1912.

• • •

From the Advertiser
Dec. 9, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES PLEASING PROGRAM

ERNST SCHELLING VERY SUCCESSFUL IN CONCERTO

Afternoon Devoted to Concert Of Moderate Moderns— Franck Well Performed

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Program.

Franck. Symphony in D minor.
Liszt. Piano Concerto, No. 2, A major.
Ernst Schelling, Soloist.
Borodin. "Eine Steppenskizze."
Weber. "Euryanthe."

Entirely a 19th century program, a concert of moderate moderns. Not any dissonant experiments, yet contrasted enough to avoid all trace of monotony What is there to be said that is new regarding Cesar Franck's D minor symphony? Every concert-goer is familiar with the great work, yet in this case familiarity only breeds increased esteem. It is a work which bears repeated hearing, since good counterpoint never grows threadbare, and Franck was as thorough as any contrapuntist of modern times.

The manner in which the important three-noted figure of the first movement (first cousin to Wagner's Fate motive and Beethoven's "Muss es sein?") is treated, is always enthralling, and its clearness as given by our orchestra is always a subject for praise. The first movement is the most perfect gem of the entire work and it was grandly performed.

The melancholy brooding which characterizes much of the work is by no means lachrymose; Cesar Franck was far removed from being a Mrs. Gummidge; and the lack of a Scherzo is not seriously felt (there is a central theme of Scherzo character), since its lightness might have jarred on the three movements written. Schumann once wrote a symphony without a slow movement; why should not Franck compose one without a Scherzo?

The playing of the English horn in the slow movement was especially commendable, and its sombre tone-color suited finely to the pensive character of this impressive movement. The material carried over into the Finale from the two preceding movements was very clearly brought into the foreground in Dr. Muck's reading. The playing of the brasses was phenomenally good, and the noble and sincere work aroused absolute enthusiasm.

Then came Mr. Schelling with the second Listz concerto. Not quite so peppery a work as the E-flat concerto with its triangle tinklings and its emphatic opening figure, but less of a rhapsody and more of a true concerto. The elements of the regular three movements can easily be discovered in its long single-movement form. The chief theme at the beginning, with its many subsequent metamorphoses, is as attractive and impressive as anything that Liszt ever wrote. Excellently did Mr. Schelling give this theme in various phases, and the violoncello, too, made a good effect with one transformation.

The ensemble of the scintillating work was excellent, for there was a poet at the piano and another on the conductor's stand. Dr. Muck is revealing all the glory of Liszt to Boston. We only wish that we could import Dr. Villiers Stanford from England to our city to hear the Faust Symphony, which is coming again soon; it might convert him from writing sentences like these:—

"In writing he (Liszt) was always a virtuoso first and a composer afterward . . . He produced two pianoforte concertos which by virtue of their wonderful technical effectiveness still survive. . . Two grandoise, but unconvincing symphonies—Dante and Faust."

Mr. Schelling was fully up to the technical requirements of the difficult work and fairly won a triumph in it. He was recalled over and over again, and his excellent work deserved the ovation. In the Coda of the finale our kettle-drummer let himself loose in good and fortissimo earnest. Why not give this artist a solo for once? Why not produce Tausch's Concerto for kettle-drum and orchestra? It would be a curiosity at least.

The scene now shifted from Hungary to the Orient. It has been often said:—"Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar"; but Borodin, direct descendant from Imerian princes, who in turn claimed their direct descent from King David, has come into his Orientalism by inheritance. His "Sketch of the Steppes in Central Asia" is almost a companion piece to David's "Le Desert." It is such a graphic picture that we wonder that it has been heard so seldom in the Symphony concerts.

The loneliness of the Steppes, the peaceful Russian song that is given, the Oriental melody that follows and intertwines, the approach and departure of the Caravan into the distance (a little of the "Turkish Patrol" business here, however), and the final suggestion of wide and desolate expanse, are all dramatic points which are well worked up and sufficiently clear "program-music" to make a strong appeal to every auditor. The horns and English horn were in the foreground in this work, which was short and picturesque.

Finally came the dramatic "Euryanthe" overture, which smells a trifle of the footlights, as much of Weber's music does, but which is brilliant and exciting none the less. Dr. Muck plunged into "medias res" with the very first measures of the work, which were made furiously rapid and powerful. Contrasts were not lacking, and sharp ones, too, and the second theme with its tenderness and the beautiful slow episode in the centre of the work (the scene of the ghost) were very effective, while the climax of the end was superbly worked up. Altogether, then, a concert of varied style, even though it was devoted to what in European politics would be called the members of the "left centre"—the conservative moderns.

From the Journal
Dec. 7, 1916.

DR. MUCK TO LEAD FRANCK SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck has made up the following program for this week's Symphony concerts: Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck; symphonic sketch, "On the Steps of Middle Asia," Borodin; "Euryanthe," overture, Weber; concerto in A major, for piano and orchestra, by Liszt, with Ernest Schelling as soloist.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, will give a recital at Steinert Hall this afternoon.

George Copeland's first recital of the season will take place at Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon. In the performance of Debussy's "En Blanc et Noir" he will have the assistance of Miss Elizabeth Gordon.

At Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon the soloists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, the famous pianist, and Louis Graveure, barytone, one of the most brilliant singers of the day.

The seat sale for the "Messiah" performances by the Handel and Haydn Society will open next Monday at Symphony Hall.

Osar Seagle, barytone and former assistant to Jean de Reszke, will give a recital at Jordan Hall next Monday afternoon.

From the Journal
Dec. 16, 1916.

GERHARDT HAS SUCCESS AS A SYMPHONY STAR

On the Symphony program this week are numbers that have not been presented for a long time. Elena Gerhardt returns with songs by Wagner and Hugo Wolf, which have not been heard since this admirable German artiste was here three years ago. The Mozart symphony in D major is being performed for the first time in seven years. The Tschaikowsky suite in D minor now is, at last, being presented in its entirety here. When it was heard before, in 1899, the Marche Miniature was omitted.

It is altogether one of the season's choicest programs. The grace and elegance of the Mozart symphony can hardly be brought out more effectively than at present, under Dr. Muck's direction. Miss Gerhardt's beauty of voice and beautifully finished artistry gave rare distinction to the performance of three Wagner songs, "Stand Still," "Dreams" and "Sorrows," and three Wolf songs, 'Retirement," "The Friend" and "'Tis Spring." The Tschaikowsky suite is divided into six parts, each one of which has a piquancy all its own. To most of the Symphony patrons the whole suite, and not the Marche Miniature alone, comes as a novelty.

Miss Gerhardt was recalled several times after each of her appearances. It was a notable triumph for this talented lieder singer—a handsome and generous recognition of her artistic efforts. Dr. Muck conducted a most sympathetic accompaniment for her.

Paderewski will be the soloist at next week's concerts. These will be his only appearances with the orchestra in Boston this season. He has chosen to play the Schumann concerto in A minor. Undoubtedly he will add encore pieces, this being his exclusive privilege at the Symphony concerts. The first and only other number on the set program is Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which had such a sensational success when it was performed here two years ago. The Choral Music Society and Arthur Hackett, the tenor, will assist.

[55]

From the Herald
Dec. 16, 1916.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S 8TH CONCERT

Mozart, Wagner, Tshaikowsky and Others Figure on the Program—Miss Elena Gerhardt Sings with Her Accustomed Warmth of Feeling—Vocally Well Disposed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 385); Wagner, songs with orchestra: Stehe Still, Traeume, Schmerzen; Wolf, songs with orchestra, Der Freund, Verborgenheit, Er ist's (Miss Elena Gerhardt); Tschaikowsky, Suite No. 1 in D minor, op. 43.

This symphony in D major of Mozart is ranked as one of the lesser ones, and there are traces of the fact that the composer thought of it first in the form of a serenade: witness the Andante and the Minuetto. It is said that he wrote it in great haste; but he had the gift of inventing before he set pen to paper. There are charming pages in this symphony, which is peculiarly Mozartian throughout. No wonder that the Austrian Emperor, who attended the concert when the symphony was first performed, was greatly pleased; and that the audience, as stated by a contemporary musical magazine, applauded in a manner "unexampled in the concert history of Vienna." There is the simplicity in this music that is described by Walt Whitman as "the art of art, the glory of expression, and the sunshine of the light of letters." This simplicity of Mozart is too often a stumbling block to those who are moved by the roar or ingenious trickery of the modern orchestra and do not concern themselves with the character of the musical thoughts, often thin, pale, inconsequential but robed in instrumental garments of gorgeous or extravagant colors.

Tschaikowsky's Suite had not been heard at these concerts since March, 1899. When Mr. Gericke brought it out, the amusing Marche Miniature was omitted, for, although the score contained it, the parts then at hand were without it. The music evidently pleased the audience yesterday, but as a whole the Suite is one of Tschaikowky's minor works. The salient features are the Fugue and the Marche. The former is impressively worked out. The latter, though to some it suggests a somewhat like treatment in a movement of the "Nutcracker" Suite, will always tickle hearers. We remember when the Suite was produced in Berlin by the Philharmonic Society then led by Franz Wuellner. We sat behind Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, the author of a bitter pamphlet against "Tristan and Isolde," a savage critic, a thoroughly equipped musician. Berlin was not friendly, then, toward Tschaikowsky or other contemporary composers of France and Russia. Old Dorn and his companions nodded approval of the Fugue and were highly entertained by the Marche Miniature. This was in 1883. Alas, the fleeting years!

The Divertimento and Intermezzo are pleasingly melodious and adroitly colored; but the Introduction to the Fugue is weak and long-drawn out, and the Gavotte, having little character, as a finale is far inferior to the pompous and brilliant Polonaise that ends the Third Suite. In the Introduction to the Fugue and in the middle movements, except the Marche, there are too many examples of Tschaikowsky's worst mannerisms: as the frequent repetition of inconsiderable phrases tossed from one section of the orchestra to another.

Miss Gerhardt brought nothing new. Even "Stehe Still," unfamiliar perhaps to some in the audience, had been sung by her at a Pension Fund Concert; but she sang the songs of Wagner and Wolf with her accustomed warmth of feeling, her indisputable sincerity, and, when occasion demanded, with the "Innigkeit" that puts a hearer in close communion with a singer. She sings with such gusto, to use a favorite word of Hazlitt, that even when her intonation is occasionally insecure, an audience is unmindful. Yesterday, as a rule, she was vocally well-disposed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in which a male chorus from the Choral Music Society and Arthur Hackett, tenor, will assist, and Schumann's piano concerto, played by Mr. Paderewski.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
DEC 1
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Schumann's lovely Symphony in E flat major, "Rhenish," will be the feature of the third Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, January 3. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, who will play the admirable Concerto in E minor by his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

From the Post
Dec. 16, 1916.

MOZART'S SYMPHONY ENJOYED

Miss Gerhardt, the Soloist, Well Received

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 5) and Tschaikowsky's 1st Suite, op. 43, in D minor, and these songs, sung by Elena Gerhardt: "Stehe Stille," "Schmerzen," "Traume," Wagner; "Verborgenheit," "Der Freunde," "Er Ists," Wolf.

A WELCOME REVIVAL

Mozart's symphony was revived after an absence of years from these programmes, and the revival was undoubtedly a welcome one, for the symphony is exceedingly fresh and brilliant. The writing in the first movement is remarkable for its impetuousness, its bold dissonances, rhythmic force, and, in one or two places, striking modulations. Of the last three movements, what need be said save that they each, in the proverbial classic manner, showed Mozart at his best, a master of melody and of perfect form, and of very simple but beautiful and often highly original instrumentation. The finale is exceedingly bright and humorous.

Miss Gerhardt has a beautiful voice. Its texture and its inherent loveliness grow on one. It has the substance and quality of the best German voices, and it is not subjected to the unskilful and unpleasant treatment that German singers too often bestow on their voices. We would rather hear songs originally composed with orchestral accompaniment than to hear songs with accompaniment orchestrated from a piano version, even if the orchestration be the composer's own. But the songs heard yesterday made an immediate appeal and they were interpreted with exceptional sympathy. One wishes, for that matter, that there were not so much sympathy for so sentimental an outpouring as "Verborgenheit," but if this song is to be sung, then Miss Gerhardt is particularly well equipped by voice and by her sincerity for its interpretation.

Tschaikowsky's Suite is of uneven worth. So far as national coloring goes, it might have been written by any gifted German. But national coloring is not everything. Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch once said to us that he believed the Russian composer who had gone deepest, and who represented his country most significantly and characteristically in music was not the Rimsky-Korsakoff of "Sadko," "Antar," "Scheherazade, or the Mussorgsky of "Boris" and "Khovantschina"; or the Balakireff of "Thamar" or the Borodine of the symphonies, quartets, songs, and the opera "Prince Igor," but—Tschaikowsky, who, by and large, in quantity and quality, remained the greatest Russian of them all. The music heard yesterday is not Tschaikowsky at his greatest or even his most sustained excellence, but much of it is entertaining and well written, and this pleased the audience greatly. The poorest movements of the suite, for us, are the waltz and gavotte which brings the conclusion. This is trivial stuff, open to more than a suspicion of routine and midnight oil. The finest piece of the six is undoubtedly the fugue, with its romantic introduction. The "March Miniature" is witty, although written in a way not wholly new. The orchestration of the suite is often piquant, and occasionally there is a dash of Slavic color. The performance was warmly applauded.

From the Record
Dec. 15, 1916.

Have Gala Program

The Symphony Orchestra concerts next Friday and Saturday will present the gala program of the year. There will be two numbers, Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A-minor, with Paderewski as soloist. In the Liszt symphony the male chorus will be that of the Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend conductor.

For the second part only the concerto is announced, but Paderewski will undoubtedly add encores. Like De Pachmann and Sembrich there seems to be a special dispensation for him which allows him to break the no-encore rule. By the way, Paderewski's deferred recital will be given at Symphony Hall, Sunday, Jan. 14.

Sunday night, at the Copley Theatre, Albert Spalding, the violinist, and John Powell, the pianist, will give a recital for the benefit of French musicians. It is given under the auspices of the Division of Music at Harvard.

From the
Globe
Dec. 16, 1916.

EIGHTH CONCERT

Dr Muck Conducts Suite of Tschaikowsky

Elena Gerhardt Interprets Ably Songs by Wagner and Wolf

The eighth Friday afternoon Symphony concert was held yesterday. Dr Muck conducted. Elena Gerhardt was the soloist. The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in D K 385 and Tschaikowsky's first suite in D minor.

The minuet of the symphony is charming, and the last movement a frieze, engrossing in the delicacy and elegance of its pattern, one in which figure pursues figure with a fleetness and lightness that when heard as yesterday is ravishing. Friends appear engaged in enlivening conversation, illumined with flights of brilliant repartee. Wit flashes from one to another among the string choirs, and all is exuberance and zest. And with vivacity, a patrician elegance goes along, a finesse in which Dr Muck and the virtuosi, particularly of the viol family, displayed their fleet skill, not forgetting the ponderous contrabasses who flourished up and down florid passages with the traditional nimbleness of coloratura soprano and a more even scale than is known to most of them.

The first two of the six movements of Tschaikowsky's suite are too long, overdeveloped. The sequential repetition of material becomes wearisome notwithstanding the fugue. The miniature march, played yesterday for the first time at these concerts, is a pretty toy and greatly amused the audience. The scherzo and garotte each have entertaining salon music piquantly scored.

Mme Gerhardt still interprets with depth and sincerity of feeling. Her voice continues a faithful instrument, tonally more pleasing in the lower half, but still capable of dramatic effects above. Wolf's "Er ist's," the last of her second group, is incongruous when weighted with full orchestra. Its radiant exuberance is too volatile, too fine fibred and subtle for so positive a pedestal. A quartet of strings and piano would serve it better. Nor is "Verborgenheit," with its intimate soul speech, part petition and part soliloquy, best suited to so large a frame. These are miniatures. The same perhaps to less degree might be said of "Der Freund."

It but recalls the irrelevant entrance into a Symphony concert which the singer as soloist runs the risk of making. Formerly a permissible thing to give a lyric song with piano, it is assumed now that all must be sung with orchestra. If there is no logical score to be played, arrange one, and songs such as these of Wolf, at best out of their happiest perspective in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, lose something more of their character besides, when accompanied orchestrally.

Wagner's dramatic songs are of a different mold. "Stehe Still," with its nobly impassioned creed, is a dramatic poem worthy of the thought of the text. Mme Gerhardt gave impressive interpretation to this to "Schmerzen" and "Traeume." She was warmly received. Next week the "Faust" Symphony with a chorus of men from Mr Townsend's chorus, Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Schumann's concerto in A minor with Mr Paderewski, will be the program.

HERALD
Address: New York City
DEC

Vacation Association to Give Concert at Metropolitan Opera House— Other Entertainments.

ENERGETIC women of society, who provide public attractions in aid of local and foreign philanthropies, have arranged entertainments to meet the requirements of all sorts of fancies

Seriousness of the most attractive kind is promised in the concert arranged by the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday night, January 16, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, director, will appear. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloists. The concert, under the direction of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker and Miss Anne Morgan, chief officers of the Vacation Association, will be one of the important incidents in music this winter.

The directing committee also includes Mmes. Rogers H. Bacon, August Belmont, Daniel Guggenheim, Montgomery Hare, Alexander Kohut and Ponsonby Ogle and Misses Mabel Beardsley, Theresa D. O'Donohue and Maude K. Wetmore. Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie is chairman of the Brooklyn Committee and Miss Alice C. Kirkpatrick of the New Jersey Committee.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra falls on New Year's night. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the fine Second Concerto of his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. The symphony will be the brilliant work of Cesar Franck in D Minor, which the Boston Symphony has not played here since 1912.

* * *

From the Advertiser Dec. 16, 1916.

ELENA GERHARDT HEARD AT CONCERT

PROGRAM IS EASY AND DIGESTIBLE

Most of the Works Are Melodic And Some of Sugar-Plum Variety

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAM

Mozart—Symphony in D major.
Wagner—Three songs with Orchestra.
Elena Gerhardt, Soloist
Hugo Wolf—Three Songs with Orchestra.
Elena Gerhardt, Soloist
Tschaikowsky—Suite No. 1. D minor.

Easy and digestible from first to last. Possibly Dr. Muck felt that many auditors were fatigued with Christmas shopping and deserved a little recreation; at any rate there was nothing to puzzle over; most of the works were melodic and some of the movements even of the sugar-plum variety. Far be it from us to find fault with such relaxation. We will say to the ultra-classicist:—

"Because thou art virtuous shall there be no more cakes and ale?"

Mozart's D major symphony is not one of the great three which he wrote in 1788. Every one of those three (C, E-flat and G minor) belongs to the modern repertoire. But his other symphonies are neither dramatic enough to come into the modern fold, nor naive enough to be quite as enjoyable as the symphonies of Haydn.

The first movement of this D major symphony received a dramatic power at the hands of Dr. Muck that might hove astonished its composer. The Andante seemed as hopelessly out-of-date as a Maria Edgeworth novel, and was insipid and watery; the Minuet was formal and the final Rondo in 18th century conventionality. There seemed no good reason for resuscitating this symphony; there are a thousand pieces that might have taken its place advantageously.

We confess that we do not greatly care for Wagner's solo songs, although it might be well some day to resurrect his "Two Grenadiers" if only to compare it with Schumann's and to see how both composers ended with the self-same thought—"The Marseillaise." Mme. Gerhardt sang all three with much intensity. "Dreams" has a certain standing because the composer's beloved Mme. Wesendonck wrote the poem (as also the text of the other two songs) and it was in some sort an inception of his "Tristan and Isolde," and his separation from his wife. "Schmerzen" has a broad climax which Mme. Gerhardt did full justice to, and it won public appreciation possibly because of this tour de force. But "Dreams" won the popular triumph of the concert.

"Stehe Still" was to us the most interesting of the group, because it is not over-familiar, and it has some strong contrasts. The accompaniment, also, is powerful and dramatic. The rushing scales and arpeggios at "Sausendes, Brausendes Rad der Zeit" are closely wedded to their subject.

The three Wolf songs were familiar to many of the audience, but one never tires of the beauty of "Verborgenheit," or of 'Er ist's." No man ever got to the heart of a text as Hugo Wolf in his Lieder. Schubert at times fell far below him. For example, in Schubert's "Miller's Flowers" one will find the self-same music set to the lulling asleep and the waking up of the maiden of the mill. Wolf never made mistakes like that. Mme. Gerhardt sang the Wolf songs beautifully and won tremendous applause. But we would like to plead with this gifted singer that she occasionally do something for the memory of Robert Franz, whose songs are the equal of any of those constantly appearing on our concert programmes, yet are unaccountably neglected almost everywhere. But, after all, none of these Lieder are quite fit for the large Symphony Hall. Tschaikowsky's Suite in D minor was enjoyed by musician and non-musician, for it is frankly popular music, a Strauss waltz could scarcely be more so. Let no one imagine that the "minor" indicated mournfulness. Even the fugue with which the work begins is of a light and chattering character of the type of the fugue passage in the "Magic Flute" overture, by Mozart. This fugue is much the best portion of the Suite, from the musician's standpoint, and its introduction is also excellent. It was played with infinite charm. Next to this the Scherzo is the finest part of the work. It has a spontaneity that is delightful.

The Divertimento was as graceful as a Viennese waltz. The final Gavotte was originally called a Dance of Giants, and there are a few playful Brobdignagian effects, as if the giants were tiptoeing through the [illegible] for the first time here. It is a playful and very short bit for high wood wind and violins, triangle and glockenspiel. It is away up in the air like the march of the street boys in the first act of "Carmen."

The Suite falls off in interest because of its many movements. The Fugue and the Scherzo ought to remain in the permanent repertoire, but the other movements are decidedly less important, and even if we can take pleasure in them as in Christmas bonbons, they might become very cloying as a steady diet. The entire Suite was built sporadically around the Scherzo, and therefore, has not much real continuity. The movements do not hang well together. But why break this pretty butterfly upon a wheel? It was graceful and piquant music most daintily played. Tschaikowsky may here merely have carried out the saying of the queen in "Hamlet"—"Sweets to the Suite!" and after that composition we can admit Strauss to the programs—and we don't mean Richard either.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 17 1916

BENEFIT CONCERT

A gala concert is announced to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association. The concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, with Paderewski and Kreisler for the solo artists. For several years past the public which hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York has been limited to the subscribers of the two series of concerts it gives in Carnegie Hall, and there has been no opportunity for the casual concertgoers to attend any of its concerts, as all seats are sold by subscription for the season. This concert will enable the non-subscribers to hear the orchestra. Moreover, so far as the subscribers themselves are concerned, neither Mr. Kreisler nor Mr. Paderewski is playing with the orchestra in New York this winter in its subscription concerts, so that the concert at the Metropolitan Opera House will have a special attraction for them.

The general scheme of the programme as outlined at present calls for three pieces by the orchestra, a concerto by Mr. Paderewski and one by Mr. Kreisler and two groups of solo pieces by each of these artists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series since the spring of 1893, when under Mr. Nikisch it came to the Metropolitan Opera House, and with the assistance of Mr. Paderewski gave a concert in aid of the Washington Arch Fund. Mr. Paderewski played as one of the two concertos on the programme Schumann's in A minor, which he will play at the coming concert. Mr. Kreisler's concerto has not yet been selected.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date

The board of directors of the Vacation Association, Inc., will give a concert on Tuesday evening, January 16, at the Metropolitan Opera House. The artists will be Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Robinson Smith is president of the organization; Mrs. Wendell Baker secretary; Miss Anne Morgan treasurer, and the other members of the board are Mrs. Roger H. Bacon, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Montgomery Hare, Mrs. Alexander Kohut, Mrs. Ponsonby Ogle, Miss Maude Wetmore, Miss Mabel Beardsley, Miss Theresa R. O'Donohue, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie and Miss Alice C. Kirkpatrick.

AMERICAN
Address: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A gala concert is announced to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, with Paderewski and Kreisler as the solo artists. For several years past the public which hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York has been limited to the subscribers of the two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall, and there has been no opportunity for the casual concert-goer to attend, as all seats are sold by subscription for the season. This concert will enable the non-subscribers to hear the Orchestra. Moreover, so far as the subscribers themselves are concerned, neither Mr. Kreisler nor Mr. Paderewski is playing with the Orchestra in New York this Winter in its subscription concerts. The general scheme of the programme as outlined at present calls for three pieces by the Orchestra: a Concerto by Mr. Paderewski and one by Mr. Kreisler and two groups of solo pieces by each of these artists.

om SUN
ddress: New York City
te DEC 17 1916

Orchestras are very sensitive plants. It has long been believed that one of the most difficult performances in this world is the production of a favorable balance at the end of a season of orchestral concerts. It is for this reason that great instrumental organizations must have guarantee funds or endowments. Such public benefactors as the late Joseph Pulitzer and the present Henry L. Higginson and Harry Harkness Flagler are not numerous, and their contributions to the sum of human enjoyment are of momentous importance.

The Philharmonic Society of this city, which is now marching triumphantly through its seventy-fifth season, rejoices greatly in the fact that its favor with the public, which at one time had fallen to a low level, is increasing. It is authoritatively stated that the receipts at the close of the last season were $36,000 larger than in the final season of Mr. Mahler's reign on the conductor's throne.

The subscription sale for the present season is $13,000 greater than that of last winter. The sales of single tickets have been so numerous that the officers of the society are now confidently hoping that the spring of 1917 will show an advance of $50,000 above the final Mahler season.

These facts ought to be cheering to every lover of music. They ought also to brace the nerves of the members of the Philharmonic Society to meet the futile jars of critical comment which disagrees with the artistic views of their conductor, Josef Stransky. The opinions of critics have never been known to outweigh the cash flowing in at the box office window. Money talks in music and the drama. It is the golden shower poured into the lap of the Danæ of art by the great god Success.

Neither Mr. Stransky nor Mr. Damrosch seems to entertain the correct view. The latter, possessed of a ready wit, alert perceptions and an agile pen, occasionally writes charming letters to newspapers which have failed to view his interpretations through his own lorgnon. Such communications are always welcome in newspaper offices. All that is asked is that they shall be good reading, and Mr. Damrosch's usually are. Mr. Stransky writes good English, but, being a foreigner, he does not feel sufficiently confident of his command of our tongue to write letters to newspapers. Furthermore, unless the present writer is misinformed, it is contrary to the Philharmonic conductor's policy to enter into any discussion of criticism, a policy which has many things to commend it besides safety.

Meanwhile, it must be admitted that he sensitiveness of the Philharmonic Society has been wounded on manifold occasions this season, though not in THE SUN. The editor of this department has been pained to note that the Evening Post seems "wrapped in the solitude of its own originality," when solemnly asseverating that the Philharmonic Society is the fortunate possessor of the one truly great conductor who addresses his art to the concertgoing public of New York.

Emerson said, "to be great is to be misunderstood." Certain other newspapers, notoriously the Tribune and the Times, appear to find it almost impossible to discern any solid merit in the performances of this conductor. Even THE SUN has from time to time been constrained to hint that in Mr. Stransky's readings of the classics there was an approach to what Erasmus called "the deep tranquillity of dulness." It has never gone quite so far as the inflammatory Tribune, which recently described a performance as sounding like the ticking of a news tape machine. In the opinion of THE SUN's recorder, this was unnecessarily cruel.

Furthermore, these other newspapers persist in the most flaming commendation of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the readings of Dr. Karl Muck, and that too, despite the fact that the Philharmonic is a home organization and ought to be the pride of local reporters.

But it has ever been thus. New York has no public spirit. Its citizens welcome good things from all the world and do not claim everything for their own city. But they have given unanswerable proof that they "indorse" Mr. Stransky. That being the case, criticism of the fullest and frankest kind can do neither him nor the Philharmonic any harm.

And standing upon the summit of its solitary peak, watching the eager throngs hastening toward Carnegie Hall what time the "Tasso" of Liszt or the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky is to be conducted, the Evening Post can boldly declaim the words of Coriolanus:

If you have writ your annals true, 'tis there
That, like an eagle in a dovecote, I Fluttered your Volscians in Corioli:
Alone I did it. Boy!

EVENING POST
ess: New York City
DEC 16
Debussy.

With Paderewski and Kreisler

FOR the benefit of the Vacation Association, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will give a concert in the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16, at which both Paderewski and Kreisler will appear as soloists. Each of them will play a concerto, and there will be three pieces for orchestra alone. The last time the Boston Orchestra gave a concert in New York outside its regular subscription series was in 1893, when Nikisch and Paderewski were the stars.

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra falls on New Year's night. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the fine second concerto of his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. The symphony will be the brilliant work of Cesar Franck in D minor, which the Boston Smyphony has not played here since 1912.

om
ddress:
ate DEC 18 1916

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Unter den Auspizien des Brooklyn Instituts für Kunst und Wissenschaften wird das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra wieder ein Konzert geben und wird der Pianist Ossip Gabrilowitsch der Solist sein; er wird ein Konzert von Rachmaninoff spielen.

From the Monitor Dec. 16, 1916.

Symphony Concerts

Ignace Paderewski, pianist, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Dec. 22 and 23, presenting the Schumann piano concerto in A minor. The orchestra will present the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, with the tenor and bass sections of the Choral Music Society, and with Arthur Hackett, tenor, assisting.

At the concerts of Dec. 29 and 30 the orchestra will present Beethoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," and Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on a chorale, op. 24.

m AMERICAN
dress: New York City
te

New Numbers at Boston Symphony

Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F," the 5th, will be the first number on the programme at the third Boston Symphony concert under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 5. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the concerto in D minor by his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. Another interesting work, which will be a novelty to most of the patrons of the Boston Symphony, is Borodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia."

rom WORLD
Address: New York City

The Board of Directors of the Vacation Association, Inc., Miss Robinson Smith, President, will give a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, at 8.30 o'clock. The programme will include Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor.

Mrs. Wendell Baker is Secretary of the assiciation; Miss Anne Morgan, Treasurer, and on the Board of Directors are Mrs. Rogers H. Bacon, Mrs. August Belmont, Miss Mabel Beardsley, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Montgomery Hare, Mrs. Alexander Kohut, Miss Theresa R. O'Donohue, Mrs. Ponsonby Ogle, Miss Maude Wetmore, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Chairman of Brooklyn committee; Miss Alice C. Kirkpatrick, Chairman of New Jersey committee.

EVENING JOURNAL
ess: New York City
DEC 1 8

Under the auspices of the Board of Directors of the Vacation Association, a gala concert is to be held at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, January 16. Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to appear. The work of this association is well known. Miss Robinson Smith is president, Mrs. Wendell Baker, secretary, and Miss Anne Morgan, treasurer.

om EVENING POST
dress: New York City
e DEC 2 2

New York News from Boston

W. E. WALTER, representing Charles H. Ellis, who is manager of Paderewski and Kreisler, as well as of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sends the following information from Boston:

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises César Franck's Symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhäuser" (Paris version), and the overture to "Rienzi." On Saturday afternoon the programme comprises the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C Minor Symphony No. 9, and Tchaikovsky's seldom-heard Suite for Orchestra in D minor, No. 1. This will be given complete, including the rarely used "Marche Miniature."

Paderewski's second recital of the season is set for Tuesday afternoon, January 9, in Carnegie Hall, at three o'clock. The distinguished pianist is now in Boston, having appeared there as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Christmas concerts, the 22d and 23d. According to present plans Mr. Paderewski's season is drawing rapidly to a close. The week following his recital here he departs for the South for a series of concerts, and then is likely to return to Paso Robles, in California, where he has large property interests.

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been very active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year, and C. A. Ellis intimates that it will be another twenty-three years before the Boston Orchestra comes to New York to give another special concert.

n EVENING TELEGRAM
ress: New York City

Announcement has been made by the Board of Directors of the Vacation Association, Inc., No. 38 West Thirty-ninth street, of which Miss Robinson Smith is president, that a concert for the benefit of the organization will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House, January 16. The features of the programme will be selections by Mr. Ignace Paderewski, Mr. Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cesar Franck's symphony and three pieces by Wagner—the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaueser" and the overture to "Rienzi." On Saturday afternoon the programme will offer the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C minor symphony No. 9 and Tschaikowsk suite for orchestra in D minor No including the "Marche Miniature."

[56]

From the Transcript Dec.27,1916.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Holy, the Harpist, as an Overlooked Little Master in the Symphony Orchestra —Programmes in Prospect—Mr. Loeffler's Symphony—Items from Opera House and Concert-Hall

As yet the public of the Symphony Concerts has hardly come to understand that in Mr. Holy, the first harp of the orchestra, it hears from week to week a virtuoso and a musician comparable with Mr. Sand, the first clarinet, Mr. Férir, the first viola, or Mr. Longy, the first oboe. To the eye of the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Mr. Holy must be even more familiar than his three companions, since they sit in the body of the orchestra while he sits apart from it. To the average ear, likewise, by the quality of the tone and by the use to which composers ordinarily put it, the harp is a more distinctive instrument than the oboe or the clarinet, and much more so than the viola. Yet, whereas one or another auditor at the end of a piece will say: "How well Mr. Sand or Mr. Longy or Mr. Witek or Mr. Férir playtd"; few have so much as a word for the equally masterful Mr. Holy. Yet no harpist that the Symphony Orchestra has ever numbered is comparable with him in the fulness, the brightness, the vitality of his tone or in the adroit manipulation of it in euphony or contrast with the other instrumental voices or in the color with which it enriches the whole music. There is hardly a concert in which a modern composer utilizes the harp in which Mr. Holy does not achieve felicities of technique that are the envious admiration of connoisseurs of the instrument, and hardly one in which the quality and the play of his tone do not enhance the poetic or the pictorial suggestion of the music. The newer composers do not spare their harpists; more and more various they would make the voice that the harp can blend or contrast with the tonal mass; more and more subtly they would spy [illegible] its secrets. Mr. Holy never fails then [illegible] often indeed his resource fulfils their purp[illegible] beyond—it is easy to believe—their [illegible]n imaginings. Mr. Kreisler himself is no more master of the violin than is Mr. Holy of the harp; and each in the quality of his tone is unique upon his instrument. Yet it is hard to persuade even the public of the Symphony Concerts that the harp is a serious instrument for men, and not a mere parlor plaything with which pretty girls, who happen to be rich, may dawdle.

From Symphony Hall

Dr. Muck has put no symphony upon the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Jan. 12, and Saturday evening, Jan. 13. Instead, they will begin with three pieces by Sibelius, all, if recollection holds, new to Boston. They are the tone-poems "Pohyola's Daughter," "The Daughters of Ocean" and "Night Ride and Sunrise." To these will follow Beethoven's concerto for violin, in which Mr. Spalding will play for the first time at the Symphony Concerts, and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont."

On the evening of Tuesday, Jan. 16, at the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symphony Orchestra will be heard for the first time in New York in twenty-three years in a concert outside its regular series at Carnegie Hall. The occasion is a concert for the profit of one of Miss Anne Morgan's charities for working girls and Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski, as well as Dr. Muck and the orchestra, are to share in it. Each virtuoso will play a concerto and a group of solo pieces and the band will also have three numbers to itself. Boxes for this unique concert are to cost $150 and seats in the parquet $10.

Before the season ends Dr. Muck intends to include in his programmes Mr. Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica," played for the first time anywhere at the Music Festival in Norfolk last June. The performance was originally scheduled for the concerts of Jan. 19 and 20; but the expedition to New York, just noted, has compelled the adjournment of it to a later date when there will be more time for the necessary rehearsals of a difficult piece. As the symphony is still in manuscript there is only one score and one set of orchestral parts in existence. Since Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra will soon undertake the music, they will require them for some weeks to come and the probability now is that the symphony will not be heard in Boston until spring.

Franck's symphony, Schumann's Rhenish symphony and Tchaikovski's suite in D minor are the chief numbers that the Symphony Orchestra will carry "on the road" when it revisits New York, Philadelphia and other cities southward next week. In New York, by exception, half of one of the concerts will fall to such familiar pieces by Wagner as the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Rienzi" and the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser." Outside New York, either Mr. Gabrilowitsch or Mr. Friedberg, the pianists, will assist the orchestra.

From SUN

Address: New York City

Date

A concert for the benefit of the Vacation Association, Miss Robinson-Smith president, will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16. The programme will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Wenck, conductor, and Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler, soloists.

From the Transcript Dec.26,1916.

THE CONCERT-RECORD

Between Liszt and Schumann, Dr. Muck and Mr. Paderewski, Another Memorable Evening in Symphony Hall—Mr. Thibaud's Auspicious Return

EVEN after the interval of a double holiday in the chronicle of concerts, the meagre record of them at Christmas time may still be briefly kept, since by the newspapers—it is fond custom to believe—the dusty archæologists of the stage in the United States will, fifty years hence, set much store. For their advantage and for the pleasant quickening of ready recollection in a reader or two here and now, it may be written that the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening last was in all respects as signal an occasion as was that of Friday afternoon. Once more, composer and conductor, orchestra and chorus were eloquent in the Faust Symphony beyond even the wont of a Liszt. a Muck and the forces that they together stimulated. An audience, as notable in quality as it was in numbers and deeply stirred by music and performance, heaped them with applause and made Mr. Higginson, its messenger, as it were, to bear to the stage its congratulations to Dr. Muck and to the seven or eight-score men that filled it. To the symphony and as complement and foil to its power succeeded the fresh beauty of Schumann's concerto with Mr. Paderewski to play the pianoforte part in the lyric and the poetizing vein of his golden and still unexhausted years, with Dr. Muck and the band to play the orchestral part in what the pianist afterward called an unsurpassed fashion. Indeed, they were as flawless of tone and as quick of lyric fancy as was he. Once more the audience had its fill of high pleasure; and it was not content until, toward eleven o'clock, Mr. Paderewski had ended the evening with one of his recitals in miniature.

Before an audience that in its quality of musicians and amateurs made amends, perhaps, for meagre numbers, Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, played for the first time in Boston at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon since he went to the wars and returned safe and sound, if a little rheumatic, from them. His three appointed numbers—Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," Chausson's "Poem," and Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso"—were all pieces for violin and orchestra wherein the band makes its own contribution to the symphonic progress of the music as well as accompanies the violinist. On this score Mr. Thibaud was not altogether wise in choice, and he might advisedly have included in his programme some of the numbers for violin and piano, and nothing else that he added to the concert after the audience began to disperse. Both sorts of pieces, however, affirmed equally his undiminished and his ripened power. Once more he played with the light and lithe technical brilliance that distinguished him in earlier years or with that graver sense of the beautiful manipulation of his instrument and his music that has enriched his more recent comings. His tone caressed the ear with undulating flow, silken texture and ready sensibility to whatever inflection of rhythm or modulation, whatever tint and half-tint of color he chose to lay upon it. There was no diminution of finely tempered lustres; there was clear increase in ripened richness as a medium for musical design and thought, and for the poetry and the passion that flow from them under creative and re-creative heat.

Mr. Thibaud's performance of the Spanish Symphony glowed with rhythmic and melodic warmth and was touched with many an individual felicity of pace, emphasis, coloring and elegance of handling. His playing of Chausson's "Poem" was gravely beautiful in the flow of romantic feeling over the more melancholy and meditative as well as over the more ardent and aspiring passages, while to the pattern and the poetry of the music he added as lovely a pattern and as moving a poetry in his own tones. His playing of Saint-Saëns's Rondo made the coloratura of the violin like a fantastic and fascinating firework; while in the number from Bach that he added as an extra piece he gained once more that grave beauty of tone and mood which is his most distinctive possession among the master violinists of our time. The more, then, is it good to know that he will speedily return to Boston, when there is no domestic festival to keep at home many a willing hearer.

H. T. P.

EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONCERT AT METROPOLITAN.

The Vacation Association, of which Miss Robinson-Smith is president and Miss Anne Morgan is treasurer, is to have a benefit concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, on Tuesday evening, January 16. It will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists. This will be the first concert that the Boston Orchestra has given in Greater New York outside of its regular concerts in Manhattan and Brooklyn since 1893, when under Nikisch it came to the Metropolitan Opera House, and, with Paderewski as soloist, gave a concert for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The orchestra comes to New York for the concert, and is to return to Boston that night.

The scheme of the program, which is not definitely settled, calls for three pieces by the orchestra, a concerto by Mr. Paderewski and a concerto by Mr. Kreisler, besides a group of solo pieces by each of these artists.

From the Transcript Dec.27,1916.

LAST week's Symphony programme of revivals repeated on Saturday evening, offers to the memory few serious moments—Mozart turning forth a symphony for occasion between one absorption and another, frankly to give immediate and passing entertainment, and Tchaikovsky also composing frankly popular music to please in its day, with his own readiness, and of a sort to give unfailing delight at the Pops. Standing side by side, the dusty symphony and the dusty suite reveal curious contrasts in their makers in the lighter vein. Both works are hastily strung together, both show an inexhaustible fertility in music to please. Tchaikovsky's suite does amuse, and it has its good points; a perfectly passable gavotte which trips along in the old rhythmic style, a fugue combining scholarship and entertainment, worked out in the approved formula of Bach (who could write an immortal humorous fugue when moved to), ending, in Bach's way, with a large clamactic statement of the subject in the trumpets, which was almost impressive and worth hearing again; also a march which must amuse, however artificial, and a divertimento and intermezzo with interesting soli for the wood wind, and melody in plenty. If the suite has its virtues, the symphony has its weaknesses—the Andante is repetitious and not orchestral, and the Minuet is one of many. But what a difference in the spirit behind the making of each! Mozart smiling, ingratiating, winning the affection in a second, as inexhaustible in melody and rhythm as in the sparkle of wit, composing as fast as his pen would fly because to live was to create with ceaseless zest, and fairly exuding in this case a brave and large beginning, of more than fascinating theme, and a finale overflowing with delightful cleverness and good spirits. Tchaikovsky, on the other hand, conscientiously writing light music in dead seriousness, efficiently, but with impersonal and almost mechanical readiness. Tchaikovsky's humor is doubtful indeed, or at best a negative sort of a humor. For if Tchaikovsky's music does not brood or suffer, it merely proceeds interestingly in the approved style of its medium, with little hint of a personality behind it. And whether the music is trivial or not, its fond parent has a large sense of its importance, and must give it its most exhaustive and lengthiest say, regardless of the requirements of its character.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhäuser," and the overture to "Rienzi." On Saturday afternoon the programme comprises the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C minor symphony. No. 9, and Tschaikowsky's seldom heard suite for orchestra in D minor, No. 1. This will be given complete, including the rarely heard "Marche Miniature."

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been very active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year.

From the Transcript DEc.23,1916.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Balakirev's "Thamar" for the First Times Under Dr. Muck—Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Copeland in French Pieces

FOR the last time through many weeks, the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will fall to Dr. Muck and the orchestra unassisted. Three pieces fill their programme —one a light but classic symphony; another new to Symphony Hall but already heard in Boston; and the third a revival off the shelves of the library, searched as never before since newly published music ceased to come from Europe. The symphony is the eighth of Beethoven in biennial and always warmly welcomed performance. The quasi-novelty is Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar," heard twice in Boston as music to the like-named mimodrama of the Russian Ballet but hitherto overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. It is the graphic tale in tones of the savage and sensual Georgian princess who dwelt in rugged solitudes by an icy river and there ensnared wayfarers to be her lovers. And when she had taken her fill of them, she slew them for further cruel and perverse pleasure. No music by Balakirev has been so generally admired. Finally, the revived piece is a set of variations for orchestra on a Lutheran choral, written by the Berlinese composer, Georg Schumann, and played at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Gericke fifteen years ago.

From WORLD

Address: New York City

DEC 24 1916

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhauser" (Paris version), and the overture to "Rienzi."

On Saturday afternoon the programme comprises the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C minor Symphony No. 9 and Tschaikowsky's seldom-heard suite for orchestra in D minor No. 1. This will be given complete, including the rarely heard "Marche Miniature."

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been very active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year.

Paderewski's second recital of the season is set for Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 9, in Carnegie Hall. The week following his recital here he departs for the South for a series of concerts.

SUN

Address: New York City

DEC 9 1916

A concert will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of January 16 for the benefit of the Vacation Association, in which Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim and others are interested and which looks after the welfare of young women. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler will appear and there will be a programme by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck.

The proceeds will be devoted to the work of the Vacation Association, in which many persons prominent in society are interested, and it is expected that there will be a large and representative audience. Parterre boxes and grand tier boxes will be sold at $150 and $100 each respectively and orchestra seats will be $10 each. Applications may be made for them at the association headquarters, 38 West Thirty-ninth street.

EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

[illegible] (No. 4 of "Four Irish Dances"), Stanford-Grainger

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 5. The soloist at this concert will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the very distinguished and gifted Russian pianist, who has chosen to play here the second Concerto in C Minor by his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. Rachmaninoff himself played this Concerto at a Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn a half dozen years ago. The program comprises the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Borodin's interesting Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," the Rachmaninoff Concerto and Weber's "Eurayanthe" Overture.

From the Journal Dec.28,1916.

'THAMAR' NOVELTY ON SYMPHONY BILL

There will be no soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. The program comprises Betthoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar" and Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the chorale "Wer nur den lieben Gott lasst walten." "Thamar" is a novelty.

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon will be given by Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano, assisted by Eddy Brown, one of the most brilliant of the younger generation of American violinists.

From the Transcript Dec.23,1916.

Thursday evening, Jan. 11, in Sanders Theatre at Harvard, the fourth of the Cambridge concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Seydel, the violinist, assisting.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Spalding for the assisting violinist.

[57]

From the Transcript Dec.27,1916.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Holy, the Harpist, as an Overlooked Little Master in the Symphony Orchestra —Programmes in Prospect—Mr. Loeffler's Symphony—Items from Opera House and Concert-Hall

As yet the public of the Symphony Concerts has hardly come to understand that in Mr. Holy, the first harp of the orchestra, it hears from week to week a virtuoso and a musician comparable with Mr. Sand, the first clarinet, Mr. Férir, the first viola, or Mr. Longy, the first oboe. To the eye of the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Mr. Holy must be even more familiar than his three companions, since they sit in the body of the orchestra while he sits apart from it. To the average ear, likewise, by the quality of the tone and by the use to which composers ordinarily put it, the harp is a more distinctive instrument than the oboe or the clarinet, and much more so than the viola. Yet, whereas one or another auditor at the end of a piece will say: "How well Mr. Sand or Mr. Longy or Mr. Witek or Mr. Férir playtd"; few have so much as a word for the equally masterful Mr. Holy. Yet no harpist that the Symphony Orchestra has ever numbered is comparable with him in the fulness, the brightness, the vitality of his tone or in the adroit manipulation of it in euphony or contrast with the other instrumental voices or in the color with which it enriches the whole music. There is hardly a concert in which a modern composer utilizes the harp in which Mr. Holy does not achieve felicities of technique that are the envious admiration of connoisseurs of the instrument, and hardly one in which the quality and the play of his tone do not enhance the poetic or the pictorial suggestion of the music. The newer composers do not spare their harpists; more and more various they would make the voice that the harp can blend or contrast with the tonal mass; more and more subtly they would spy [illegible] its secrets. Mr. Holy never fails then [illegible] often indeed his resource fulfils their purp[illegible] beyond—it is easy to believe—their [illegible]n imaginings. Mr. Kreisler himself is no more master of the violin than is Mr. Holy of the harp; and each in the quality of his tone is unique upon his instrument. Yet it is hard to persuade even the public of the Symphony Concerts that the harp is a serious instrument for men, and not a mere parlor plaything with which pretty girls, who happen to be rich, may dawdle.

From Symphony Hall

Dr. Muck has put no symphony upon the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Jan. 12, and Saturday evening, Jan. 13. Instead, they will begin with three pieces by Sibelius, all, if recollection holds, new to Boston. They are the tone-poems "Pohyola's Daughter," "The Daughters of Ocean" and "Night Ride and Sunrise." To these will follow Beethoven's concerto for violin, in which Mr. Spalding will play for the first time at the Symphony Concerts, and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont."

On the evening of Tuesday, Jan. 16, at the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symph[illegible] Orchestra will be heard for the first time in New York in twenty-three years in a concert outside its regular series at Carnegie Hall. The occasion is a concert for the profit of one of Miss Anne Morgan's charities for working girls and Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski, as well as Dr. Muck and the orchestra, are to share in it. Each virtuoso will play a concerto and a group of solo pieces and the band will also have three numbers to itself. Boxes for this unique concert are to cost $150 and seats in the parquet $10.

Before the season ends Dr. Muck intends to include in his programmes Mr. Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica," played for the first time anywhere at the Music Festival in Norfolk last June. The performance was originally scheduled for the concerts of Jan. 19 and 20; but the expedition to New York, just noted, has compelled the adjournment of it to a later date when there will be more time for the necessary rehearsals of a difficult piece. As the symphony is still in manuscript there is only one score and one set of orchestral parts in existence. Since Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra will soon undertake the music, they will require them for some weeks to come and the probability now is that the symphony will not be heard in Boston until spring.

Franck's symphony, Schumann's Rhenish symphony and Tchaikovski's suite in D minor are the chief numbers that the Symphony Orchestra will carry "on the road" when it revisits New York, Philadelphi and other cities southward next week. In New York, by exception, halt of one of the concerts will fall to such familiar pieces by Wagner as the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Rienzi" and the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser. Outside New York, either Mr. Gabrilowitsch or Mr. Friedberg, the pianists, will assist the orchestra.

From SUN
Address: New York City

[illegible]te

A concert for the benefit of the Vacation Association, Miss Robinson-Smith [illegible]sident, will be given at the Metro[illegible]itan Opera House Tuesday evening, [illegible]uary 16. The programme will be [illegible]en by the Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] Karl Wenck, conductor, and Ignace [illegible]tab Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler, solo[illegible]

From the Transcript Dec,26,1916.

THE CONCERT-RECORD

Between Liszt and Schumann, Dr. Muck and Mr. Paderewski, Another Memorable Evening in Symphony Hall—Mr. Thibaud's Auspicious Return

EVEN after the interval of a double holiday in the chronicle of concerts, the meagre record of them at Christmas time may still be briefly kept, since by the newspapers—it is fond custom to believe—the dusty archæologists of the stage in the United States will, fifty years hence, set much store. For their advantage and for the pleasant quickening of ready recollection in a reader or two here and now, it may be written that the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening last was in all respects as signal an occasion as was that of Friday afternoon. Once more, composer and conductor, orchestra and chorus were eloquent in the Faust Symphony beyond even the wont of a Liszt. a Muck and the forces that they together stimulated. An audience, as notable in quality as it was in numbers and deeply stirred by music and performance, heaped them with applause and made Mr. Higginson, its messenger, as it were, to bear to the stage its congratulations to Dr. Muck and to the seven or eight-score men that filled it. To the symphony and as complement and foil to its power succeeded the fresh beauty of Schumann's concerto with Mr. Paderewski to play the pianoforte part in the lyric and the poetizing vein of his golden and still unexhausted years, with Dr. Muck and the band to play the orchestral part in what the pianist afterward called an unsurpassed fashion. Indeed, they were as flawless of tone and as quick of lyric fancy as was he. Once more the audience had its fill of high pleasure; and it was not content until, toward eleven o'clock, Mr. Paderewski had ended the evening with one of his recitals in miniature.

Before an audience that in its quality of musicians and amateurs made amends, perhaps, for meagre numbers, Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, played for the first time in Boston at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon since he went to the wars and returned safe and sound, if a little rheumatic, from them. His three appointed numbers—Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," Chausson's "Poem," and Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso"—were all pieces for violin and orchestra wherein the band makes its own contribution to the symphonic progress of the music as well as accompanies the violinist. On this score Mr. Thibaud was not altogether wise in choice, and he might advisedly have included in his programme some of the numbers for violin and piano, and nothing else that he added to the concert after the audience began to disperse. Both sorts of pieces, however, affirmed equally his undiminished and his ripened power. Once more he played with the light and lithe technical brillance that distinguished him in earlier years or with that graver sense of the beautiful manipulation of his instrument and his music that has enriched his more recent comings. His tone caressed the ear with undulating flow, silken texture and ready sensibility to whatever inflection of rhythm or modulation, whatever tint and half-tint of color he chose to lay upon it. There was no diminution of finely tempered lustres; there was clear increase in ripened richness as a medium for musical design and thought, and for the poetry and the passion that flow from them under creative and re-creative heat.

Mr. Thibaud's performance of the Spanish Symphony glowed with rhythmic and melodic warmth and was touched with many an individual felicity of pace, emphasis, coloring and elegance of handling. His playing of Chausson's "Poem" was gravely beautiful in the flow of romantic feeling over the more melancholy and meditative as well as over the more ardent and aspiring passages, while to the pattern and the poetry of the music he added as lovely a pattern and as moving a poetry in his own tones. His playing of Saint-Saëns's Rondo made the coloratura of the violin like a fantastic and fascinating firework; while in the number from Bach that he added as an extra piece he gained once more that grave beauty of tone and mood which is his most distinctive possession [illegible] the master violinists of our time. [illegible] the[illegible]re, then, is it good to know that [illegible]ter [illegible] speedily return to Boston, when [illegible]uet [illegible]s no domestic festival to keep at [illegible]The many a willing hearer.

H. T. P.

EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONCERT AT METROPOLITAN.

The Vacation Association, of which Miss Robinson-Smith is president and Miss Anne Morgan is treasurer, is to have a benefit concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, on Tuesday evening, January 16. It will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists. This will be the first concert that the Boston Orchestra has given in Greater New York outside of its regular concerts in Manhattan and Brooklyn since 1893, when under Nikisch it came to the Metropolitan Opera House, and, with Paderewski as soloist, gave a concert for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The orchestra comes to New York for the concert, and is to return to Boston that night.

The scheme of the program, which is not definitely settled, calls for three pieces by the orchestra, a concert by Mr. Paderewski and a concerto by Mr. Kreisler, besides a group of solo pieces by each of these artists.

From the Transcript Dec.27,1916.

LAST week's Symphony programme of revivals repeated on Saturday evening, offers to the memory few serious moments—Mozart turning forth a symphony for occasion between one absorption and another, frankly to give immediate and passing entertainment, and Tchaikovsky also composing frankly popular music to please in its day, with his own readiness, and of a sort to give unfailing delight at the Pops. Standing side by side, the dusty symphony and the dusty suite reveal curious contrasts in their makers in the lighter vein. Both works are hastily strung together, both show an inexhaustible fertility in music to please. Tchaikovsky's suite does amuse, and it has its good points; a perfectly passable gavotte which trips along in the old rhythmic style, a fugue combining scholarship and entertainment, worked out in the approved formula of Bach (who could write an immortal humorous fugue when moved to), ending, in Bach's way, with a large clamactic statement of the subject in the trumpets, which was almost impressive and worth hearing again; also a march which must amuse, however artificial, and a divertimento and intermezzo with interesting soli for the wood wind, and melody in plenty. If the suite has its virtues, the symphony has its weaknesses—the Andante is repetitious and not orchestral, and the Minuet is one of many. But what a difference in the spirit behind the making of each! Mozart smiling, ingratiating, winning the affection in a second, as inexhaustible in melody and rhythm as in the sparkle of wit, composing as fast as his pen would fly because to live was to create with ceaseless zest, and fairly exuding in this case a brave and large beginning, of more than fascinating theme, and a finale overflowing with delightful cleverness and good spirits. Tchaikovsky, on the other hand, conscientiously writing light music in dead seriousness, efficiently, but with impersonal and almost mechanical readiness. Tchaikovsky's humor is doubtful indeed, or at best a negative sort of a humor. For if Tchaikovsky's music does not brood or suffer, it merely proceeds interestingly in the approved style of its medium, with little hint of a personality behind it. And whether the music is trivial or not, its fond parent has a large sense of its importance, and must give it its most exhaustive and lengthiest say, regardless of the requirements of its character.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhäuser," and the overture to "Rienzi." On Saturday afternoon the programme comprises the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C minor symphony, No. 9, and Tschaikowsky's seldom heard suite for orchestra in D minor, No. 1. This will be given complete, including the rarely heard "Marche Miniature."

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been very active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year.

From the Transcript DEc.23,1916.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Balakirev's "Thamar" for the First Times Under Dr. Muck—Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Copeland in French Pieces

FOR the last time through many weeks, the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will fall to Dr. Muck and the orchestra unassisted. Three pieces fill their programme —one a light but classic symphony; another new to Symphony Hall but already heard in Boston; and the third a revival off the shelves of the library, searched as never before since newly published music ceased to come from Europe. The symphony is the eighth of Beethoven in biennial and always warmly welcomed performance. The quasi-novelty is Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar," heard twice in Boston as music to the like-named mimodrama of the Russian Ballet but hitherto overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. It is the graphic tale in tones of the savage and sensual Georgian princess who dwelt in rugged solitudes by an icy river and there ensnared wayfarers to be her lovers. And when she had taken her fill of them, she slew them for further cruel and perverse pleasure. No music by Balakirev has been so generally admired. Finally, the revived piece is a set of variations for orchestra on a Lutheran choral, written by the Berlinese composer, Georg Schumann, and played at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Gericke fifteen years ago.

From WORLD
Address: New York City

DEC 24 1916

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhauser" (Paris version), and the overture to "Rienzi."

On Saturday afternoon the programme comprises the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's C minor Symphony No. 9 and Tschaikowsky's seldom-heard suite for orchestra in D minor No. 1. This will be given complete, including the rarely heard "Marche Miniature."

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been very active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year.

Paderewski's second recital of the season is set for Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 9, in Carnegie Hall. The week following his recital here he departs for the South for a series of concerts.

SUN
Address: New York City

DEC 3 1916

A concert will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of January 16 for the benefit of the Vacation Association, in which Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim and others are interested and which looks after the welfare of young women. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler will appear and there will be a programme by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck.

The proceeds will be devoted to the work of the Vacation Association, in which many persons prominent in society are interested, and it is expected that there will be a large and representative audience. Parterre boxes and grand tier boxes will be sold at $150 and $100 each respectively and orchestra seats will be $10 each. Applications may be made for them at the association headquarters, 38 West Thirty-ninth street.

EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

[illegible] (No. 4 of "Four Irish Dances"), Stanford-Grainger

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 5. The soloist at this concert will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the very distinguished and gifted Russian pianist, who has chosen to play here the second Concerto in C Minor by his countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. Rachmaninoff himself played this Concerto at a Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn a half dozen years ago. The program comprises the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Borodin's interesting Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," the Rachmaninoff Concerto and Weber's "Eurayanthe" Overture.

From the Journal Dec.28,1916.

'THAMAR' NOVELTY ON SYMPHONY BILL

There will be no soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. The program comprises Betthoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar" and Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the chorale "Wer nur den lieben Gott lasst walten." "Thamar" is a novelty.

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon will be given by Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano, assisted by Eddy Brown, one of the most brilliant of the younger generation of American violinists.

From the Transcript Dec.23,1916.

Thursday evening, Jan. 11, in Sanders Theatre at Harvard, the fourth of the Cambridge concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Seydel, the violinist, assisting.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Spalding for the assisting violinist.

[57]

From the Advertiser
Dec.30,1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES PLEASING PROGRAM

WORK WELL READ AND EXECUTED

Dr. Muck Recalled by Enthusiastic Audience — Greater Simplicity Desirable

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven—Eighth Symphony.
Balakireff—Symphonic Poem, "Thamar."
Georg Schumann—Symphonic Variations on a Chorale.

Strange as it may appear, there was once a man named Beethoven who wrote a symphony which lasted only about half-an-hour, was full of pretty melodies and playful and unaffected. This symphony and his others (for he wrote some others) had considerable vogue in their time, but, of course, they are not to be compared with our present hour-and-a-half symphonies, without tune and with an enormous orchestra with many more kinds of instruments.

In spite of this, the audience seemed to welcome this unambitious sister of the Brobdignagian works and to enjoy the humor which sparkles through every movement. It might be called a symphony without a slow movement, for the Allegretto, with its playful dialogue between violins and cellos (plus contrabasses) is more of a Scherzo than a true slow movement.

It is almost a "Bassoon Concerto" at times, for although that instrument has not any very difficult work to do, it is made constantly prominent. Beethoven loved the bassoon, and thoroughly enjoyed himself when writing for it. He had a name for his jovial moments and he called this mood "Aufgeknoepft," "Unbuttoned."

All through this symphony he is in this "unbuttoned" frame of mind. We need only record the points as they were made, in succession. The first movement gave its two jolly themes, its brusque development, its coda with the comical bassoon octave figure; the Allegretto Scherzendo its charming string dialogue aforesaid; the Minuet served to show that Beethoven did not abolish the Minuet by inventing the Scherzo, and was given in the delicate rococo style its antique effects demand; but the Finale was an entire frolic, and here the Coda, with that wild lead from flutes and violins to contrabasses alone (from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra) and the quaint joining together of bassoon and kettle-drum in obligato work and the suddenly sentimental contrabasses, made a climax that was as rollicking as possible.

And all this was read by Dr. Muck and played by the orchestra as if they heartily enjoyed it, as certainly the audience did. The evidence of appreciation was not lacking, for not only was there applause at the end of each movement, but at the close of the work Dr. Muck was recalled. Nevertheless we think that the conductor tried to make too much out of the work. Greater simplicity would have suited it better.

Then came something much more earnest, much more heavily scored, yet still belonging to the field of true music, Balakireff's "Thamar." We have had this recently with short-skirted, pedal accompaniment,—as a Ballet,—but its symphonic rendering gave it immeasurably greater importance.

It began in the deepest depths, as the Russians love to do, and was portentous to the last degree. It was easy to read some meaning into it. The rushing torrent and the seductive song of Thamar, for example, could be identified. There were oriental dance rhythms with triangle and tambourine for tropical effects. There was the Oriental monotonous reiteration of kettle-drum strokes. Nevertheless the picture was somewhat vague. Passion and mystery were there, and a Thamar night seemed to be as fatal as "une nuit de Cleopatra," but the end was so ecstatic and tender that we judge that the lovers did not disapprove altogether of this form of death. The orchestration of the composition was, of course, ultra-modern.

In the matter of variation-composition one can change the old saying into "A lot of learning is a dangerous thing," for whether the name of the composer be Beethoven, Brahms,—or Georg Schumann, the result is a tonal display that is remarkable for length and in some degree for conventionality also. There must be an exhibition first of this instrument, and then of that; there must be a variation in Minor to contrast against one in Major; there must be a fugue; there must be a grandiose or bombastic finale. Schumann's teachers, Reinecke and Jadasohn, equipped him thoroughly for this kind of task. Counterpoint sits easily upon him, and he can make rhythmic transformations with juggling skill. But such compositions are seldom very far from "Kapellmeistermusik."

Yet we must make an exception here. The combination of organ with orchestra was very fitting in such a religious theme, and it was well managed. The use of fugal form was also fitting in the treatment of a Chorale, and the counterpoint commanded all respect. And in the final variations there was a degree of development that was not only ingenious but inspiring, so that one cordially forgave the pedantic touches that were in some parts of the earlier treatment.

These variations may take rank with the large variations of Beethoven and of Brahms. In both of these composers, as in Georg Schumann, we find much freedom in the treatment of themes, and in this work sometimes even the transformation, by figure development, into new, strange and rich guises. Yet we doubt if the ingenuity of such music can ever be understod by the laity. Bulwer-Lytton once claimed for one of his works that "it was not written for the common herd." Much the same might be said about such masterly variations.

The playing of the strings in the fugue finale was masterly in the highest degree. The trombones, too, did very well, although too strident toward the close.

The overwhelming power of the finale would impress any audience, and we were not astonished to see Dr. Muck twice recalled at the close. The work of the entire orchestra and his own interpretation certainly deserved it, as this concert, like a wasp, had its most powerful part at the end.

From the
Globe
Dec.30,1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Balakireff's Thamar, First Time by the Orchestra

Excellent Performance of Variations by Georg Schumann

The 10th Friday afternoon Symphony concert consisted of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's "Thamar" (symphonic poem for orchestra after a poem by Michail Lermontoff), first time at these concerts, and Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the choral, "Wer nur den lieben laesst walten."

Georg Schumann, no relative of Robert, a choral conductor, teacher and composer, now living in Berlin, has written more inspirational music. The variations are respectable. They denote contrapuntal learning, a cunning ingenuity in the various devices which disguise, paraphrase and relentlessly pursue a figure through many transitions. The chief subject of the final fugue sounds equally dull whether inverted or in its original position. The expanse of a figure may be halved or doubled, and it may provoke a procession of forms of it in the theorist's terms of inversion, augmenution, diminution and whatnot.

The choral as such, and noticeably this one, has character. This example suggests the cathedral. Its melody is broad and uplifting; the harmonization noble. The whole is sturdy, wholesome, devotional. Made to dance in these masquerades and its character is lost. Becoming a tune to serve as fodder for a composer's invention it wears this or that costume which may display a certain skill in manipulation but rarely reveals beauty.

The two variations on an organ point first in tympani, then in double basses, in a sense restore the mood of dignity and of deep and quiet strength. The variation in B major, which suffered an unfortunate slip in the horns, escaped in its spirit of freedom and sincerity from the ponderous artifice, the assumed and noisy importance of the fourth. The levity and grace of the seventh as a mere fantasy was welcome. The work as a whole is swollen and pedantic. Cesar Franck's chora prelude and fugue for piano treated t choral as an art form, but kept its dign y. The great Bach ennobled it on the gan. Schumann's use of the o gan its sheer color is at moments arr ing, majestic, but the final apotheosis is not one of these. It is a noise inviting an orchestra to virtuosi e in-Dr Muck availed himself of it and a brilliant performance.

Balakireff's music of the baleful Oriental QueenThamar, who, in her mountain castle high over a gorge of the Terek, lured and reveled with her lovers for a night, then threw their bodies into the dark current below, needs the powerful stimulus to the eye of the Ballet Russe. They mimed the tale to it for the first time in America in Boston last February. There is Oriental suggestion; there is the visualizing figure of premonition in violas which returns in English horn and cello; there are the shimmering harmonic transitions near the close, but one misses a more compelling portrait of the cruel, sensual Queen, whom men yet called divine, and for whom they sold their lives. One misses the barbarous splendor with which Bakst drenched his stage picture in colors of settings and costumes.

The orchestral performance of this, as of the symphony, found Dr Muck in his accustomed keenness of perfection in music of varying periods and character. Beethoven's Scherzo was played with surpassing rhythmic and tonal delicacy. The orchestra will be away next week.

From the
POST
Dec.30,1916.

SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW TONE POEM

Balakireff's "Thamar" Is Given First Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

Beethoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's "Thamar," symphonic poem after Lermentoff, and George Schumann's variations on the choral "Wer nur den liebe Gott lasst walten" made the programme of the tenth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Balakireff's work was heard for the first time at these concerts.

POETRY IN DULL COLORS

The performance of the delightful symphony of Beethoven was all that it should have been.

The symphonic poem of Balakireff had evidently been studied with as much care for detail and reverence for the intention of the composer as the symphony of Beethoven—which in a sense, was quite wrong. For the methods so admirable in the performance of Beethoven's work were quite out of place when it came to the gorgeous, glowing music of Balakireff, music, whatever its defects, of an enormous and overwhelming vitality, music Asiatic in its excitement and sensuality.

The symphonic poem by Lermentoff which inspired Balakireff tells of the castle of the Queen Thamar, which still looms, in ruins, over the bank of the River Terek in the Dariel pass in the Caucasus, and of the wild fetes held there; of the travellers who became the victims of the beautiful and terrible queen, and whose bodies, in the gray light of the dawn, were carried away by the river "mad with fright," as a sigh comes from afar to the departing beloved. There is in the poem, and there is in the music, a vigor and imagery and opulence which should be felt to the utmost in any performance, and which were not felt. The most effective passages were those of which the orchestration was most piquant and refined, and the conclusion, where Dr. Muck was poetic. For the rest, there was constantly a restraint and an obsession with detail wholly out of place in this score. As a whole he have seldom heard this great conductor put himself more conscientiously at the service of the composer, and yet show so plainly his lack of sympathy with the music.

There will be no soloist at the 10th pair of Symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 29, and Saturday evening, Dec. 30. The symphony will be the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the "little symphony in F." The other works will be Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," which has not as yet appeared on a Symphony programme. Its performance undoubtedly will excite interest. The other work is Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the choral, "Wer nur den lieben Gott lasst walten," which has not been heard here since 1901 when it was played under Mr. Gericke. The length of the programme is one hour and 40 minutes. In the following week there will be no Symphony concerts as the orchestra will be away on its third Southern trip.

But those who were disturbed—if anyone could be disturbed by such a polite performance of this work—could console themselves of course for respectability and routine itself entered the hall with the performance of Mr. George Schumann's variations on a choral theme, which were for some reason or other repeated after a lapse of a few seasons.

From the Traveler
Dec.30,1916.

Although the patrons of the Symphony concerts had their first hearing of Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" at these concerts yesterday afternoon and Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on the Choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laesst walten" was also on the program, they voted without hesitation the honors of the afternoon to Beethoven's Symphony No. 8.

The Beethoven number is real music. There is no striving at puzzling effects and no effort to see how many instruments can be possibly employed, but rather to make the most of such instruments as are used. It is just a real musician speaking from the heart in unmistakable, ever fascinating terms. It was delightfully played. Incidentally, it is to be noted, Beethoven says more of interest in this brief work than many another has said in a work twice as long.

Balakireff seems to have struggled through his "Thamar" without the ability to clearly set forth his ideas. After it is all over there is something lacking. It is a puzzle without a solution when played without the ballet.

Georg Schumann was certainly not in his happiest vein in his Variations. One could well wish for more of the real musician and less of the student.

From the
Herald
Dec.30,1916.

BALAKIREFF'S 'THAMAR' HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Follows Fine Performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Is Succeeded by Playing of Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on a Choral.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Balakireff, "Thamar," symphonic poem after a poem by Lermontoff; Georg Schumann, Symphonic Variations on the Choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laesst walten."

After a finely proportioned and rhythmed performance of Beethoven's symphony, a symphony always welcome, although for many years it was underestimated, not ranked among the great ones, Balakireff's "Thamar" was performed, for the first time at these concerts. It was played at concerts of the Boston Opera Company in 1912 and recently was heard with a ballet in the repertoire of Diaghileff's company. Unlike the suite "Scheherazade," this symphonic poem gains by the miming and dancing on the stage. As a translation of to music of Lermontoff's poem, it is lacking in sensuousness, passion, wildness and horror. The most significant portions of the work are those that portray the roaring of the River Terek with the sinister suggestions of the tragedy to come, and the ending with the farewelling of the corpse by the wanton, demoniacal Queen. The melody typifying the amorous Thamar is not seductive, nor are the themes portraying her victims lured in the night mists by the inviting and hospitable light in any way characteristic. The music of the orgy is labored and dull. Lermontoff's poem might have attracted Richard Strauss. The story is that of Margaret in the Tour de Nesle, but Buridan was more fortunate in Dumas's drama than were the lovers of Thamar.

As in other works of Balakireff that have been performed here, there is a dryness in the music of "Thamar," a lack of fancy or imagination. No doubt he was a wise counsellor to the mer in his group, a guide, philosopher and friend; it is said that he was an excellent pianist, but with the exception of his "Islamey" and some of his earlier songs the music that we have heard is not conspicuous by reason of ideas or poetically dramatic treatment. As an original musical thinker he stands below his associates, Borodin, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff, nor did he have the technic and the sense of color possessed by the last named.

Georg Schumann's Variations were brought out here 15 years ago by Mr. Gericke. This Schumann belongs to the class characterized by the Germans as "solid" musicians. In one season he played all the sonatas of Beethoven in successive piano recitals. What might not be expected of one so lost to all sense of humor? In the present instance he took academic liberties with a staid Choral, but he strayed for a moment from the conservatory into an opera house where he heard "Tristan and Isolde" and then went back to work with a passage remaining in his mind. No doubt the variations are "well-worked," highly respectable, and at the end there is the anticipated, inevitable apotheosis of the Choral, allegro glorioso, brass and wood-wind and organ in full blast with fiddles in counterpoint, which brings the expected and desired applause. These Variations were composed at Bremen. They might have been composed at Stuttgart or at Eisleben.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts Jan. 12 and 13 will include three pieces by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceanides," "Night-ride and Sunrise" (first time here); Beethoven's violin concerto (Albert Spalding, violinist); and the overture to "Egmont."

m NORTH AMERICAN
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
e

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the third Boston symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music New Year's night, Monday, January 1. He will play Rachmaninoff's concerto in C minor No. 2, a work which was played here a half dozen years ago at a Boston symphony concert by the composer himself. The Franck symphony comes first on the program. In the second part, in addition to the Rachmaninoff concerto, will be Debussy's exquisite setting of Hallarme's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the program will end with the brilliant "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier.

From the Journal
Dec. 30,1916.

BEETHOVEN WORK WELL PERFORMED

Beethoven's eighth symphony—the "little symphony," as the composer described it, when comparing it with the seventh, the "great one in A"—is the most familiar and impressive number on this week's Symphony program. The performance yesterday, which Dr. Muck conducted in a fashion that revealed its manifold graces, also served to recall Beethoven's opinion that this mellifluous symphony in F major is one of his happiest works.

For the first time, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," is based on the gloomy poem by Michail Lermontoff, is offered at the Symphony concerts. It is not an unfamiliar composition, nevertheless, for it has been played here in recent years by the Boston Opera Company orchestra, with Andre Caplet conducting, and by the Ballett Russe orchestra. The ballet "Thamar," with Balakireff's music, was presented here last month, with Flore Revalles appearing as the queen who lures men to their death through her baleful beauty. The music pictures the adventures of several victims of the siren who dwelt by the waters of Terek. The performance was excellent, but not exciting.

The last number on the program is Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on "Wer dur den lieben Gott," an early 17th century German choral, which calls for full orchestra and organ. It is an old-fashioned work, with a stirring finale.

Next week the orchestra will be out of town. At the concerts on Jan. 12 and 13 the soloist will be Albert Spalding, who will play the Beethoven violin concerto. Three tone pictures by Sibelius will be performed for the first time in Boston. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" will complete the program.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date DECEMBER 24th

VACATION FRIENDS TO GIVE BIG CONCERT

Announcement was made yesterday by the Board of Directors of the Vacation Association, Inc., No. 38 West Thirty-ninth street, of which Miss Robinson Smith is president, that a concert for the benefit of the organization will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House, January 16. The features of the programme will be selections by Mr. Ignace Paderewski, Mr. Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sponsors of this concert are Miss Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Rogers Bacon, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Miss Mabel Beardsley, Mrs. Montgomery Hare, Mrs. Alexander Kohut, Miss Theresa O'Donohue, Mrs. Ponsonby Ogle, Miss Maude Wetmore, Mrs. Cornelius C. Zabriskie and Miss Alice Kirkpatrick. Four days ago the tickets were put on sale, and already half of the house has been sold. The following have taken boxes:—

Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Miss DeForrest, Mrs. Herbert Satterlee, Mr. Clarence Mackay, Mr. Henry Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Edward Breitung, Mrs. D. W. B. Dickerman, Mrs. J. J. Higginson, Mr. William Salomon, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mr. Charles Smith, Mr. C. W. Watson, Mr. Arthur Pyle, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim and Mr. Charles Steele.

PUBLIC LEDGER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Tomorrow night [illegible] the third appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program which Doctor Muck has made for this concert consists entirely of French and Russian music, with three masterpieces of the French school and one of Russia's greatest contributions to the literature of the piano and orchestra. The Symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D Minor, a notable work which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in Philadelphia in more than four years. This makes the first part of the program. After the intermission will come Debussy's exquisite "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C-Minor and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who has already played the Rachmaninoff concerto with great success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its Boston concerts.

EVENING JOURNAL
ss: New York City

Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the concert which will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16 in aid of the Vacation Association. Among those interested in the success of the affair are Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Maude Wetmore, Miss Robinson Smith and Clarence H. Mackay.

[58]

From the Advertiser
Dec. 30, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES PLEASING PROGRAM

WORK WELL READ AND EXECUTED

Dr. Muck Recalled by Enthusiastic Audience — Greater Simplicity Desirable

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven—Eighth Symphony.
Balakireff—Symphonic Poem, "Thamar."
Georg Schumann—Symphonic Variations on a Chorale.

Strange as it may appear, there was once a man named Beethoven who wrote a symphony which lasted only about half-an-hour, was full of pretty melodies and playful and unaffected. This symphony and his others (for he wrote some others) had considerable vogue in their time, but, of course, they are not to be compared with our present hour-and-a-half symphonies, without tune and with an enormous orchestra with many more kinds of instruments.

In spite of this, the audience seemed to welcome this unambitious sister of the Brobdignagian works and to enjoy the humor which sparkles through every movement. It might be called a symphony without a slow movement, for the Allegretto, with its playful dialogue between violins and cellos (plus contrabasses) is more of a Scherzo than a true slow movement.

It is almost a "Bassoon Concerto" at times, for although that instrument has not any very difficult work to do, it is made constantly prominent. Beethoven loved the bassoon, and thoroughly enjoyed himself when writing for it. He had a name for his jovial moments and he called this mood "Aufgeknoepft," "Unbuttoned."

All through this symphony he is in this "unbuttoned" frame of mind. We need only record the points as they were made, in succession. The first movement gave its two jolly themes, its brusque development, its coda with the comical bassoon octave figure; the Allegretto Scherzendo its charming string dialogue aforesaid; the Minuet served to show that Beethoven did not abolish the Minuet by inventing the Scherzo, and was given in the delicate rococo style its antique effects demand; but the Finale was an entire frolic, and here the Coda, with that wild lead from flutes and violins to contrabasses alone (from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra) and the quaint joining together of bassoon and kettle-drum in obligato work and the suddenly sentimental contrabasses, made a climax that was as rollicking as possible.

And all this was read by Dr. Muck and played by the orchestra as if they heartily enjoyed it, as certainly the audience did. The evidence of appreciation was not lacking, for not only was there applause at the end of each movement, but at the close of the work Dr. Muck was recalled. Nevertheless we think that the conductor tried to make too much out of the work. Greater simplicity would have suited it better.

Then came something much more earnest, much more heavily scored, yet still belonging to the field of true music, Balakireff's 'Thamar." We have had this recently with short-skirted, pedal accompaniment,—as a Ballet,—but its symphonic rendering gave it immeasurably greater importance.

It began in the deepest depths, as the Russians love to do, and was portentous to the last degree. It was easy to read some meaning into it. The rushing torrent and the seductive song of Thamar, for example, could be identified. There were oriental dance rhythms with triangle and tambourine for tropical effects. There was the Oriental monotonous reiteration of kettle-drum strokes. Nevertheless the picture was somewhat vague. Passion and mystery were there, and a Thamar night seemed to be as fatal as "une nuit de Cleopatra," but the end was so ecstatic and tender that we judge that the lovers did not disapprove altogether of this form of death. The orchestration of the composition was, of course, ultra-modern.

In the matter of variation-composition one can change the old saying into "A lot of learning is a dangerous thing," for whether the name of the composer be Beethoven, Brahms,—or Georg Schumann, the result is a tonal display that is remarkable for length and in some degree for conventionality also. There must be an exhibition first of this instrument, and then of that; there must be a variation in Minor to contrast against one in Major; there must be a fugue; there must be a grandiose or bombastic finale. Schumann's teachers, Reinecke and Jadasohn, equipped him thoroughly for this kind of task. Counterpoint sits easily upon him, and he can make rhythmic transformations with juggling skill. But such compositions are seldom very far from "Kapellmeistermusik."

Yet we must make an exception here. The combination of organ with orchestra was very fitting in such a religious theme, and it was well managed. The use of fugal form was also fitting in the treatment of a Chorale, and the counterpoint commanded all respect. And in the final variations there was a degree of development that was not only ingenious but inspiring, so that one cordially forgave the pedantic touches that were in some parts of the earlier treatment.

These variations may take rank with the large variations of Beethoven and of Brahms. In both of these composers, as in Georg Schumann, we find much freedom in the treatment of themes, and in this work sometimes even the transformation, by figure development, into new, strange and rich guises. Yet we doubt if the ingenuity of such music can ever be understod by the laity. Bulwer-Lytton once claimed for one of his works that "it was not written for the common herd." Much the same might be said about such masterly variations.

The playing of the strings in the fugue finale was masterly in the highest degree. The trombones, too, did very well, although too strident toward the close.

The overwhelming power of the finale would impress any audience, and we were not astonished to see Dr. Muck twice recalled at the close. The work of the entire orchestra and his own interpretation certainly deserved it, as this concert, like a wasp, had its most powerful part at the end.

From the
Globe
Dec. 30, 1916.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Balakireff's Thamar, First Time by the Orchestra

Excellent Performance of Variations by Georg Schumann

The 10th Friday afternoon Symphony concert consisted of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Balakireff's "Thamar" (symphonic poem for orchestra after a poem by Michail Lermontoff), first time at these concerts, and Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the choral, "Wer nur den lieben laesst walten."

Georg Schumann, no relative of Robert, a choral conductor, teacher and composer, now living in Berlin, has written more inspirational music. The variations are respectable. They denote contrapuntal learning, a cunning ingenuity in the various devices which disguise, paraphrase and relentlessly pursue a figure through many transitions. The chief subject of the final fugue sounds equally dull whether inverted or in its original position. The expanse of a figure may be halved or doubled, and it may provoke a procession of forms of it in the theorist's terms of inversion, augmenution, diminution and whatnot.

The choral as such, and noticeably this one, has character. This example suggests the cathedral. Its melody is broad and uplifting; the harmonization noble. The whole is sturdy, wholesome, devotional. Made to dance in these masquerades and its character is lost. Becoming a tune to serve as fodder for a composer's invention it wears this or that costume which may display a certain skill in manipulation but rarely reveals beauty.

The two variations on an organ point first in tympani, then in double basses, in a sense restore the mood of dignity and of deep and quiet strength. The variation in B major, which suffered an unfortunate slip in the horns, escaped in its spirit of freedom and sincerity from the ponderous artifice, the assumed and noisy importance of the fourth. The levity and grace of the seventh as a mere fantasy was welcome. The work as a whole is swollen and pedantic. Cesar Franck's chora prelude and fugue for piano treated t choral as an art form, but kept its dign y. The great Bach ennobled it o the gan. Schumann's use of the organ tone color is at moments arr its sheer jestic, but the final apotheosing, mais not one of these. It is a f noise viting an orchestra to virtuosire in- Dr Muck availed himself of it h a brilliant performance.

Balakireff's music of the baleful G gian QueenThamar, who, in her mo tain castle high over a gorge of th Terek, lured and reveled with her lovers for a night, then threw their bodies into the dark current below, needs the powerful stimulus to the eye of the Ballet Russe. They mimed the tale to it for the first time in America in Boston last February. There is Oriental suggestion; there is the visualizing figure of premonition in violas which returns in English horn and cello; there are the shimmering harmonic transitions near the close, but one misses a more compelling portrait of the cruel, sensual Queen, whom men yet called divine, and for whom they sold their lives. One misses the barbarous splendor with which Bakst drenched his stage picture in colors of settings and costumes.

The orchestral performance of this, as of the symphony, found Dr Muck in his accustomed keenness of perfection in music of varying periods and character. Beethoven's Scherzo was played with surpassing rhythmic and tonal delicacy. The orchestra will be away next week.

From the
POST
Dec. 30, 1916.

SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW TONE POEM

Balakireff's "Thamar" Is Given First Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

Beethoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's "Thamar," symphonic poem after Lermentoff, and George Schumann's variations on the choral "Wer nur den liebe Gott lasst walten" made the programme of the tenth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Balakireff's work was heard for the first time at these concerts.

POETRY IN DULL COLORS

The performance of the delightfu symphony of Beethoven was all that it should have been.

The symphonic poem of Balakireff had evidently been studied with as much care for detail and reverence for the intention of the composer as the symphony of Beethoven—which in a sense, was quite wrong. For the methods so admirable in the performance of Beethoven's work were quite out of place when it came to the gorgeous, glowing music of Balakireff, music, whatever its defects, of an enormous and overwhelming vitality, music Asiatic in its excitement and sensuality.

The symphonic poem by Lermentoff which inspired Balakireff tells of the castle of the Queen Thamar, which still looms, in ruins, over the bank of the River Terek in the Dariel pass in the Caucasus, and of the wild fetes held there; of the travellers who became the victims of the beautiful and terrible queen, and whose bodies, in the gray light of the dawn, were carried away by the river "mad with fright," as a sigh comes from afar to the departing beloved. There is in the poem, and there is in the music, a vigor and imagery and opulence which should be felt to the utmost in any performance, and which were not felt. The most effective passages were those of which the orchestration was most piquant and refined, and the conclusion, where Dr. Muck was poetic. For the rest, there was constantly a restraint and an obsession with detail wholly out of place in this score. As a whole he have seldom heard this great conductor put himself more conscientiously at the service of the composer, and yet show so plainly his lack of sympathy with the music.

There will be no soloist at the 10th pair of Symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 29, and Saturday evening, Dec. 30. The symphony will be the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the "little symphony in F." The other works will be Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," which has not as yet appeared on a Symphony programme. Its performance undoubtedly will excite interest. The other work is Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the choral, "Wer nur den lieben Gott lasst walten," which has not been heard here since 1901 when it was played under Mr Gericke. The length of the programme is one hour and 40 minutes. In the following week there will be no Symphony concerts as the orchestra will be away on its third Southern trip.

But those who were disturbed—if anyone could be disturbed by such a polite performance of this work—could console themselves of course for respectability and routine itself entered the hall with the performance of Mr. George Schumann's variations on a choral theme, which were for some reason or other repeated after a lapse of a few seasons.

From the Traveler
Dec. 30, 1916.

Although the patrons of the Symphony concerts had their first hearing of Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" at these concerts yesterday afternoon and Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on the Choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laesst walten" was also on the program, they voted without hesitation the honors of the afternoon to Beethoven's Symphony No. 8.

The Beethoven number is real music. There is no striving at puzzling effects and no effort to see how many instruments can be possibly employed, but rather to make the most of such instruments as are used. It is just a real musician speaking from the heart in unmistakable, ever fascinating terms. It was delightfully played. Incidentally, it is to be noted, Beethoven says more of interest in this brief work than many another has said in a work twice as long.

Balakireff seems to have struggled through his "Thamar" without the ability to clearly set forth his ideas. After it is all over there is something lacking. It is a puzzle without a solution when played without the ballet.

Georg Schumann was certainly not in his happiest vein in his Variations. One could well wish for more of the real musician and less of the student.

[58]

From the Herald
Dec. 30, 1916.

BALAKIREFF'S 'THAMAR' HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Follows Fine Performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Is Succeeded by Playing of Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on a Choral.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Balakireff, "Thamar," symphonic poem after a poem by Lermontoff; Georg Schumann, Symphonic Variations on the Choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laesst walten."

After a finely proportioned and rhythmed performance of Beethoven's symphony, a symphony always welcome, although for many years it was underestimated, not ranked among the great ones, Balakireff's "Thamar" was performed, for the first time at these concerts. It was played at concerts of the Boston Opera Company in 1912 and recently was heard with a ballet in the repertoire of Diaghileff's company. Unlike the suite "Scheherazade," this symphonic poem gains by the miming and dancing on the stage. As a translation of to music of Lermontoff's poem, it is lacking in sensuousness, passion, wildness and horror. The most significant portions of the work are those that portray the roaring of the River Terek with the sinister suggestions of the tragedy to come, and the ending with the farewelling of the corpse by the wanton, demoniacal Queen. The melody typifying the amorous Thamar is not seductive, nor are the themes portraying her victims lured in the night mists by the inviting and hospitable light in any way characteristic. The music of the orgy is labored and dull. Lermontoff's poem might have attracted Richard Strauss. The story is that of Margaret in the Tour de Nesle, but Buridan was more fortunate in Dumas's drama than were the lovers of Thamar.

As in other works of Balakireff that have been performed here, there is a dryness in the music of "Thamar," a lack of fancy or imagination. No doubt he was a wise counsellor to the men in his group, a guide, philosopher and friend; it is said that he was an excellent pianist, but with the exception of his "Islamey" and some of his earlier songs the music that we have heard is not conspicuous by reason of ideas or poetically dramatic treatment. As an original musical thinker he stands below his associates, Borodin, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff, nor did he have the technic and the sense of color possessed by the last named.

Georg Schumann's Variations were brought out here 15 years ago by Mr. Gericke. This Schumann belongs to the class characterized by the Germans as "solid" musicians. In one season he played all the sonatas of Beethoven in successive piano recitals. What might not be expected of one so lost to all sense of humor? In the present instance he took academic liberties with a staid Choral, but he strayed for a moment from the conservatory into an opera house where he heard "Tristan and Isolde" and then went back to work with a passage remaining in his mind. No doubt the variations are "well-worked," highly respectable, and at the end there is the anticipated, inevitable apotheosis of the Choral, allegro glorioso, brass and wood-wind and organ in full blast with fiddles in counterpoint, which brings the expected and desired applause. These Variations were composed at Bremen. They might have been composed at Stuttgart or at Eisleben.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts Jan. 12 and 13 will include three pieces by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceanides," "Night-ride and Sunrise" (first time here); Beethoven's violin concerto (Albert Spalding, violinist); and the overture to "Egmont."

m NORTH AMERICAN
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

e

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the third Boston symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music New Year's night, Monday, January 1. He will play Rachmaninoff's concerto in C minor No. 2, a work which was played here a half dozen years ago at a Boston symphony concert by the composer himself. The Franck symphony comes first on the program. In the second part, in addition to the Rachmaninoff concerto, will be Debussy's exquisite setting of Hallarme's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the program will end with the brilliant "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier.

From the Journal
Dec. 30, 1916.

BEETHOVEN WORK WELL PERFORMED

Beethoven's eighth symphony—the "little symphony," as the composer described it, when comparing it with the seventh, the "great one in A"—is the most familiar and impressive number on this week's Symphony program. The performance yesterday, which Dr. Muck conducted in a fashion that revealed its manifold graces, also served to recall Beethoven's opinion that this mellifluous symphony in F major is one of his happiest works.

For the first time, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," is based on the gloomy poem by Michail Lermontoff, is offered at the Symphony concerts. It is not an unfamiliar composition, nevertheless, for it has been played here in recent years by the Boston Opera Company orchestra, with Andre Caplet conducting, and by the Ballett Russe orchestra. The ballet "Thamar," with Balakireff's music, was presented here last month, with Flore Revalles appearing as the queen who lures men to their death through her baleful beauty. The music pictures the adventures of several victims of the siren who dwelt by the waters of Terek. The performance was excellent, but not exciting.

The last number on the program is Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on "Wer dur den lieben Gott," an early 17th century German choral, which calls for full orchestra and organ. It is an old-fashioned work, with a stirring finale.

Next week the orchestra will be out of town. At the concerts on Jan. 12 and 13 the soloist will be Albert Spalding, who will play the Beethoven violin concerto. Three tone pictures by Sibelius will be performed for the first time in Boston. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" will complete the program.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date DECEMBER 2[illegible]th

VACATION FRIENDS TO GIVE BIG CONCERT

Announcement was made yesterday by the Board of Directors of the Vacation Association, Inc., No. 38 West Thirty-ninth street, of which Miss Robinson Smith is president, that a concert for the benefit of the organization will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House, January 16. The features of the programme will be selections by Mr. Ignace Paderewski, Mr. Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sponsors of this concert are Miss Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Rogers Bacon, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Miss Mabel Beardsley, Mrs. Montgomery Hare, Mrs. Alexander Kohut, Miss Theresa O'Donohue, Mrs. Ponsonby Ogle, Miss Maude Wetmore, Mrs. Cornelius C. Zabriskie and Miss Alice Kirkpatrick. Four days ago the tickets were put on sale, and already half of the house has been sold. The following have taken boxes:—

Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Miss DeForrest, Mrs. Herbert Satterlee, Mr. Clarence Mackay, Mr. Henry Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Edward Breitung, Mrs. D. W. B. Dickerman, Mrs. J. J. Higginson, Mr. William Salomon, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mr. Charles Smith, Mr. C. W. Watson, Mr. Arthur Pyle, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim and Mr. Charles Steele.

PUBLIC LEDGER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Tomorrow night comes the third appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program which Doctor Muck has made for this concert consists entirely of French and Russian music, with three masterpieces of the French school and one of Russia's greatest contributions to the literature of the piano and orchestra. The Symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D-Minor, a notable work which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in Philadelphia in more than four years. This makes the first part of the program. After the intermission will come Debussy's exquisite "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C-Minor and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who has already played the Rachmaninoff concerto with great success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its Boston concerts.

EVENING JOURNAL
ss: New York City

Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the concert which will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16 in aid of the Vacation Association. Among those interested in the success of the affair are Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Maude Wetmore, Miss Robinson Smith and Clarence Mackay.

om EVENING SUN
ddress: New York City
ate JAN

Winging their high way from Boston, Dr. Karl Muck and his symphony orchestra gave their third performance of the season last night at Carnegie Hall. The occasion was marked by some good playing of three of the best known Wagner selections and by a truly noble rendition of the well known D minor symphony of Cesar Franck. Though not a surprising programme, or even a novel one, it made the best of these standard pieces which could show to ripe advantage the mass, the precise force of the Boston Symphony.

Modulatory, yet far from vague, the Franck movements have much to say. Different as they are from, say, his eight part paraphrase of the Sermon on the Mount, they are as inherently marked by that deep sincerity which was the chief characteristic in the shy and secluded life of the old organist of St. Clothilde. It was his gifted pupil, Ropartz, who found these words to say of him:

"He stands out from his contemporaries as one of another age; they are scoffers, he was a believer; they vaunt themselves, he worked in silence; they seek glory, he let it seek him."

That perhaps is what is uppermost in the symphony in D minor, unruly as it sometimes is, and large with unborn, agonizing melodies. Its bulk and solidity, its earnest intensity are attributes which belong by right of performance to Dr. Muck and his musicians.

The Wagnerian selections were hardly as successful. Of course after so much practice at "The Flying Dutchman" overture it was predoomed to be a masterly rendition. The swift, chaotic snatch of theme after theme gave more than ever the inevitable picture of wind and cloud in the frayed and stormy procession. But in those periodic rifts where the blue of the sky showed through—at the moments of the ballad, for instance, or of the apotheosis—there might well have been more warmth and tenderness to the mere sudden quieting of tone. The "Rienzi" overture, beloved of the tyro and of whoever is young enough to conceive of it, Wagner young enough to write it, went trumpeting to an awesome close, scarcely marred by the single brass note which flew astray. More interesting was the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, so little heard as a concert number in comparison with the convential fretted repetitions of the German one. It is a pity; there is so much beauty and imagination in this bacchanale ending.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
ss: New York City
JAN

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

In der Musik wie in anderen Künsten kommt es ja gar häufig mehr auf das „Wie" an, denn auf das „Was", und so konnte man denn am Donnerstag abend mit der unnachahmlich glänzenden Ausführung des Programms Dr. Mucks zufrieden sein, wenn man ihm auch keine besonders aparten Reize nachsagen konnte.

Die zweite Abteilung bestritten drei Exzerpte aus Wagnerschen Musikdramen, die man bei den Bostonern eigentlich nicht sucht, eben weil man sie anderwärts so häufig zu hören bekommt. Die Symphonie — César Francks D-Moll-Symphonie — ist allerdings ein eigenartiges und ungemein erfreuliches Werk, das immer voll wirken wird, wenn es gut gespielt wird. Dr. Muck dirigierte es diesmal jedoch in einfach superlativer Weise. Man kann sich denken, daß man es gegenwärtig in Frankreich und Belgien nicht liebt, wenn man auf den Einfluß Wagners auf den großen belgisch-französischen Komponisten hinweist, soviel ist aber sicher, daß mir die „Tristan"-Chromatik in dieser Franck'schen Symphonie kaum je so deutlich vorgeführt worden ist, als in der drängenden, ahnungsvollen, düsteren, absolut kongenialen Wiedergabe durch Dr. Muck. Die stürmischen Klagen und Verzweiflungsausbrüche im ersten Satz kamen ebenso voll zum Ausdruck als die Akzente der Schwermut, der Demut und der rührenden Bitte. Im zweiten Satz klang es wie Trauermusik, zwischen deren einzelnen Teilen eine süße Melodie die frommen Kinderaugen aufschlug. Im Schlußsatze war es wie ein Grabgeläute der Bässe, das wie zersprungene Hoffnung klang. Eine große Leistung seitens des Dirigenten und der Meisterspieler.

Die drei Wagner'schen Stücke, die „Rienzi"-Ouvertüre, die „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouvertüre, sowie das „Bacchanale" aus „Tannhäuser", Pariser Version, schwelgten förmlich in dem unnachahmlichen Wohllaut des Orchesters. Das selbstverständlich ausverkaufte Haus bereitete den Künstlern wirkliche Ovationen.

m EVENING Bulletin
ress: Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD IN FINE CONCERT

Brilliant Performance Given in Infantry Hall.—Irma Seydel Big Success as Violiniste in Concerto, Dr. Muck Giving Perfect Accompaniment.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an unusually brilliant concert in Infantry Hall last evening. In fact, it was the most interesting concert the orchestra has given here this season. Franck's Symphony in D-minor was the orchestral "piece de resistance" and Irma Seydel, the gifted young American violiniste, was the soloist, playing Saint-Saens' B-minor concerto for violin. An audience of good size attended.

This was the programme:

Symphony in D-minor.....Franck
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in B-minor, for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61.....Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra....Chabrier

The orchestra's playing of the Franck symphony will be remembered for many a day by those who had the good fortune to be present last evening. It is hard indeed to believe that this beautiful work was unappreciated when first performed. But that was the fate of much that Franck wrote. Like many other men of genius full appreciation of his work was denied during his life.

Now, a generation after his death, we are profoundly moved by the beauty and grandeur of his art. The symphony shows his melodic gift, his remarkable ability to combine the voices of instruments in novel and striking manner, and the power of sustained eloquence in orchestral writing. The first movement is one of impressive breadth and dignity and is remarkable for its richness of orchestration and ingenius and effective grouping of instruments. The middle movement contains a melody for English horn with string pizzacato accompaniment, and in the last there again appears a flood of musical ideas dressed in gorgeous colors, and familiar themes of the opening movement return clothed with strange but becoming harmonies.

After such a rich feast the time-worn Weber overture seemed somewhat superficial. But it was magnificantly played. In fact the entire programme was given with tremendous enthusiasm.

There was decidedly something in the air. Perhaps it was the Christmas spirit. At all events the men played with a fire that made the concert one of unusual brilliance.

The Chabrier "Espana" is a characteristic piece of writing—glittering with kaliedoscopic orchestration, and filled with catchy rythms. It was played with great abandon.

Miss Seydel scored a big success. Her appearance here earlier in the season at a De Luxe concert showed her great talent and in the concerto with orchestra last evening, she delighted her audience with a remarkably fine performance of the difficult work.

This extremely talented young violiniste might be called the "daughter of the Boston Symphony," as her father is a member of that organization and her teacher was C. M. Leoffler, who sat for many seasons with Frank Kneisel at the first violinist's desk. Miss Seydel gave an authoritative reading of the concerts. Her tone was ample in size and her technique of scintillating brilliance. Violinists who were present doubtless remarked the freedom and splendid efficiency of her bowing. In fact her playing shows a splendid all-round development. There is virility, temperament and a wonderfully clean execution. Her intonation is always pure and her tone is full and rich. The final movement of the concerto calls for virtuosity and in this particular Miss Seydel displayed great accuracy and clearness. The passage in harmonics was played with absolute purity.

Dr. Muck gave her a perfect accompaniment and at the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause that w[illegible] many recalls.

n EVENING SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 – 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The soloist of the occasion was Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, who played the Second Rachmaninoff concerto.

This is a work of supreme beauty, a brilliant and thrilling composition that has many significant and vital qualities. Written in a broadly emotional style, it has, in many of its episodes, a very distinct nationalistic flavor. At times the grouping of instruments gives it an Oriental and elemental coloring that is as suggestive as it is fascinating. Its principal themes seem to be an assembling of antique folk-thoughts. It is all so curiously of the soil. This concerto, moreover, is a composition replete with exquisite rhythms. In the first and last movements the solo instrument is used to a large extent as a part of the orchestral fabric rather than as an individual voice and for this reason the work has a very unusual richness.

There are splendid passages for the strings overlaid with pianistic arabesques. It is a work, too, of monumental crescendos and vivid fire. But the second movement, in quite another vein, seemed last evening a bit of pure inspiration. It was like some wonderful love song expressed in tender phrases, yet with an artless grace. It was an epitome of sad beauty and insistent appeal.

Gabrilowitsch's Performance.

This, no doubt, was largely due to the introspective performance of the pianist himself, for Gabrilowitsch is a peculiarly poetic artist, whose velvety touch and suave technique are admirably suited to the interpreting of a work of such nobility and breadth. His is a very unusual equipment. His playing is marked by splendid fire, by a broadly rhythmic freedom and a splendid brilliance, yet by an ineffable tenderness as well. His touch is like velvet. His tone round, his legato pure and singing. His titanic work in the first movement made an immediate impression, but the insistent appeal of his reading of the adagio, a reading so replete with poetic appreciation, so visionary and so quiet, yet so vital, was perhaps the most memorable feature of a performance that was as interesting and significant as that of any player who has appeared here this season.

The orchestra gave a remarkably beautiful rendition of the Debussy "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" prelude, one of the most exquisite works in the modern repertoire, playing this score with wonderful clarity and balance. Indeed, it is extremely doubtful if this popular work has ever been given a more significant interpretation here, for its pastoral quality as well as its really extraordinary sensuousness was expressed last evening with surprising vividness. It was a performance that made a very deep impression on the audience, the applause being so insistent that the musicians were finally obliged to rise from their seats to acknowledge it.

Schumann Symphony Beautiful.

The symphony was the rarely played "Rhenish," by Schumann, a work of no little interest and one that is both characteristic and beautiful if, in these last days, it does seem a little trivial. It is a series of five "impressions" of life in the Rhine country and it has, of course, the Schumann "song" quality that is always so appealing. The big orchestra plays such works very beautifully, with finesse and authority. This particular composition is full of moods and variety, generally gay, but sometimes just a little grave. Both the "Sehr maessig" and the "Nicht schnell" episodes were delightful, although neither of these has the serious inspiration of the "Cathedral scene," so called.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of the familiar "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

J. O. L.

Journal
Providence, R. I.

Irma Seydel
Violin Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday Evening.

The list of composers represented in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme on Tuesday, comprises a Belgian, two Frenchmen and one German; the Belgian being Cesar Franck, the Frenchmen Camille Saint-Saens and Emanuel Chabrier, and the German Carl Maria von Weber. Franck, although a Belgian, spent most of his life in Paris as the organist of the Church of Sainte Clotilde, and has been a potent influence in French music. The French composer of to-day of whatever schools and ideals are his direct musical descendants. His chief work was his symphony in D-minor, which is the first number on the programme of the coming concert. This symphony, like many other masterpieces of its kind, had to fight its way into public favor. In its early days it was pronounced cryptic, dissonant, but its value was soon realized and to-day it is the most highly esteemed piece of absolute music that modern France has given to the world.

The three pieces in the second part of the programme are the ever-youthful and brilliant overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, Saint-Saens's Violin Concerto in B-minor, and the Spanish dances by Chabrier which he calls "Espana." When this was first performed in Boston many years ago the late Ben Wolf, then musical critic of the Herald, said that the sacred codfish in the State House wagged its tail with excitement.

The soloist will be Irma Seydel, one of the younger generation of women violinists. Miss Seydel, who is still in her early twenties, has already played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with much success. Her father has for many years been a member of the orchestra and from members and past members of the orchestra, notably Charles Martin Loeffler and Andre Maquarre, she received the greater part of her musical education.

The programme in its order is as follows: Symphony in D-minor, Cesar Franck; Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto for violin and orchestra in B-minor, Saint-Saens; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier.

rom EVENING POST
.ddress: New York City
ate

Boston Symphony Gala Concert

THE gala concert which will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, in aid of the Vacation Association by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Messrs. Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, will be most brilliant musically as well as socially. As already announced, Paderewski will play the Schumann concerto in A minor with the orchestra, and his performance of this work ten days ago in Boston has been the real sensation there of several seasons. Kreisler will play the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor and will also play with orchestra his own "Tambourin Chinois" and Wieniawski's "Airs Russes." Paderewski will play a group of solo pieces for piano alone. Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestral numbers three pieces calculated to display the virtuosity and the brilliancy of the orchestra. The opening number will be Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." The second number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the third number Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice Espagnol." The scheme of the programme calls first for the overture, which will be followed by Kreisler; then "Till Eulenspiegel"; then the Schumann concerto with Paderewski; followed by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice Espagnol"; Kreisler, in his two pieces with orchestra, and finally Paderewski in solos.

m EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Gabrilowitsch's Distinguished Playing in Concerto.

The feature of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy was a superb performance of the superb Second Concerto by Rachmaninoff, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the soloist. The work has been heard here before, but it is not played nearly as often as its beauty and interest would warrant. The reason is probably that the Concerto is of the modern school and that the piano is treated as merely the leading instrument of the orchestra, so that the opportunities for personal display on the part of the pianist are much less than in many of the older works. Nevertheless, a poet of the piano, like Gabrilowitsch, who is willing to sink personality in interpretation of the music, finds abundant reward. Anything more utterly lovely than the adagio of the Concerto, as it was played last night, would be hard to imagine. The blending of piano and orchestra was so perfect that you forgot about the performers in enjoyment of the music. Then, when the climax came for a brief assertion of the dominance of the piano, the effect was fairly thrilling. The last movement was more nearly conventional, although at no time did the orchestra sink to older attitude of an accompaniment for a soloist. The lovely clarity of Gabrilowitsch's tone, the nice gradation by which he blended the piano with the orchestra and yet made its part of the score heard, and his power without hardness, where power was required, were all admirable. Indeed, the only quality of his art which the Concerto did not reveal was the variety of tone color with which he diversifies a recital of music written for the piano alone. But, to atone for that lack, the audience got a Concerto which was continuously interesting as music and had none of those dry passages which used to be written in order that the soloist might show off.

The remainder of the program was excellent and diversified; in that latter respect Dr. Muck is improving rapidly. It opened with the sunny and cheerful "Eighth Symphony" by Beethoven, while the piano Concerto was preceded by a lovely little atmospheric "Orchestral Sketch" by Borodin, in which the mingling of a Russian and an Oriental folk-song ended just before it would have become monotonous.

The concert ended with Weber's gorgeous overture to "Eurvanthe," in which Dr. Muck filled the soft passage with a sense of mystery and suspense, even if one knew nothing of the story of Emma and her ghost but had to consult the program for a key to the tragedy, which fell on the ear so impressively.

1 STANDARD UNION
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

GABRILOWITSCH PLAYS WITH THE BOSTONIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its monthly concert last night in the Academy of Music, had a programme that was a pure joy from start to finish. Dr. Muck opened with Beethoven's Eight Symphony, "the little symphony in F" that shows the master in his gayest vein, warmed in the afternoon sunlight of life, and then gave Borodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," from which the haunting start of the third act of "Prince Igor" was developed, the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist, and the overture to Von Weber's "Euryanthe."

The whole orchestra stood up to bow in recognition of the applause that followed the symphony, and after the concerto Gabrilowitsch was given a personal ovation, the like of which has hardly been equalled by that accorded any soloist at these concerts in many years.

The playing throughout was worthy of the highest admiration, the band seeming rather to excel themselves in exquisite tone and fineness of tracery in the musical embroideries. Gabrilowitsch had given the concerto once before with the orchestra at a Brooklyn concert, but that was back in 1908. Veteran subscribers noticed a thinning out in his once massive pile of hair, a thinning that amounted to extinction at the back, but also noticed a deeper, nobler art that has come with maturity. The dynamics of the last movement were as brilliantly contrasted as the flaming red carnations in front of him were with the bright green ferns.

1 EVENING WORLD
ess: New York
JAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night gave its third evening concert of the season before, as always nowadays, a crowded audience. The principal number was Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. More beautiful and significant symphonies than this have been penned, but we must have variety, and Dr. Muck and his players are to be congratulated upon the manner in which they exploited it. The climax of the concert was reached in the bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser." In this excerpt the orchestra achieved a perfection of ensemble, a tonal balance, and individual and collective virtuosity such as makes the organization unique. The "Rienzi" overture, although splendidly played, was an anti-climax.

om TRIBUNE
dress: New York City
e JAN

A gala concert will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, in aid of the Vacation Association by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Messrs. Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists. As already announced, Paderewski will play the Schumann Concerto in A minor with the orchestra. Mr. Kreisler will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, and will also play with the orchestra his own "Tambourin Chinois" and Wieniawski's "Airs Russes." Mr. Paderewski will play a group of solo pieces for piano alone.

Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestral numbers three pieces calculated to display the virtuosity and the brilliancy of the orchestra. The opening number will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride." The second number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the third number Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice Espagnol." The scheme of the programme calls first for the overture, which will be followed by Mr. Kreisler; then "Till Eulenspiegel"; then the Schumann Concerto with Mr. Paderewski, followed by Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice; Mr. Kreisler, in his two pieces, with orchestra, and, finally, Mr. Paderewski in solos.

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Rachmaninoff's C Minor Piano Concerto

PROGRAM
Franck—D minor Symphony.
Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Rachmaninoff—Second piano concerto.
Chabrier—"Espana," rhapsody.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist of the concert given to a crowded and delighted house by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Muck, in the Academy last evening. The work he chose to play was Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto in C minor, which was played by the composer with this orchestra here November 8, 1909. M. Gabriowtsch's reading of the work last night was even more impressive than that of its progenitor. It was plain when Rachmaninoff performed the work that it was not meant to give the piano everything to do and to say. A good deal of the time the support of the orchestra was quite as robustly voluminous as it could possibly be if the identity of the piano was not to be completely effaced. And so it was last evening. The ear never wholly lost the notes of the piano, but there were many times when the soloist and the tonal background were on an even footing, by design. At the beginning with the reverberant alternating chords of the piano alone it was as though the artist held thunder and lightning in a leash, and the continuance of the low voices by the left hand beneath the tempestuous accompanying instruments was as the sea under a lashing storm. In the Adagio that followed the clarinet imparted a distinctive and exquisite tone-color; near the end a dramatic pause, and then a perfectly executed trill led the way to a cadenza of great beauty, and a coda of lyric character over the prolonged notes of the higher strings. The closing measures on the piano alone were as simple as the final sentences of a chapter in a novel of Tolstoy.

The final allegro starts like Schubert's "Marche Militaire" and in mood hints at the madcap vivacity of such music as that of Chabrier, which followed; but ere the close the music was refined and spiritualized into the sublime climax, with its crashing chords, for which the pianist brought down his hands from almost their fullest upreach upon the keys. The soloist as is his wont, did not for a moment obtrude the ego. He played in a manner of gentlemanly elegance that comported with Boston Symphony traditions. But the playing was not cold. It was sentient and sensitive, vibrant and flexible, filling the air with singing tones. No wonder the house rose to it in a storm of applause, recalling the performer again and again.

The concert opened with Franck's D minor symphony. The bassoons, basses and 'cellos in their majestic stalking about in the opening lento, the voice of the English horn in the second movement, the pealing jubilation of trumpets and other brasses in the final allegro, especially were features of a performance which brought a response that would have consoled the great and misunderstood composer for the neglect, and even the scorn, of his own time. The figure of Franck is growing year by year. He must one day be accorded his place among the major prophets of music. In the Debussy score the flute of Andre Maquarre and the oboe of Longy delightfully prevailed and had much to do with creating the illusory and nebulous atmosphere. After the concerto the Chabrier rhapsody—which has a little too much of the suaviter in modo and was not fast and furious enough—was something of an anti-climax. Not so violent an anti-climax as Damrosch provided when he doused Harold Bauer's performance of Franck's music with the roistering claptrap of Grainger's "Nutshell" suite, but nevertheless, a good deal of a let-down from the high dignity of the symphony and the concerto. Of course, the idea was to achieve a salient contrast, but the audience would willingly have been dismissed with the last word in the idiom of Russian music as written by Rachmaninoff and played by Gabrilowitsch. F. L. W.

EVENING POST
ess: New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck's programme at Carnegie Hall last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra included only old friends. César Franck's Symphony in D minor, with its "idée fixe" reminiscent of Grieg, Wagner's Flying Dutchman, Rienzi Overtures, and the Paris version of the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Dr. Muck played not only the Bacchanale, but the portion of the overture that precedes it. Somehow his tempos seemed so much slower—all the way through the Venus music—than we have been accustomed to at the Metropolitan, that it seemed tame, rather than leidenschaftlich. The brasses in a unison passage in the "Rienzi" fumbled their notes, showing that even the Boston Symphony is human, after all. Aside from this, however, the whole concert was played in perfect fashion. The Symphony received a particularly sympathetic interpretation.

AMERICAN
New York City
JAN 7 - 191

TSCHAIKOWSKY SUITE DELIGHTS CONCERT CROWD

Boston Symphony Orchestra Also Excels in Playing "Euryanthe" Overture.

Neither novelty nor soloist was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, yet the enormous audience attending was one of the most enthusiastic of the season.

The programme contained the overture of "Euryanthe," by Weber; Haydn's Symphony in C minor, and Tschaikowsky's Suite in D minor. The latter might be considered a semi-novelty, for though composed more more than a generation ago its appearances at local concerts have been few and far between.

The suite is in six movements. Each plainly acknowledges its debt to Russian folk music, and proclaims its composer by many characteristic "effects." For instance, the great, sweeping scales which occupy important places in Tschaikowsky's symphonies are a noticeable feature of the opening movement. The pizzicato accompaniment on all the strings in the orchestra in the "Marche Miniature"; a certain melodious sequence of Oriental flavor which stands out alike in the intermezzo and in the piano concerto which Leopold Godowsky recently played, were easily recognized by the inveterate concert-goer.

Nothing Dr. Muck has presented recently has reflected greater credit on his intelligent direction than his work yesterday. His reading of the "Euryanthe" overture was so delightful and impressive one hoped more fervently than ever that the entire opera would again be revived further down town.

The symphony, an example of Haydn in his most fascinating, vivacious and melodious mood, was played with proper spirit, magnificent tone (especially in the strings) and faultless technique.

The variety and beauty of the Russian work were disclosed in a finished, clear and energetic manner—far removed from the dry academic—rich and warm tonality, and elastic in tempo. Dr. Muck was recalled many times after each selection, and twice when the programme was finished.

om CITIZEN
ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Gives a Brilliant Concert at the Academy of Music.

The third in the series of philharmonic concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Academy of Music proved as delightful as those that have preceded it and gave another opportunity to Brooklynites to show their appreciation of the splendid work that this body of musicians is capable of under the baton of Dr. Carl Muck.

In addition to the well selected programme for orchestra, Dr. Muck had as soloist the renowned pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who was heard in Sergei Vassiliebich Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano with orchestra.

The rendition of the three movements of this concerto enraptured the audience, which showed its appreciation by recalling the virtuoso five times.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major for orchestra led the programme. The four movements are captivating in their brilliancy, opening with an allegro vivace con brio, followed by an allegro scherzando, a minuetto, and concluding with an allegro vivace.

This splendid work, given a finished rendition by the orchestra under the reading of Dr. Muck, was followed by an orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," the work of the Russian composer Alexander Borodin, which teems with an Oriental atmosphere, with touches of peaceful Russian songs.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" was the concluding number of the evening. The heroic grandeur that pervades this introduction to the romantic opera is stimulating as well as fascinating to a degree that gives it a lasting charm.

Dr. Muck has established himself so highly in the estimation of Brooklyn's music lovers that it seems unnecessary to comment on his reception at these concerts; suffice it to say that the warmth of the greeting last evening by the audience that filled the house was that of admiring friends.

There are but two remaining concerts of the series. The fourth will take place on Friday evening, Feb. 16.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Third Symphony Concert in Providence.

The outstanding feature of the third Boston Symphony Concert in Infantry Hall Next Tuesday evening, December 26th, will be France's noblest contribution to the symphonic literature of our time, Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor. Franck, a Belgian by birth, a Frenchman by residence and adoption, is the most notable figure in French music of the last of the 19th century. Not only was he the greatest composer of France but further than that it was he who largely decided the charateristics of French music of to-day, for all the leading composers of France were either directly his pupils or pupils of his pupils. It is questionable whether there has been a musician in the last century who had such a vital influence on his environment as this quaint, simple-minded man, who spent his life practically in the organ-loft of the Church of Sainte Clotilde. None of his music, not even this splendid symphony, found immediate recognition from the public at large. His music, like all real works of art which are to last, must take deep root and grow slowly. To-day the Symphny in D-Minor has come into its own and it is ranked not only by connoisseurs but by the laymen among the dozen masterpieces of symphonic literature.

MISS IRMA SEYDEL
Violin Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening, Dec. 26.

The Symphony will occupy the first part of the programme. In the second part will be found three very brilliant works; the ever-youthful overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; the Saint-Saens Concerto for violin and orchestra in B-Minor No. 3 and the bewilderingly glittering "Espana" Rhapsody by the Frenchman, Chabrier.

The soloist, Irma Seydel, is quite the most gifted of the younger generation of American violinists. She has played in the past with the Symphony Orchestra with much success and her pedformance should be looked forward to with much pleasure.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony in D-Minor, Cesar Franck; Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"; Concerto for violin and orchestra in B-Minor, Saint-Saens; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier. Soloist, Irma Seydel.

HERALD
ess: Washington, D. C.

SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTS SOCIETY

Famous Hub Orchestra Plays at the National Theater.

Society folk of the Capital, apparently weary of the frivolities of the holidays and eager for more serious pleasures, were well represented yesterday in the large throng that greeted Carl Friedberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater. With the habitual music lovers who regularly attend these concerts, the society folk made an audience that filled all of the boxes and nearly all of the other seats.

The feature of the program was Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Mr. Friedberg at the piano seemed at his best and executed the solos with rare charm. He was accorded much applause, dividing honors about equally with the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, in the demonstration of appreciation.

Although the program was well arranged, the orchestra seemed to be under the burden of a vague monotony of repetition, but this was not strong enough to mar the effect of the concert. The program was as follows:

Tschaikowsky, Suite No. 1 in D minor, Op. 43; I, Introduction and Fugue; II, Divertimento; III, Intermezzo; V, Marche miniature; V, Scherzo; VI, Gavotte. Schumann, Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54; I, Allegro appetuoso; II, Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso; III, Allegro vivace. Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

The hump of the buffalo is not a mass of fat, but is formed by neural spines in length fully double those of domestic cattle, and by the huge muscles which lie alongside and fill up the angle between these neural spines and the ribs.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City

VACATION CONCERT AT METROPOLITAN

Paderewski, Kreisler and Unprecedented List of Stars Will Be Heard on Same Bill.

NOTABLE SOCIAL FUNCTION

Great Benefit for Philanthropic Work of Association Will Take Place January 16.

Great interest is being taken, not only in music circles, but in the social world as well, in the concert to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Wednesday night, January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association, and at which there are to be heard together Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Carl Muck. The announcement of a concert by any one of these artists would be sufficient, aside from the purpose for which it is to be held, to fill the Metropolitan; but the combination of the orchestra and two soloists has resulted in the sale, already, of all the moderate priced seats and a large part of the boxes and orchestra.

It is likely that only the opening of the opera season itself will compare with this event as a social function. For the list of boxholders as announced yesterday already comprises Mr. Vincent Astor, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. E. Breitung, Mr. W. B. Dickerman, Miss De Forest, Mrs. Henry Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. E. S. Harriman, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Pierrepont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Mr. Clarence Mackey, Mr. Arthur Ryle, Mrs. M. L. Satterlee, Mr. William Salomon, Mr. J. Steele, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. C. W. Watson, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Mr. A. C. Gurnee.

Needs of the Association.

The Vacation Association, in common with other philanthropic undertakings, has had difficulty in raising funds sufficient to meet its growing demands since the outbreak of the European war, the contributions of many of its donors having been diverted to aid the war sufferers in different lands. For this reason it was determined to hold some affair that should command widespread interest and should result in bringing to the treasury a substantial sum. After long effort the services of Paderewski and Kreisler, whose playing at the piano and violin has put them in critical estimate without peer in their art, were obtained. So with the Boston Symphony, which has long been regarded as "the perfect instrument."

A Remarkable Program.

Much curiosity has been aroused as to the nature of the program the artists will select. Speculation leads to the belief there will be a symphony, a concerto with orchestra for Paderewski, and one for Kreisler, some short orchestra numbers and some solos for each of the stars.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the board of directors of the Vacation Association, established at 38 West Thirty-ninth street; Mrs. Wendell Baker, secretary, and Miss Maude Wetmore comprise the committee in charge of the concert.

Originally, the single purpose of the Vacation Association was to assist young women to save money with which to spend a suitable and healthful vacation, but in the past six years the organization has developed many other activities, the primary idea by which all are influenced being to create a democracy of self-reliant women who are working to establish a mutual understanding and sympathy.

SUN
ess: New York City

PADEREWSKI AND KREISLER.

They and Boston Symphony Will Appear Together at a Benefit.

Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will appear together in the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association.

The gathering together of three such musical attractions for one concert is almost unprecedented, and betokens long and skilful work on the part of the officers of the association, of which Miss Anne Morgan is treasurer. Many of the tickets have been sold.

[66]

n Journal
ress: Providence, R. I.
DEC 27

SYMPHONY DOES BRILLIANT WORK

Dr. Muck's Players in Fine Form at Concert Here.

IRMA SEYDEL PLEASES

Gifted Young American Violinist Scores Big Success in Difficult Numbers.—Orchestra's Best Effort Heard in Franck's Symphony in D-Minor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an unusually brilliant concert in Infantry Hall last evening. In fact, it was the most interesting concert the orchestra has given here this season. Franck's Symphony in D-minor was the orchestral "piece de resistance" and Irma Seydel, the gifted young American violiniste, was the soloist, playing Saint-Saens' B-minor concerto for violin. An audience of good size attended.

This was the programme:

Symphony in D-minor.....Franck
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in B-minor, for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61 .....Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra....Chabrier

The orchestra's playing of the Franck symphony will be remembered for many a day by those who had the good fortune to be present last evening. It is hard indeed to believe that this beautiful work was unappreciated when first performed. But that was the fate of much that Franck wrote. Like many other men of genius full appreciation of his work was denied during his life.

Now, a generation after his death, we are profoundly moved by the beauty and grandeur of his art. The symphony shows his melodic gift, his remarkable ability to combine the voices of instruments in novel and striking manner, and the power of sustained eloquence in orchestral writing. The first movement is one of impressive breadth and dignity and is remarkable for its richness of orchestration and ingenius and effective grouping of instruments. The middle movement contains a melody for English horn with string pizzacato accompaniment, and in the last there again appears a flood of musical ideas dressed in gorgeous colors, and familiar themes of the opening movement return clothed with strange but becoming harmonies.

After such a rich feast the time-worn Weber overture seemed somewhat superficial. But it was magnificantly played. In fact the entire programme was given with tremendous enthusiasm.

There was decidedly something in the air. Perhaps it was the Christmas spirit. At all events the men played with a fire that made the concert one of unusual brilliance.

The Chabrier "Espana" is a characteristic piece of writing—glittering with kaliedoscopic orchestration, and filled with catchy rythms. It was played with great abandon.

Miss Seydel scored a big success. Her appearance here earlier in the season at a De Luxe concert showed her great talent and in the concerto with orchestra last evening, she delighted her audience with a remarkably fine performance of the difficult work.

This extremely talented young violiniste might be called the "daughter of the Boston Symphony," as her father is a member of that organization and her teacher was C. M. Leoffler, who sat for many seasons with Frank Kneisel at the first violinist's desk. Miss Seydel gave an authoritative reading of the concerts. Her tone was ample in size and her technique of scintillating brilliance. Violinists who were present doubtless remarked the freedom and splendid efficiency of her bowing. In fact her playing shows a splendid all-round development. There is virility, temperament and a wonderfully clean execution. Her intonation is always pure and her tone is full and rich. The final movement of the concerto calls for virtuosity and in this particular Miss Seydel displayed great accuracy and clearness. The passage in harmonics was played with absolute purity.

Dr. Muck gave her a perfect accompaniment and at the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause that won her many recalls.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Miss Margaret Wilson occupied a box at the National yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert, and had among her guests Judge and Mrs. William Hitz and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Baker, Rev. Ward Denys, Mrs. Denys, and the Misses Denys, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, with her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, and Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, with Dr. and Mrs. Foote and Miss Hartmann, occupied the other boxes.

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Rachmaninoff's C Minor Piano Concerto

PROGRAM
Franck—D minor Symphony.
Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Rachmaninoff—Second piano concerto.
Chabrier—"Espana," rhapsody.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist of the concert given to a crowded and delighted house by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Muck, in the Academy last evening. The work he chose to play was Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto in C minor, which was played by the composer with this orchestra here November 8, 1909. M. Gabrilowitsch's reading of the work last night was even more impressive than that of its progenitor. It was plain when Rachmaninoff performed the work that it was not meant to give the piano everything to do and to say. A good deal of the time the support of the orchestra was quite as robustly voluminous as it could possibly be if the identity of the piano was not to be completely effaced. And so it was last evening. The ear never wholly lost the notes of the piano, but there were many times when the soloist and the tonal background were on an even footing, by design. At the beginning with the reverberant alternating chords of the piano alone it was as though the artist held thunder and lightning in a leash, and the continuance of the low voices by the left hand beneath the tempestuous accompanying instruments was as the sea under a lashing storm. In the Adagio that followed the clarinet imparted a distinctive and exquisite tone-color; near the end a dramatic pause, and then a perfectly executed trill led the way to a cadenza of great beauty, and a coda of lyric character over the prolonged notes of the higher strings. The closing measures on the piano alone were as simple as the final sentences of a chapter in a novel of Tolstoy.

The final allegro starts like Schubert's "Marche Militaire" and in mood hints at the madcap vivacity of such music as that of Chabrier, which followed: but ere the close the music was refined and spiritualized into the sublime climax, with its crashing chords for which the pianist brought down his hands from almost their fullest upreach upon the keys. The soloist, as is his wont, did not for a moment obtrude the ego. He played in a manner of gentlemanly elegance that comported with Boston Symphony traditions. But the playing was not cold. It was sentient and sensitive, vibrant and flexible, filling the air with singing tones. No wonder the house rose to it in a storm of applause, recalling the performer again and again.

The concert opened with Franck's D minor symphony. The bassoons, basses and 'cellos in their majestic stalking about in the opening lento, the voice of the English horn in the second movement, the pealing jubilation of trumpets and other brasses in the final allegro, especially were features of a performance which brought a response that would have consoled the great and misunderstood composer for the neglect, and even the scorn, of his own time. The figure of Franck is growing year by year. He must one day be accorded his place among the major prophets of music. In the Debussy score the flute of Andre Maquarre and the oboe of Longy delightfully prevailed and had much to do with creating the illusory and nebulous atmosphere. After the concerto the Chabrier rhapsody—which has a little too much of the suaviter in modo and was not fast and furious enough—was something of an anti-climax. Not so violent an anti-climax as Damrosch provided when he doused Harold Bauer's performance of Franck's music with the roistering claptrap of Grainger's "Nutshell" suite, but nevertheless, a good deal of a let-down from the high dignity of the symphony and the concerto. Of course, the idea was to achieve a salient contrast, but the audience would willingly have been dismissed with the last word in the idiom of Russian music as written by Rachmaninoff and played by Gabrilowitsch. F. L. W.

EVENING POST
ess: New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck's programme at Carnegie Hall last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra included only old friends. César Franck's Symphony in D minor, with its "idée fixe" reminiscent of Grieg, Wagner's Flying Dutchman, Rienzi Overtures, and the Paris version of the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser." Dr. Muck played not only the Bacchanale, but the portion of the overture that precedes it. Somehow his tempos seemed so much slower—all the way through the Venus music—than we have been accustomed to at the Metropolitan, that it seemed tame, rather than leidenschaftlich. The brasses in a unison passage in the "Rienzi" fumbled their notes, showing that even the Boston Symphony is human, after all. Aside from this, however, the whole concert was played in perfect fashion. The Symphony received a particularly sympathetic interpretation.

AMERICAN
New York City
JAN 7 - 191

TSCHAIKOWSKY SUITE DELIGHTS CONCERT CROWD

Boston Symphony Orchestra Also Excels in Playing "Euryanthe" Overture.

Neither novelty nor soloist was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, yet the enormous audience attending was one of the most enthusiastic of the season.

The programme contained the overture of "Euryanthe," by Weber; Haydn's Symphony in C minor, and Tschaikowsky's Suite in D minor. The latter might be considered a semi-novelty, for though composed more more than a generation ago its appearances at local concerts have been few and far between.

The suite is in six movements. Each plainly acknowledges its debt to Russian folk music, and proclaims its composer by many characteristic "effects." For instance, the great, sweeping scales which occupy important places in Tschaikowsky's symphonies are a noticeable feature of the opening movement. The pizzicato accompaniment on all the strings in the orchestra in the "Marche Miniature"; a certain melodious sequence of Oriental flavor which stands out alike in the intermezzo and in the piano concerto which Leopold Godowsky recently played, were easily recognized by the inveterate concert-goer.

Nothing Dr. Muck has presented recently has reflected greater credit on his intelligent direction than his work yesterday. His reading of the "Euryanthe" overture was so delightful and impressive one hoped more fervently than ever that the entire opera would again be revived further down town.

The symphony, an example of Haydn in his most fascinating, vivacious and melodious mood, was played with proper spirit, magnificent tone especially in the strings) and faultless technique.

The variety and beauty of the Russian work were disclosed in a finished, clear and energetic manner—removed from the dry academic—and warm tonality, and elastic tempo. Dr. Muck was recalled times after each selection, and when the programme was fin-

om CITIZEN
ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Gives a Brilliant Concert at the Academy of Music.

The third in the series of philharmonic concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Academy of Music proved as delightful as those that have preceded it and gave another opportunity to Brooklynites to show their appreciation of the splendid work that this body of musicians is capable of under the baton of Dr. Carl Muck.

In addition to the well selected programme for orchestra, Dr. Muck had as soloist the renowned pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who was heard in Sergei Vassiliebich Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano with orchestra.

The rendition of the three movements of this concerto enraptured the audience, which showed its appreciation by recalling the virtuoso five times.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major for orchestra led the programme. The four movements are captivating in their brilliancy, opening with an allegro vivace con brio, followed by an allegro scherzando, a minuetto, and concluding with an allegro vivace.

This splendid work, given a finished rendition by the orchestra under the reading of Dr. Muck, was followed by an orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," the work of the Russian composer Alexander Borodin, which teems with an Oriental atmosphere, with touches of peaceful Russian songs.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" was the concluding number of the evening. The heroic grandeur that pervades this introduction to the romantic opera is stimulating as well as fascinating to a degree that gives it a lasting charm.

Dr. Muck has established himself so highly in the estimation of Brooklyn's music lovers that it seems unnecessary to comment on his reception at these concerts; suffice it to say that the warmth of the greeting last evening by the audience that filled the house was that of admiring friends.

There are but two remaining concerts of the series. The fourth will take place on Friday evening, Feb. 16.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Third Symphony Concert in Providence.

The outstanding feature of the third Boston Symphony Concert in Infantry Hall Next Tuesday evening, December 26th, will be France's noblest contribution to the symphonic literature of our time, Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor. Franck, a Belgian by birth, a Frenchman by residence and adoption, is the most notable figure in French music of the last of the 19th century. Not only was he the greatest composer of France but further than that it was he who largely decided the charateristics of French music of to-day, for all the leading composers of France were either directly his pupils or pupils of his pupils. It is questionable whether there has been a musician in the last century who had such a vital influence on his environment as this quaint, simple-minded man, who spent his life practically in the organ-loft of the Church of Sainte Clotilde. None of his music, not even this splendid symphony, found immediate recognition from the public at large. His music, like all real works of art which are to last, must take deep root and grow slowly. To-day the Symphny in D-Minor has come into its own and it is ranked not only by connoisseurs but by the laymen among the dozen masterpieces of symphonic literature.

MISS IRMA SEYDEL
Violin Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening, Dec. 26.

The Symphony will occupy the first part of the programme. In the second part will be found three very brilliant works; the ever-youthful overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; the Saint-Saens Concerto for violin and orchestra in B-Minor No. 3 and the bewilderingly glittering "Espana" Rhapsody by the Frenchman, Chabrier.

The soloist, Irma Seydel, is quite the most gifted of the younger generation of American violinists. She has played in the past with the Symphony Orchestra with much success and her pedformance should be looked forward to with much pleasure.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony in D-Minor, Cesar Franck; Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"; Concerto for violin and orchestra in B-Minor, Saint-Saens; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier. Soloist, Irma Seydel.

HERALD
ess: Washington, D. C.

SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTS SOCIETY

Famous Hub Orchestra Plays at the National Theater.

Society folk of the Capital, apparently weary of the frivolities of the holidays and eager for more serious pleasures, were well represented yesterday in the large throng that greeted Carl Friedberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater. With the habitual music lovers who regularly attend these concerts, the society folk made an audience that filled all of the boxes and nearly all of the other seats.

The feature of the program was Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Mr. Friedberg at the piano seemed at his best and executed the solos with rare charm. He was accorded much applause, dividing honors about equally with the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, in the demonstration of appreciation.

Although the program was well arranged, the orchestra seemed to be under the burden of a vague monotony of repetition, but this was not strong enough to mar the effect of the concert. The program was as follows:

Tschaikowsky, Suite No. 1 in D minor, Op. 43; I, Introduction and Fugue; II, Divertimento; III, Intermezzo; V, Marche miniature; V, Scherzo; VI, Gavotte. Schumann, Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54; I, Allegro appetuoso; II, Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso; III, Allegro vivace. Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

The hump of the buffalo is not a mass of fat, but is formed by neural spines in length fully double those of domestic cattle, and by the huge muscles which lie alongside and fill up the angle between these neural spines and the ribs.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City

VACATION CONCERT AT METROPOLITAN

Paderewski, Kreisler and Unprecedented List of Stars Will Be Heard on Same Bill.

NOTABLE SOCIAL FUNCTION

Great Benefit for Philanthropic Work of Association Will Take Place January 16.

Great interest is being taken, not only in music circles, but in the social world as well, in the concert to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Wednesday night, January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association, and at which there are to be heard together Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Carl Muck. The announcement of a concert by any one of these artists would be sufficient, aside from the purpose for which it is to be held, to fill the Metropolitan; but the combination of the orchestra and two soloists has resulted in the sale, already, of all the moderate priced seats and a large part of the boxes and orchestra.

It is likely that only the opening of the opera season itself will compare with this event as a social function. For the list of boxholders as announced yesterday already comprises Mr. Vincent Astor, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. E. Breitung, Mr. W. B. Dickerman, Miss De Forest, Mrs. Henry Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. E. S. Harriman, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Pierrepont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Mr. Clarence Mackey, Mr. Arthur Ryle, Mrs. M. L. Satterlee, Mr. William Salomon, Mr. J. Steele, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. C. W. Watson, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Mr. A. C. Gurnee.

Needs of the Association.

The Vacation Association, in common with other philanthropic undertakings, has had difficulty in raising funds sufficient to meet its growing demands since the outbreak of the European war, the contributions of many of its donors having been diverted to aid the war sufferers in different lands. For this reason it was determined to hold some affair that should command widespread interest and should result in bringing to the treasury a substantial sum. After long effort the services of Paderewski and Kreisler, whose playing at the piano and violin has put them in critical estimate without peer in their art, were obtained. So with the Boston Symphony, which has long been regarded as "the perfect instrument."

A Remarkable Program.

Much curiosity has been aroused as to the nature of the program the artists will select. Speculation leads to the belief there will be a symphony, a concerto with orchestra for Paderewski, and one for Kreisler, some short orchestra numbers and some solos for each of the stars.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the board of directors of the Vacation Association, established at 38 West Thirty-ninth street; Mrs. Wendell Baker, secretary, and Miss Maude Wetmore comprise the committee in charge of the concert.

Originally, the single purpose of the Vacation Association was to assist young women to save money with which to spend a suitable and healthful vacation, but in the past six years the organization has developed many other activities, the primary idea by which all are influenced being to create a democracy of self-reliant women who are working to establish a mutual understanding and sympathy.

SUN
ess: New York City

PADEREWSKI AND KREISLER.

They and Boston Symphony Will Appear Together at a Benefit.

Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will appear together in the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, January 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association.

The gathering together of three such musical attractions for one concert is almost unprecedented, and betokens long and skilful work on the part of the officers of the association, of which Miss Anne Morgan is treasurer. Many of the tickets have been sold.

[60]

n Journal
ress: Providence, R. I.
DEC 27 19

SYMPHONY DOES BRILLIANT WORK

Dr. Muck's Players in Fine Form at Concert Here.

IRMA SEYDEL PLEASES

Gifted Young American Violiniste Scores Big Success in Difficult Numbers.—Orchestra's Best Effort Heard in Franck's Symphony in D-Minor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an unusually brilliant concert in Infantry Hall last evening. In fact, it was the most interesting concert the orchestra has given here this season. Franck's Symphony in D-minor was the orchestral "piece de resistance" and Irma Seydel, the gifted young American violiniste, was the soloist, playing Saint-Saens' B-minor concerto for violin. An audience of good size attended.

This was the programme:

Symphony in D-minor.....Franck
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in B-minor, for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61 .....Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra....Chabrier

The orchestra's playing of the Franck symphony will be remembered for many a day by those who had the good fortune to be present last evening. It is hard indeed to believe that this beautiful work was unappreciated when first performed. But that was the fate of much that Franck wrote. Like many other men of genius full appreciation of his work was denied during his life.

Now, a generation after his death, we are profoundly moved by the beauty and grandeur of his art. The symphony shows his melodic gift, his remarkable ability to combine the voices of instruments in novel and striking manner, and the power of sustained eloquence in orchestral writing. The first movement is one of impressive breadth and dignity and is remarkable for its richness of orchestration and ingenius and effective grouping of instruments. The middle movement contains a melody for English horn with string pizzacato accompaniment, and in the last there again appears a flood of musical ideas dressed in gorgeous colors, and familiar themes of the opening movement return clothed with strange but becoming harmonies.

After such a rich feast the time-worn Weber overture seemed somewhat superficial. But it was magnificantly played. In fact the entire programme was given with tremendous enthusiasm.

There was decidedly something in the air. Perhaps it was the Christmas spirit. At all events the men played with a fire that made the concert one of unusual brilliance.

The Chabrier "Espana" is a characteristic piece of writing—glittering with kaliedoscopic orchestration, and filled with catchy rythms. It was played with great abandon.

Miss Seydel scored a big success. Her appearance here earlier in the season at a De Luxe concert showed her great talent and in the concerto with orchestra last evening, she delighted her audience with a remarkably fine performance of the difficult work.

This extremely talented young violiniste might be called the "daughter of the Boston Symphony," as her father is a member of that organization and her teacher was C. M. Leoffler, who sat for many seasons with Frank Kneisel at the first violinist's desk. Miss Seydel gave an authoritative reading of the concerts. Her tone was ample in size and her technique of scintillating brilliance. Violinists who were present doubtless remarked the freedom and splendid efficiency of her bowing. In fact her playing shows a splendid all-round development. There is virility, temperament and a wonderfully clean execution. Her intonation is always pure and her tone is full and rich. The final movement of the concerto calls for virtuosity and in this particular Miss Seydel displayed great accuracy and clearness. The passage in harmonics was played with absolute purity.

Dr. Muck gave her a perfect accompaniment and at the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause that won her many recalls.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Miss Margaret Wilson occupied a box at the National yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert, and had among her guests Judge and Mrs. William Hitz and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Baker, Rev. Ward Denys, Mrs. Denys, and the Misses Denys, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, with her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, and Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, with Dr. and Mrs. Foote and Miss Hartmann, occupied the other boxes.

m TIMES
ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y..

e

MUSIC NOTES.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Gabrilowitch the Soloist at Third Event at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music last night with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, a beautiful selection, one that is familar to all lovers of music. Beethoven, the master of symphonic style, in this symphony created a composition full of sunshine and happiness. There is no somber thought, only joy and a daintiness of handling that reminds one of spring, which was made more vivid by Conductor Muck's exquisite reading of it.

The second number was a short orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," by a Russian composer, Borodin, in its Oriental style most piquant and fascinating, lending a pleasant contrast to the program.

Brooklyn was most fortunate in having Ossip Gabrilowitch as the soloist in the concert. For the playing of Rachmaninoff's concerto in C minor, the piano gives the opening chords of the first movement, which is full of vim and warmth. The Adagio might have became monotonous and insignificant had it not been for the perfection with which the piano, clarionets and flutes performed. It was fortunate that this movement did not have to stand comparison with an adagio of Beethoven's. The last movement which is full of funny little half tone twists and tunes, a suggestion of a fuge at times is also typical of the composer in richness of chords that sound like the touch of soft thick velvets.

Mr. Gabrilowitch is a great artist, with a most pleasing and gracious manner, his brilliant execution, and subtle detail of nuance made the entire audience clamor for his reappearance on the stage many times before Dr. Muck could conclude his program of the evening with "Euryanthe," Overture of Weber.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.

Date

WAGNER-FRANCK PROGRAM GIVEN BY DR. MUCK

Wagner's three earlier operas—"Rienzi," "Der Fliegende Hollaender" and "Tannhaueser"—are no longer done at the Metropolitan Opera House. Why one of them, particularly the second, does not grace the repertoire is one of the inner mysteries within which are enkernelled the reasons for other curious matters of omission,. Certainly a production of the brooding drama and thrilling music of "The Flying Dutchman," presented within a frame of imaginative scenic art and with the spirit of enthusiasm breathed into the opera as a whole, should become one of the striking successes of a season. And certainly such a production would be far more interesting than the depths of routine into which "Tristan und Isolde" and "Lohengrin" have sunk.

It was left to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to bring to New York an imaginative and authoritative account of those portions of the three earlier operas appropriate to the concert room. Perhaps a wisp of irony floated about his inclusion of the three overtures in his program of last evening at Carnegie Hall. New York's provincialism in its regard for its opera house takes such extravagant flights now and again that this sort or irony from the Hub may not be amiss as a proper sedative,.

If the mere playing of these three overtures—that to "Tannhaueser" including the attached bacchanale of the so-called "Paris version"—constituted a bit of ironical comment for New Yorkers, the manner of their being played was still more so. For New Yorkers are now compelled not only to listen to singing, merely so-called by courtesy, in performances of the Wagnerian repertoire at the Metropolitan, but also to orchestral direction also in need of euphemistic apology.

Dr. Muck's performance of the three overtures might have been an object lesson to any representatives of the Metropolitan who last evening happened to be present in Carnegie Hall—and there was a number such. Nor was it even the most striking account of these things that Dr. Muck himself has given here. There was not the urge and elan, the cutting rubato in the "Dutchman" overture that there might have been and has been at other times; not quite the orgiastic revel in the "Tannhaueser" bacchanale that there should be, nor the ex-

n RECORD
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Splendid Concert. Ovation for Soloist.

The splendid program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night, and the masterly style in which, under the guidance of Dr. Karl Muck, the music was played, more than compensated for some of the recent disappointment felt by admirers of the conductor's judgment and ability, who felt that the concerts of the Boston Orchestra were not maintaining that standard of excellence long associated with the name of the organization. The D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck alone would have satisfied the most exacting and captious. When to that was added the delicate grace of the Debussy Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," the happiness of all interested in beautiful orchestral music was complete.

To hear Dr. Muck read the Franck symphony is equivalent to an approach to perfection of interpretation that must remain as a standard unexcelled and unassailable. The tone of the orchestra was superb, brilliant, flexible and with unsounded depths in reserve. Despite the tremendous climaxes there was never a suggestion of strain or limitation. What was true of the tone of the orchestra was equally true of the conductor and his interpretation of the great master work. There was a feeling of repose, of complete confidence in his ability to lead to a triumphant conclusion one of the most brilliant performances in the power of any conductor.

After the stress and emotion of the Franck work the Debussy Prelude was as a summer zephyr. It literally floated through space and was done so exquisitely that it intensified the impression made by the powerful Franck symphony.

The great climax of the program was the superb playing of Gabrilowitsch, who not only outdid himself, difficult as that may be to believe, but who presented a wonderfully interesting concerto of Rachmaninoff in such an overwhelmingly brilliant way as to create a veritable furore of excitement. New works, as a rule, no matter how well played, are not productive of ovations to those venturing to introduce them.

The Rachmaninoff concerto, however, is not only a fine work, but it was genuine in operation, a quality Gabrilowitsch did not fail to convey to his audience, which rose to the work as well as the player, and applauded until the piano was closed and moved to one side. Even then the uproar continued, and the distinguished pianist was forced to appear repeatedly.

Probably no one could do the difficult second concerto of the Russian composer with the intense sympathy and understanding inherent in Gabrilowitsch. The Adagio which must remind many in its flow of melody of the C-sharp minor Sonata of Beethoven, was impressively played and was, with the exception of the finale of the last movement, perhaps the most admired selection of the concerto. The Allegro, in its opening measures suggested the Schubert "Marche Militaire"—not in form, but in spirit. Rachmaninoff has succeeded in giving his work a wonderful climax and Gabrilowitsch brought out every particle of its power and the pressiveness, literally dominating the orchestra although Dr. Muck gave him an effective background.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

SYMPHONY DELIGHTS

Dr. Muck Reveals Much Temperament in Third Concert.

Never before in Washington has Dr. Muck shown so much temperament, so much life in his handling of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he did at the third concert of the season given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, with Carl Friedberg, pianist, as soloist.

Rare, indeed, was the reading of the six sections of the Tschaikowski suite in D minor, and the orchestra played this vital and sinuous music with a wealth of tone, rich and impassioned at times, and again with a fineness and perfection of tone values that were indescribably lovely.

The Tschaikowsky fugue was not alone a thing clearly limned, but it was vital with a Wagnerian fullness and sweep that rose to a stunning crescendo. Pastoral touches, a caprice with subtle syncopation and fineness, with rare figures in the wind section; than a true Tschaikowsky romance rich in its Eastern pathos, or as in the "Marche miniature" fairy chimes in marvelous effect, all these were endowed with a high art in execution and in interpretation with both imagination and emotion.

In the Schumann concerto in A minor for piano, Mr. Friedberg displayed a tone in harmony with the orchestra, a spirit of romance, and some very lovely melody work. He lacks a full command in his broader passages, nor does he discourse very eloquently through the Schumann "Andantino." His playing is musical and facile, but not always interesting. The orchestra felt the full beauty and depth of its many rich episodes.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was a blithe and delightful close to the program. It was given with spirit, grace, with charming rhythmic undulations. The short largo was almost ethereal with its organ tones given with a marvel of shading, while the finale was stirringly developed, full of beauty and of life.

J. MacB.

om NORTH AMERICAN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.

te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN ALL-MODERN PROGRAM

Gives Numbers by Franck, Debussy, Rachmaninoff and Chabrier

GABRILOVITSCH A HERO

BOSTON SYMPHONY activities at the Academy of Music last night were confined exclusively to modern composers. Each of the four numbers, by Franck, Debussy, Rachmaninoff and Chabrier, was redolent of latter-day rebellion against accepted standards of composition, and rich in descriptive idiom or dramatic intensity. With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the hero soloist, Doctor Muck provided a musical fare certain to delight both the dilletante and the expert of modern sympathies.

Gabrilowitsch was a hero, because any man who can play the second Rachmaninoff concerto is just that. Almost any audience will concede him a hero, no matter how he plays it, just so he arrives at the end simultaneously with the orchestra. But when he plays it like Gabrilowitsch, he is a sort of superpianist, and deserves all the recalls that were given last night.

With its compact construction, its durable, plainly significant melodies and virile harmonies, this is a work good to hear. But the tax it places upon the pianist is out of all proportion to its artistic fruits. No matter how much one admires the Russians with their peculiar ideas, or Rachmaninoff, whose genius is largely pianistic, it must be admitted that this work fails to satisfy certain traditions of the piano concerto, and yet offers no adequate substitute. The way Gabrilowitsch handled it last night is another indication that he is the finest pianist before the public.

The Franck symphony in D minor opened the program, and presented Doctor Muck's organization—or rather Major Higginson's—in positively its best light. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" completed the program.

om EVENING TELEGRAM
ldress: New York City

FAMOUS ARTISTS FOR VACATION FUND RECITAL

Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Boston Symphony Orchestra for Association Concert.

MANY BOXES AND ORCHESTRA SEATS BOUGHT.

Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Karl Muck, are to be heard together at the great concert to be given the night of January 16, at the Metropolitan Opera House, for the benefit of the Vacation Association, of which Miss Anne Morgan is treasurer. The combination of the two great soloists and the famous orchestra has resulted in the sale already of all the moderate price seats and a large part of the boxes and orchestra seats.

Among those announced as taking boxes for the concert are Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Henry Frick, Miss de Forest, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. H. L. Satterlee, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. C. W. Watson, Mrs. John E. Parsons and Messrs. Vincent Astor, W. B. Dickerman, Clarence H. Mackay, Arthur Ryle, William Salomon, Charles Steele and A. C. Gurnee.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the Board of Directors of the association; Mrs. Wendell Baker, secretary, and Miss Maude Wetmore compose the committee in charge of the concert.

Originally the single purpose of the association was to aid young women to save money with which to spend a suitable and healthful vacation. In the six years of its existence, however, the organization has developed other activities. Like other philanthropic organizations, it has met with difficulty in raising funds for its purposes since the outbreak of the war, the contributions of its supporters in many cases having been diverted to aid war sufferers, and the concert was decided upon as an affair which would bring a substantial sum to the organization's

m PUBLIC LEDGER
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 3 - 1917

e

RUSSIAN PIANIST NOT WEARIED BY LABORS

Gabrilowitsch Plays With Undying Art on Boston's Fine Romantic Program

Ossip Gabrilowitsch is a remarkable (and busy) man. Lighter talents than those of the Russian pianist might sink beneath the liberal loads of work which he imposes on them. The number and variety of his recent performances in this city and elsewhere would not be tolerated by most artists of the concert stage. They would think it something like an outrage.

That Mr. Gabrilowitsch doesn't think it an outrage to work hard and with continuous brilliancy was proven by his activity of the two days just past. On Sunday night, in New York, he not only led an orchestra through a mazy and difficult program of Tschaikowsky, but played the B flat minor piano concerto himself. The critics praised his composite duties strongly.

Too much recent history is a failing of many musical criticisms but it must be set down that Mr. Gabrilowitsch played Brahms's second concerto when he shared the stage with Mr. Stokowski at the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts on December 22 and 23. With the Boston he had no such mystical and precious thing on which to throw the light of his shining genius but the restless, glittering, phosphorescent second concerto of Rachmaninoff. Perhaps stranger contrasts than the fevered and melodious Russian composer and the serene and passionate and more than melodious German have existed. Surely not often. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, so it seems, is not a nationalist in art. He gave to the Rachmaninoff number all the care and loving attention that he gave to Brahms, and if the result was not so breath-taking in its beauty it was not his fault. He even partially covered the slightly stilted manner of that melodramatic and brazen cadenza, making it seem but a ripple of exhuberance. In the musing adagio he breathed poetry into the keys with faint yet fine insistence. And Rachmaninoff is better at all other things than trying to muse. Then he drones. All the vim and the elasticity of the work were brought out with crisp incision, a quality well in keeping with the rest of the program.

This must have been a surprise, in its entirety, to those who properly, but somewhat too excludingly, admire Doctor Muck and his programs as one and the same thing. The conductor was not in his most academic vein when he arranged this one, at all events. There was not a suggestion of the pedantic, of the too terribly formal, in the numbers. These were the Franck D minor symphony, the prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," now as familiar (thanks to the Ballet Russe and phonograph) as "Coppelia" and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana.' The first was played with grandeur and humility; the second with positively inspired insight into its grotesque loveliness; the third with crackling vivacity and dance-like motion.

From which the reader may (nay, must) infer that a concert filled with color, with fragrance and with some of the brightest flowers in the romanticist garden was given last night, and by a conductor usually associated with classic music.

R. D.

om SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.

GABRILOWITSCH WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, January 3, at 8.15, with a distinguished pianist as soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert another thoroughly fascinating program and one which incidentally touches on the lighter vein of music.

The symphony will be Schumann's Third in E flat major, generally known as the "Rhenish" symphony. Schumann's symphonies for a number of years fell into more or less disfavor because critics were wont to say that he lacked the instinct for writing for the orchestra and that his symphonies sounded better as four-handed piano pieces than they did as orchestral works. In the end, however, experience has shown that if Schumann cannot be ranked among the greatest writers for orchestra, it is largely because the individual conductor has been unable to do them justice. The symphony in E flat, which is to be played here, is in every respect a notable work. Schumann in writing it sought to give expression to the life and feeling of the people of the Lower Rhine, and few will gainsay that he has succeeded. The performance of this symphony by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in the nature of a revelation to the musical public of Boston and New York earlier in the season.

The second part of the program will comprise Debussy's exquisite setting of Mallarme's Eclogue, "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," the splendid concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra of the Russian Sergei Rachmaninoff, and Weber's brilliant Overture, "Euryanthe." It will be remembered that Rachmaninoff himself played this concerto in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra seven years ago.

The program in its proper order is as follows: Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Schumann; "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," Debussy; concerto for piano, No. 2, in C minor, Rachmaninoff; overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," Weber. Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

[61]

m EVENING TELEGRAM
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

e

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN COLORFUL PROGRAM

Dr. Muck Leads Fine Performance With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

Lovers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given a rare treat last night at the Academy of Music, when Dr. Muck led his musicians through a program that was a delight from start to finish. In welcome contrast to the lists of numbers he has presented lately, his concert last night was all color—from the great splashes of pigment with which Franck painted his D minor symphony, through the delicate pastels of Debussy'e "Faun" idyll and the vivid, rich tones of the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, to the warm, smooth tints of Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

It was an unusual program for Dr. Muck; but it showed him as a conductor quite in key with fervor and emotion, and the whole gamut of sentience run by the latter-day composers who are too pulsingly alive to tolerate the rattling bones of classicism.

The Franck number, with its inexpressibly lovely melodies and its weaving of phrases that lead to limitless imagery, was played with rather greater contrast both in timbre and tempi, than we have been accustomed to, but it was all the more interesting on that account as giving an individual viewpoint and an interpretation that had its own charm. The Dubussy number was done with notable delicacy, and poetry and the Chabrier tone picture was presented with a swing and abandon that quite carried the audience along.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who was also the soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra at a recent concert, appeared last night with the Bostonians. He chose Rachminanoff's second piano concerto—a tremendous thing that regards the solo instrument almost as an orchestra in itself, and demands of the soloist the ultimate of physical strength as well as artistic understanding. Gabrilowitsch finished it to a veritable ovation, and he deserved it, for he has never been heard to better advantage here.

n HERALD
ress: New York City

:

* * *

An unusually interesting programme has been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given under institute auspices in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist.

The scheme of the programme begins with Beethoven's eighth symphony, "The Little Symphony in F," in the performance of which Dr. Muck has always been peculiarly happy. In the second part of the programme will be found that uiusual and entirely characteristic piece by the Russian Borodin, which he calls "On the Steppes of Central Asia." It has been truly entitled "an exquisite aquarello." In its coloring it is delicate, yet distinct. It is seldom, indeed, that one can listen to music which paints so well the solitude and desolateness of those great plains over which the caravans wander.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play the second concerto, that in C minor of his very distinguished countryman, Sergei Rachmaninoff. It will be remembered that the composer himself played it here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1909. It is a work in every respect maintaining the standard one should expect from the composer of "The Isle of the Dead," and the great second symphony and its performance with Mr. Gabrilowitsch is a work of love.

The programme is as follows—Beethoven, Symphony in F-major, No. 8; Borodin, Orchestral Sketches, 'On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Rachmininoff, Concerto for piano, No. 2, in C minor; Weber, overture to the opera "Euryanthe."

Mr. Henry E. Krehbiel, musical critic, will give a lecture recital under Institute auspices on Wednesday evening, in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, on the programme to be rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third appearance of the season on Friday evening.

m EVENING SUN
ress: New York City

BENEFIT CONCERT POPULAR.

Tickets for Vacation Association Performance Selling Rapidly.

Great interest is being taken in the concert to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Wednseday night, Jan. 16, for the benefit of the Vacation Association.

Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchtsera are to be heard together under the baton of Dr. Carl Muck. All the moderate priced seats and a large part of the boxes and orchestra have been sold.

The list of box holders as announced yesterday already comprises Vincent Astor, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. E. Breitung, W. B. Dickerman, Miss de Forest, Mrs. Henry Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. E. Hooker, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Clarence Mackay, Arthur Ryle, Mrs. H. L. Satterlee, William Salomon, C. Steele, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, C. W. Watson, Mrs. John E. Parsons and A. C. Gurnee.

om BULLETIN
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY

hird Concert of Season With Gabrilowitsch as Soloist

For the third Boston Symphony concert f the season, at the Academy of Music, st night, Dr. Muck presented a program hich included Cesar Franck's symphony n D-minor, the Debussy prelude to "The fternoon of a Faun," the colorful "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier, and Rachmaninoff's second concerto, with Ossip Gabrilowitch at the piano.

The occasion was altogether a delightful ne, for the music lovers who took up lmost every seat in the big auditorium, nd proved beyond a doubt that it is ossible to construct a program of modrn music in which the instruments of the rchestra have an opportunity to sing, ather than to make a series of noises hich are supposed to have a meaning idden away somewhere in the program otes.

As read by Dr. Muck and interpreted by he skilled band of musicians under his aton, the Franck symphony sounded epths and reached heights of orchestral ffectiveness that were enthralling in tonal eauty and impressive in perfection of echnical detail. It was a magnificent perormance of a beautiful work, in which nothing in the way of poetry or of romance was slighted, and in which climax was attained with artistic repression but no falling short of the desired effect.

The superiority of Mr. Gabrilowitsch as a pianist was so recently recognized here, upon his appearance as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, that praise of his splendid interpretation of the Rachmaninoff concerto last evening need be only in the way of emphasis. There are few such sincere and altogether masterful pianists as Gabrilowitsch, who adds all that is necessary to complete the ground-work of expert technical ability, and his emphatic success last evening was fully deserved.

The Debussy number was exquisitely played, and the Crabrier rhapsody gave a brilliant conclusion to the program, although this is not the kind of music which seems most directly to appeal to

Dr. Muck, and it has been given more satisfying interpretations here under other conductors.

om TRIBUNE
dress: New York City
e

DR. MUCK AND HIS BOSTON MUSICIANS LIKE THEIR WAGNER

Programme at Carnegie Hall Permits One Number by Franck

Our friends from Boston were with us again last night and Carnegie Hall greeted them in full measure. Dr. Muck's ideas of programme building are unique, they always have been, and adverse comment apparently does not change them. Why, for instance, he should feel called upon to restrict all but one of his offerings to the works of Wagner might well be asked. Here in New York we have Wagner at least once a week at the opera, with whole afternoons and evenings devoted to him by Mr. Stransky, and with Mr. Damrosch far from ignoring him.

Yet Dr. Muck gave us last night the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Rienzi" and the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhäuser." With a whole world of little-heard music to draw from, the Boston Orchestra might be permitted to draw from it and to render its programmes far more attractive than they have been of late years.

Let us be thankful, however, that one number was not by Wagner. The César Franck D minor symphony is one of the noblest of modern works, one of the purest, sincerest, most melodious, most inspired. It is the Belgian composer at his best, serene in spirit and expression. Dr. Muck found himself and his audience equally in sympathy with it, and the great band gave it a superb performance—a performance resonant in tone, finely balanced, beautifully articulated, by turns delicate and powerful.

om EVENING NEWS
ldress: Baltimore, Md.
DEC 30

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, with a distinguished pianist as soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert another thoroughly fascinating program and one which, incidentally, touches on the lighter vein of music. The symphony will be Schumann's third in E flat major, generally known as the "Rhenish" symphony.

The second part of the program will comprise Debussy's exquisite setting of Mallarme's ecologue, "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," the splendid concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra of the Russian, Sergei Rachmaninoff, and Weber's brilliant overture, "Euryanthe." It will be remembered that Rachmaninoff himself played this concerto in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra seven years ago.

n EVENING POST
ress: New York City

Liszt in Boston

DR. MUCK provided a great treat for patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week by again performing Liszt's "Faust" symphony with improvements, and conducting the Schumann concerto, with Paderewski as soloist. Concerning the changes in the Liszt symphony Philip Hale says in the programme-book:

"In 1912, Dr. Carl Muck found in the library at Wagner's home, Wahnfried, in Bayreuth, the score of Liszt's 'Faust' symphony with many pencilled changes and additions. He was told that Liszt made these revisions about 1883. The revisions have never been published. There has been no comment about them in a music periodical. The score was given to Dr. Muck with the permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit.

"In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or in the episodes. The changes for the most part affect the orchestration. Thus early in 'Faust' an arioso written originally for bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced to reinforce, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest number of changes is in 'Mephistopheles,' where the 'vision of Gretchen' is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony; sometimes only measure, sometimes more."

TIMES
ss: New York City

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Franck's Symphony and Three Wagner Overtures Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert in Carnegie Hall last evening without a solo performer, as it has given its others here this season. The orchestra is properly made the centre of interest, without the intervention of an artistic personality that may or may not be sympathetic. The program was made up of César Franck's symphony and three Wagnerian overtures, that to "The Flying Dutchman," the overture and Bachanale from the Paris version of "Tannhäuser," and the overture to "Rienzi."

The performance of Franck's symphony was a profoundly beautiful one, noble in conception, wrought out in an infinity of subtle detail of nuance, dynamic contrast, and orchestral color. The symphony seems, in even so fine a performance as this, somewhat long, too long for the reasonable development of the musical ideas upon which it is based. It seems as if Franck, in saying less, would have said more; for the impression that certain pages give of undue prolixity would have been avoided. The audience was much interested in the work and the performance, and applause was especially intensive after the first movement.

The three overtures by Wagner were a somewhat singular constituent of a symphony program. It would probably be found that their juxtaposition was the result of some very definite theory of Dr. Muck's as to program making. And they are the sort of thing that can hardly be made to sound better than he makes them sound.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Henry E. Krehbiel, in Institute Lecture-Recital, Reviews It.

Henry E. Krehbiel of Manhattan lectured, last evening, under Institute auspices, on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music tomorrow night. Miss Clara Rabinowitz, a talented young pianist and former student at the Institute of Musical Art, played the themes of the composition. Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major, opus 93, was outlined in detail by Mr. Krehbiel, who told stories of the origin of some of the themes and pointed out the use of the kettledrum, for the first time, in the development of a theme, as shown in one movement, in the Symphony. and the tick of the metronome in the second, or scherzando movement. Speaking on the "minuet" movement he referred to the arguments that arose when von Bulow, in this country, played the tempo slower than Beethoven had marked it, declaring it more dignified that way, but in the opinion of the lecturer the composer knew how he wanted his own compositions played, and they can hardly be improved upon. "On the Steppes of Central Asia," by Borodin, he described as program music. In the last number, the overture to "Euryanthe," by von Weber, was presented a conventional overture, taking the melodies of the opera for its themes, the speaker said. The music, he declared, is some of the most beautiful ever composed.

STAR
ress: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 19

INTEREST AND BOREDOM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

An affair full of interest and boredom, chiefly boredom, was the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric last night.

It is true the audience filled the theater, but most of it was advance-subscribed, as always. It is true there was applause, but most of it was conventional, as always. It is true that conductor and soloist bowed their acknowledgments, but this is according to custom, and when all the members of the orchestra stood during the continued applause after the Debussy piece they looked exceedingly impersonal and decidedly as if they stood just because their leader, Dr. Karl Muck gave them the signal to do so. After all is said and done there was comparatively little in the concert to make a habitual human concert-goer feel especially glad he had heard it all.

Among the entertaining portions of the concert were the second and third movements of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony, Debussy's The Afternoon of a Faun, and the opening section of the first movement of Rachmaninoff's piano concerto number two. These held the attention and furnished the chief musical pleasure of the concert.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, was the special soloist of the concert. He played with much breadth.

The orchestra played with especially fine adjustments the Debussy work.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
s: New York City
JAN 5 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY REVISITS NEW YORK

Render Delightful Concert to Large and Well Pleased Audience at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Society paid New York another visit last night, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, and the usual large audience crowded Carnegie Hall.

Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor and three pieces by Wagner, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser," Paris version, and the overture to "Rienzi" comprised the evening's offerings.

Before returning to Boston, the society will give a second concert at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon. They will play the overture to "Euranthe," Haydn's C minor symphony No. 9, and Tschaikowsky's suite for orchestra.

SUN
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

Dr. Karl Muck's Players Please Audience in Carnegie Hall.

The first of the third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, and by Richard Wagner the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction and "Bacchanale" from the first act of "Thannhæuser," Paris version, and the overture to "Rienzi."

These compositions, while all very familiar, were so placed in the list as to furnish an enjoyment that was highly contrasted, of music in the modern period. The players were in excellent form throughout. In the Franck symphony their delivery was filled with a rare sympathy of spirit with the music and it was executed with great tonal beauty. The Wagner music, which followed the intermission, is of the type allowing the orchestra scope to fully display its brilliant virtuosity, and it is safe to say that in the performance of it last night the men achieved a degree of success quite extraordinary.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Krehbiel on Boston Symphony Program.

Henry E. Krehbiel, music critic, will give a lecture-recital under Institute auspices Wednesday evening, January 3, in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, on the program to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third appearance of the season on Friday evening.

[62]

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN /

KREHBIEL LECTURES HERE.

Explains Boston Symphony Orchestra's Programme.

Henry E. Krehbiel, of the "Tribune," lectured last evening under the Institute auspices on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music to-morrow night. Mr. Krehbiel had with him Miss Clara Rabinowitz, a talented young pianist and former student at the Institute of Musical Art, who played the themes of the compositions which he explained. The first number considered was Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major, opus 93, which was outlined in detail by Mr. Krehbiel, who, as a close student of the life and works of the great German tone-poet, was able to give interesting stories of the origin of some of the themes. He quoted Alexander W. Thayer, the American writer, who was the first to write the truth about Beethoven. Mr. Krehbiel pointed out the use of the kettledrum for the first time in the development of a theme, as shown in one movement, and the tick of the metronome in the second or scherzando movement. In his discussion of the minuet movement the lecturer referred to the arguments that arose when Von Bulow, during a visit to this country, played the tempo slower than Beethoven had marked it, declaring it more dignified that way. In the opinion of the musical critic the composer knew just how he wanted his own things played, and they can hardly be improved upon. Miss Rabinowitz illustrated the different themes on the piano.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress: New York City

ate

Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck at its head, played in Carnegie Hall last night with that superb musicianship which compels rapt attention.

Cesar Franck's noble symphony in D minor comprised the first part of the programme. After the pensive beauty of this work it must be confessed that the three Wagnerian overtures which followed in deadly succession had the crude effects of chromo-lithography.

Dr. Muck's lack of skill as a programme builder has been in evidence before, but never so palpably. The only thing that made endurable the three overtures, "The Flying Dutchman, "Tannhauser" and "Rienzi," is the fact that more of these operas have been heard this season at the Metropolitan, where they belong, and that only one of them is in the present reper-

n SUN
ress: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Plays Three Numbers at the Third Concert.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday. The programme was wholly orchestral. The three numbers were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Haydn's symphony in C minor and the Tschaikowsky suite No. 1 in D minor.

This list of compositions, being largely one of restful content, certainly offered little to disturb or excite a quiet mood of the musical listener. The Weber overture, as played by the Boston men, made a good beginning before two longer works. The symphony is one of those which show Haydn in his clearest light, as a master of symphonic form, and the finished performance given it by the orchestra brought beautifully to the fore all the qualities of the music as centred in loveliness of melodic idea and in lucid development.

The Tschaikowsky suite is seldom heard here. It is in six parts, comprising an introduction and fugue, a divertimento, an intermezzo, a march miniature, a scherzo and a gavotte. The work as a whole gave the separate choirs of the orchestra opportunity for a fine display in tonal finesse, and to the players as a body a good field for the employment of their unfailing qualities in grace of style and nuance.

STANDARD UNION
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

An unusually interesting programme has been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given under Brooklyn Institute auspices in the Academy of Music this evening. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the very distinguished Russian pianist. The scheme of the programme begins with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, "The Little Symphony in F," in the performance of which Dr. Muck has always been peculiarly happy.

m HERALD
iress: New York City
Jan 7, 1917

The gala concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on the night of Tuesday, January 16, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, and Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler, will furnish a notable programme for the benefit of the Vacation Association, will be given to a capacity house. In the advance sale of tickets all but a few of the boxes in the two rows, all the seats in the three balconies, and half the orchestra seats have been sold. At present there is a request for standing room.

The boxholders will include Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mr. Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Henry Payne Whitney, Mrs. Henry C. Frick, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Mr. Charles Smith, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Miss Caroline de Forest, Mrs. Edward N. Breitung, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mr. C. W. Watson, Mr. Arthur Pyle, Mr. Charles Steele, Mrs. D. W. B. Dickerman, Mrs. J. J. Higginson, Mrs. Simon R. Guggenheim, Mrs. W. E. Hooper and Mr. William Salomon.

The annual circus by the members of the Vacation Association will be held this year in March in Madison Square Garden.

n EVENING GLOBE
lress: New York City

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall last evening included César Franck's D minor symphony and three Wagner overtures, those to "Tannhäuser," "Rienzi," and "The "Flying Dutchman." Dr. Muck seems determined that New York shall hear no novelties under his auspices. However, those who attended the concert heard a superbly sonorous performance of the greatest French symphony.

om EVENING POST
dress: New York City

e

Vacation Association Gala Concert.

It has been settled that at the gala concert for the Vacation Association to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Paderewski will play Schumann's Concerto in A-Minor for piano and orchestra and a short group of solo pieces for piano alone. Mr. Kreisler will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra in A-Minor and later two pieces for violin and orchestra —his own "Tambourin Chinois" and Wieniawski's "Air Russe." Dr. Muck has not yet settled definitely on the orchestral numbers.

1 Providence R. I.
ress:

Boton Symphony Orchetra

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes, as usual, in the midst of the Christmas holidays it being Tuesday night, December 26th, and the place, as always, Infantry Hall. For this concert Dr. Muck has arranged another of the series of very brilliant programs which have characterized the concerts this season. For soloist there will be Irma Seydel, that most gifted young violinist who is playing here with the Orchestra for the first time.

Miss Seydel will play Saint-Saens Concerto in B-minor, a work closely connected with the fame of the illustrious Eugene Ysaye. The ochestral part of the program calls for Cesar Frank's Symphony in D-minor, the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber, and the "Espana" Rhapsody of the Frenchman, Emanual Chabrier. It is interesting to note that the composers represented are two of them French, one of them Belgian and one German. Franck, although a Belgian by birth, is the greatest figure in French music since Berlioz and this Symphony in D-minor is undoubtedly the greatest contribution to symphonic literature that has come from France, and must rank among modern symphonies with the greatest by Brahms, the acknowledged successor of Beethoven. In character it is intensely personal and individual and like all truly good music it has had by its own merit to fight its way into the affections of the musical public. Today no modern symphony is held in higher esteem.

The "Euryanthe" Overature of Weber, one of the immortal three that this gifted composer bequeathed to the world, must always be welcome because of its wealth of melody and its brilliancy of construction. As for Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, although built on simple Spanish dance tunes, it is the most bewildering piece of orchestral construction the literature of music holds.

Owing to the Christmast season the sale of single tickets for this concert will be moved forward two days and instead of opening at Seddon's News Stand, Saturday, December 23rd, will open there on Thursday, December 21st.

om TRIBUNE

dress: New York City

JAN 3

Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the concert which will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16 in aid of the Vacation Association. Among those interested in the success of the affair are Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Maude Wetmore, Miss Robinson Smith and Clarence H. Mackay.

EVENING POST

ess: New York City

Third Boston Symphony Concerts.

César Franck and Richard Wagner are the composers represented on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its third evening concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, January 4. The works will be Franck's Symphony in D-Minor, and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhäuser" (Paris version), and the Overture to "Rienzi."

The programme for the third matinée next Saturday afternoon, January 6, will comprise the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber, Haydn's Symphony in C minor, No. 9, and Tchaikovsky's first orchestral suite in D minor, opus 43, which is seldom heard here. The Suite is in six parts, comprising an Introduction and Fugue, a Divertimento, an Intermezzo, a Marche Miniature, a Scherzo, and a Gavotte. Of these, the Gavotte is the most familiar to the general public.

ENQUIRER

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Third Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third visit for the present season to this city last evening, and was heard at the Academy of Music by one of those large audiences which its appearance never fails to attract in a programme of singular interest and beauty which had the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck for its salient feature. This is one of the most poetic and beautiful among compositions of its class. Thanks to the cyclical form of its construction it is exceptionally homogenous and symmetrical, and as it passes through the several stages of its evolution to the splendid climax of its conclusion it communicates the exalted sentiments by which it is inspired with a fervid eloquence to which none can be insensible. It was admirably played under Dr. Muck's sympathetic direction, with the utmost beauty of tone and finish of execution and with a most illuminative appreciation of its contents. Other numbers on the list were Debussy's charming "Apres midi d'un faun" and Chabrier's "Espana" fantacy, with whose brilliant performance the proceedings were brought to resounding close.

The assisting artist was Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitch, one of the best in the younger generation of pianits, whose masterly interpretation of Rachmaninoff's very impressive and appealing second concerto in C minor was worthy of the high reputation which he deservedly enjoys. It was a thoroughly enjoyable and excellent achievement, and the audience made it clear that it was greatly pleased. The next of these concerts will not occur until Monday evening, February 12.

SUN

ess: New York City

Jan 7, 1917

Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Vincent Astor, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. August Belmont, Clarence H. Mackay, Miss Anne Morgan, Watson B. Dickerman, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim and Mrs. Simon Guggenheim are among those interested in the concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 16 in behalf of the Vacation Association. Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck are to be the chief features.

The concert has an unusual interest for the reason that the Vacation Association has always been very near to the heart of New York society. Hitherto there has never been any difficulty in getting all the money required, but the many demands for contributions for relief abroad have had their effect, and meritorious work at home has been less noticed.

Miss Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker and Miss Maude Wetmore are among the directors of the association, which has expanded very much beyond its original idea of merely assisting young women to save money for healthful vacation outings, and now has many other interesting activities.

n SUN

ress: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 31

PADEREWSKI COMING.

The announcement made last week that Mr. Paderewski is to give a recital in the Lyric Theatre Thursday evening, January 18, arouses most grateful anticipations of pleasure among all those who care for the piano and its literature. It is said that this very wonderful artist has never played so well as he has been playing this year. A week ago he played the Schumann Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Christmas concerts in Boston and, although he followed a most remarkable performance of Liszt's really stupendous "Faust" Symphony, the ovation given to him has never been equaled in Boston. His program for Baltimore will be announced later on.

om

dress:

Boston Symphony-Orchestra.

Am Freitag, 5. Januar, wird das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter der Leitung seines genialen Dirigenten Dr. Carl Muck unter den Auspizien des Brooklyn Instituts für Kunst und Wissenschaft in der Academy of Music ein Konzert geben, in dem Herr Ossip Gabrilowitsch, der russische Pianist, der Solist sein wird. Es werden vom Orchester Beethoven's achte Symphonie und Borodinski-Gemälde „Die Steppen Central-Asiens" und Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouverture gespielt werden. Herr Gabrilowitsch wird ein Konzert von Rachmaninoff vortragen.

om HERALD

ldress: New York City

ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their third concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme contained only numbers long in the repertoire of the orchestra, but memory of previous performances of the old favorites brought out a notable audience. Dr. Muck gave a remarkable reading of César Franck's beautiful symphony in D-minor.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, looking more beautiful than ever in dark green velvet and long Oriental earrings expressed her approval. Ernest Schelling and Frank Damrosch also enjoyed the glowing performance.

The second half of the programme was devoted to Wagner. The overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and Rienzi and the Introduction, and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" were played impressively.

n SUN

ress: New York City

At the gala concert which will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, January 16, in aid of the Vacation Association by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, with Messrs. Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, Mr. Paderewski will play the Schumann concerto and Mr. Kreisler the Mendelssohn concerto. The violinist will also give with orchestra his own "Tambourin Chinois" and Wieniawski's "Airs Russes." Mr. Paderewski will play a group of solo pieces for piano alone. The orchestral numbers will be Smetana's Overture to "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice Espagnol." Mr. Kreisler in his two pieces with orchestra, and Mr. Paderewski in his solos close the programme.

om ENQUIRER

ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.

te

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music New Year's night, Monday, January 1. He will play Rachmaninoff's Concerto in C Minor No. 2, a work which has been played here a half a dozen year ago at a Boston Symphony concert by the composer himself.

The symphony will be that superb work by the Belgian, Cesar Franck. This has not been played at a Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia since 1912, it is a work of which Dr. Muck is very fond and he conducts it con amore.

The symphony comes first on the programme. In the second part in addition to the Rachmannoff Concerto will be Debussy's exquisite setting of Mallarme's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" and the programme will end with the brilliant "Espana" Rhapsody of Chabrier.

[63]

m WORLD

ress: New York City

JAN 5 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Caesar Franck's D Minor Symphony Is Finely Interpreted.

Caesar Franck's D minor symphony had an eloquent interpretation in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. A work of constantly shifting orchestral colors—now brilliant, now suave, again rich with genuine poetic depth—this composition has substance.

There was no mood which the visiting organization from Boston did not denote with instrumental fidelity, even though in the closing movement there was occasionally a noticeable lack of unanimity between the brasses and strings and some tonal roughnesses that are not common to this fine body of men.

Three Wagner operatic excerpts—the "Flying Dutchman" overture, the overture to "Rienzi" and the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" introduction and bacchanale—completed the programme, which was heard by the customary large audience.

AMERICAN

s: New York City

Boston Symphony Concert a Treat

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra observed its third visit to this city with an interesting concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was devoted to modern French and German music.

The symphony was César Franck's D minor, which has not been played in New York very recently and which was received with evident enjoyment and appreciation.

The work makes considerable demands on the interpreters, especially on the technical side. But problems in composition only insure the Bostonians to their best efforts, and last night's audience was privileged to a clear, dignified and energetic performance, beautifully shaded in dynamics, warm and rich in tone and carefully restrained in its emotional qualities.

The second half of the programme was entirely Wagnerian and was composed of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and overture to "Rienzi." The orchestra played these selections under Dr. Muck's direction with qualities that mark the highest attainments in orchestral interpretation.

Not only were the varying moods and meanings of each leading theme exposed with lucidity and significance, but profound beauty of the enveloping harmonies was revealed in a brilliant and musicianly manner.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

KREHBIEL DESCRIBES CONCERT PROGRAMME

Henry E. Krehbiel, of the "Tribune," lectured last evening under Institute auspices on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music to-morrow night. Miss Clara Rabinowitz, a talented young pianist, and former student at the Institute of Musical Art, played the themes of the compositions which he explained.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was outlined in detail by Mr. Krehbiel, who pointed out the use of the kettledrum for the first time in the development of a theme, as shown in one movement, and the tick of the metronome in the second or scherzando movement.

"On the Steppes of Central Asia," an orchestral sketch, by Alexander Borodin, was described as programme music which is a bit of conventionalization. The themes, which Miss Rabinowitz played, illustrate the refrains of the natives and the caravan escorted by Fussian soldiers. The overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" was presented a conventional overture, taking the melodies of the opera for its themes.

n STAATS-ZEITUNG

ress: New York City

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Die Bostoner unter Dr. Mucks Meisterstab brachten in ihrem gestrigen Abendkonzert in Carnegie Hall namentlich die emotionelle César Francksche „D-Moll-Symphonie" zu wundervollster Geltung. Auch die andere, Wagnerschen Exzerpten gewidmete Abteilung führte uns das Orchester in seinem wundervollsten Klangreiz vor. Wir bringen morgen eine ausführliche Besprechung dieser vom Publikum begeistert aufgenommenen Darbietungen.

ENQUIRER

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 31

chord.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Academy of Music, Monday evening, January 1, 1917, at 8.15. The first concert of the New Year comes tomorrow night, New Year's evening, the third appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme which Dr. Muck has made for this concert consists entirely of French and Russian music, three undoubted masterpieces of the French school and one of Russia's greatest contributions to the literature of the piano and orchestra. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor, a notable work which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in Philadelphia in over four years. This makes the first part of the programme.

After the intermission will come Debussy's exquisite "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor and Chabrier's bewilderingly glittering "Espana" rhapsody.

The soloist will be Ossin Gabrilowitsch, one of the most admirable pianists of the present generation. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has already played the Rachmaninoff concerto with great success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its Boston concerts.

rom RECORD

ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.

109

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW YEAR'S CONCERT

Gabrilowitsch as Soloist—Mischa Elman to Be Heard With Philadelphia Orchestra.

GIDEON AND HIS QUARTET

Visits of Damrosch, McCormack and Kreisler—Matinee Musical Club.

—Tomorrow the third appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Academy of Music. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor, a notable work which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in Philadelphia in over four years. After the intermission will come Debussy's exquisite "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," Rachmaninoff's second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor and Chabrier's "Espana," Rhapsody. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

rom TIMES

ddress: Washington, D. C.

ate

CONCERTS FOR CAPITAL

Musical Treats Provided for Residents and Visitors.

The orchestral feature of the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, January 2, at 4:30 o'clock, will be the first suite for orchestra by Tschaikowsky, that in D minor, opus 43. Tschaikowsky wrote three suites, and they show the composer in a lighter mood than that which is found in his symphonies. True Slav that he was, Tschaikowsky was either up in the clouds or down in the depths.

This particular suite which Dr. Muck has chosen for the third concert here is in six parts, and is characterized throughout by charming melodic ideas, quaint fancy and grace of writing.

The soloist will be Carl Friedberg, one of the younger pianists, who ranks among the foremost artists of the present generation. Mr Friedberg has recently co-operated with Mr. Kreisler in several of the latter's recitals in sonatas, and Mr Kreisler has a profound admiration for his artistry. He will play the intensely romantic and lovely concerto of Robert Schumann in A minor.

The program in its proper form is as follows: Tschaikowsky, suite in D minor, No. 1, opus 43; Schumann, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor; Weber, overture to the opera "Euryanthe."

n HERALD

ess: New York City

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be played under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The evening programme will consist of Franck's symphony in D minor, the "Flying Dutchman" overture, the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" and the "Rienzi" overture. The matinee programme will contain Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Haydn's symphony No. 9 and Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite, opus 43.

n HERALD

ress: Washington, D. C.

e

The orchestral feature of the third Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, will be the first suite for orchestra by Tschaikowsky, that in D minor, Opus 43. Tschaikowsky wrote three suites, and they show the composer in a lighter mood than that which is found in his symphonies.

The soloist will be Carl Friedberg, one of the younger pianists, who ranks among the formost artists of the present generation. He will play the intensely romantic and lovely concerto of Robert Schumann in A minor.

The program in its proper form follows: Tschaikowsky, suite in D minor, No. 1, Opus 43; Schumann, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor; Weber, overture to the opera, "Euryanthe."

n HERALD

ress: New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall gave its third matinee concert of the season. Dr. Karl Muck conducted, and the brilliant playing of the orchestra was much more interesting than the music it played. Not that the music was of an inferior order, but Weber's often heard "Euryanthe" overture, Haydn's symphony in C minor, and Tschaikowsky's little known Suite No. 1 in D minor hardly have the interest of the average Symphony or Philharmonic Society programme.

But it is always a delight to hear such fine orchestral balance and tone, and such scholarly readings of symphonic works as come from Dr. Muck, and the audience showed its appreciation with prolonged applause.

om WORLD

ldress: New York City

1916

Boston Symphony.

Cesar Franck and Richard Wagner are the composers represented on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its third evening concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. The works will be Franck's Symphony in D minor and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version) and the overture to "Rienzi."

The programme for the third matinee next Saturday afternoon, Jan. 8, will comprise the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 9, and Tschaikowsky's first Orchestral Suite in D minor, opus 43, which is seldom heard here. The suite is in six parts, comprising an introduction and fugue, a divertimento, an intermezzo, a marche miniature, a scherzo and a gavotte. Of these the gavotte is the most familiar to the general public.

n HERALD

ress: New York City

Concert for Vacation Fund—"Around the Clock" by the Junior League.

ONE of the important events in music and society this month is to be a gala concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on the night of Tuesday, January 16, at which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will play, while Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloists.

In an invitation advance sale of four days, followed by a public sale of three days, all the seats in the three balconies and twenty boxes in the parterre row were sold. A few of the parterre boxes as well as boxes in the grand tier row and seats in the orchestra remain unsold.

The concert is under the direction of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker and Miss Anne Morgan, chief officers of the Vacation Association. The directing committee also includes Mmes. Rogers H. Bacon, August Belmont, Daniel Guggenheim, Montgomery Hare, Alexander Kohut and Ponsonby Ogle, Misses Mabel Beardsley, Theresa D. O'Donohue and Maude K. Wetmore.

EVENING STAR

ess: Washington, D. C.

DEC 2

Boston Symphony January 2.

Carl Friedberg, a pianist of high quality, is announced as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 2. The program which has been arranged will be light and pleasing. Mr. Friedberg will play the Schumann "Concerto" and there will be two orchestral numbers, Tschaikowsky's orchestral "Suite in D Minor No. 1," which is in six movements, and Weber's overture to

om STAATS-ZEITUNG
dress: New York City

Dr. Muck hat für das am kommenden Donnerstag abend in Carnegie Hall stattfindende Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert das folgende Programm gewählt: Franck's D-Moll-Symphonie, Wagner's Ouvertüren zum „Fliegenden Holländer" und zu „Rienzi", schließlich „Introduktion und Bacchanale" aus dem ersten Akt des „Tannhäuser" (Pariser Version).

Das Programm für die dritte Matinee der Bostoner am kommenden Samstag nachmittag umfaßt Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouvertüre, Haydn's C-Moll-Symphonie und Tschaikowsky's Erste Orchestersuite in D-Moll, op. 43.

om SUN
dress: Baltimore, Md.

monumental works.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, January 3. The soloist on this occasion will be the very gifted and brilliant Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has chosen for his work a concerto by the most distinguished of the "younger" Russian composers, the Second Concerto in C minor by Sergei Rachmaninoff. Patrons of the Boston Symphony will remember that a half a dozen years ago Rachmaninoff himself played this concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here in Baltimore.

The symphony will be the ever-lovely "Rhenish" of Schumann, that in E flat major, No. 3. This is the first time in many years that a Schumann symphony has been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony comes first. The second part comprises Debussy's exquisite setting of Mallarmé's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," the Rachmaninoff concerto, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From the Journal
Jan. 13, 1917.

SPALDING WINS NEW HONORS AS SYMPHONY STAR

American Violinist Plays Beethoven Concerto Artistically.

Tribute is paid at the Symphony concerts this week to the virtuosity of Albert Spalding, the young American violinist. For eight years, or since just after he turned his 20th year, Mr. Spalding has been giving recitals in Boston, showing every season steady progress in his art and in this way strengthening his appeal to critical appreciation. He has fairly won this invitation to appear as Symphony soloist, and yesterday his performance of the Beethoven concerto was rewarded with enthusiastic applause. He was recalled several times, in fact.

His tone is warm and bright; his interpretative power betrays the sensitive feeling and intellectual keenness of the true artist; his technique especially as it proved itself in the bristling cadenzas, is brilliant in the highest degree. He has the poise as well as the ability of an exquisitely cultured artist. It was with the profoundest pleasure that the audience witnessed the genuine triumph achieved yesterday by this gifted native musician.

Next in order came Dr. Muck's splendid reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, a beautiful and dramatic composition, and the only number of this week's program that shows the great orchestra at its best.

The concert opened with the performance of three pieces by Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, these being "Pohjola's Daughter," a symphonic fantasia; "The Oceanides," a tone poem, and "Night Ride and Sunrise," a symphonic poem. These were performed for the first time here. The "Sunrise" music provided a rather stimulating finale, but what preceded it would excite much more admiration in Helsingfors than in Boston. The heroic efforts of Dr. Muck and the orchestra to interest the audience were of little avail.

The program next week will include Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; a new tone poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," by Mr. Ballantine of the Harvard music department; the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version), and vocal numbers by J. S. Bach and Sidney Homer, with Mme. Louise Homer as soloist.

From the
Transcript
January 13, 1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THREE REMARKABLE TONE-POEMS BY SIBELIUS

A Land-Piece of Night and Dawn, a Sea-Piece of Many-Colored and Many-Motioned Ocean, and a Wintry Tale Out of Finnish Legend—Music of Invention, Individuality and Illusion—Mr. Spalding and Beethoven's Concerto for Violin —Also an Over-Played Overture

AMONG the present conductors of symphony concerts in the United States, Dr. Muck passes for the scorner of novel pieces. This season they are admittedly hard to discover. The presses of Europe have let fall few new folios since the war began; for two years already the conductors have been burrowing among their stores. Yet from October into January Dr. Muck has outdone all his fellows. Mr. Damrosch's "novelties" have been for the most part overlooked trifles; Mr. Stock's and Mr. Stransky's have been too sparse, almost for counting; Mr. Stokowski has declined from the Mahler of songs with orchestra into Bruch for two pianos. Yet here in Boston Dr. Muck's programmes have abounded in novel music, produced or revived, in every instance deserving a hearing, in most plainly interesting the audience; while much more of equal promise is in prospect. Yesterday afternoon, indeed, in part doubtless as a pleasurable change from routine, he put by a symphony with which the concerts usually begin and substituted three tone-poems by Sibelius, each new to his hearers. The most imaginatively conceived and graphically fashioned of them, "Pohjola's Daughter," is of the Finn's less-known pieces in a series that now in his fifty-second year is rising to the seventies in opus-numbers. The second, "The Daughters of Ocean," which is really free sea-picturing, was first played at Norfolk in the spring of 1915 and in the following autumn and winter received into many symphony concerts; while the third, "Night Ride and Sunrise," has been "intended for performance" these six years at Symphony Hall. Possibly, if Sibelius's new symphony were not locked in a manuscript score until the end of the war sets free the presses, it along with the daughters, alike of Pohjola and Oceanus, might still await a hearing.

Tonal narrative, tonal impression, tonal picture—which one will in the delineative designation of music, no one of the three lacked the Sibelian individuality of design, imagination, procedure. "Night-Ride and Sunrise" might label eminently conventional exercises in tone-picturing. The scaffolding for such pieces is kept standing in most yards for music-making and serviceable plaster is always at hand to cover it. But Sibelius sets up his own framework, chooses his own building material, follows his own methods, and makes his music, as it seems, out of keen personal impression and imagination. Recall the reiterated figure of the beating hoofs of the horse repeated until the ear, the nerves and every other source of sensation tingle with it. The convention of such pieces certainly—if only Sibelius's figure were conventional. But it is not. It is a figure of the sound of those hoof-beats through darkness and stillness, when as any one may testify who with a grain of imagination has ridden fast, far and smoothly by windless night, they begin curiously to haunt the ear, to fall with an uncanny evenness and isolation. In mingled fact and fancy, Sibelius knows whereof he tonally affirms. In like fashion, he experiences and suggests in his music, the tremulous, expectant stir that seems to haunt the dark in waste, silent, solitary places before it turns into dawn. That strange tremor is in his harmonies. The Sibelian sun rises simply and calmly without a Mascagnian gesture or a Straussian surge—the very note of high imagination with a daily spectacle that yet yields the impression of a daily miracle. Then of a sudden in the music comes a jagged, piercing dissonance rending the ear; but so a shaft of light in a northern dawn will thrust and tear at the green-gray sky. Again the actual impression and the tonal imagery are in exact accord. Sibelius sees and paints for himself in the realities of nature, in the illusion of tones. Scarcely another composer of our day so strips to the quick his sensations and his music.

Yet somehow the land by night and in the dawning seemed to yield Sibelius keener sensations, and so to prompt him to a more intensely pictorial music, than did the sea, sunlit and twinkling, restless and ominous, or heaved in tempest against the angry heavens. Nonetheless, the naked directness, the naked sensibility of the delineative suggestion in the ocean-music was marvellous to hear. Nowhere in the familiar sea-pieces of the concert-room — Rimsky-Korsakov's, Debussy's Wagner's, Gilson's — is there such suggestion of the flutter to the eye of sunlit ripples when light breezes fleck them as Sibelius's rhythmic movement and harmonic color bear. Little less graphically, as his waters darken and roughen, do the strands of the music take on the ropiness of such a forbidding sea. Then the music proceeds, yet with unfolding unity and unhesitating cumulation, from impression to impression. The troubled ropy waters coalesce into a single black surge, swaying upward, swaying downward, in insistent, rhythmic suspense, shattered at last into what before long will be fluttering ripples again. And the impressionistic Sibelius's storm-wave is not the storm-wave again of the impressionistic Debussy. The foam at the top of it catches the Parisian's eye and curls into the music. the Finn's imagination and dark... his measures. The sweep of the wave intrigues them both; but the mass and the weight of it sink deeper into the Northern composer. Each gives his music a curious rhythmic cohesion; each in his own way makes acrid chord, harmony or timbre do its delineative office. Often this sea-music is akin in bitterness, brevity, broken suggestion to that much questioned fourth symphony of Sibelius.

In turn "Pohjola's Daughter" was a yet more graphic music but now of inner and haunting mood as well as of external sensation. Once more there is tonal journeying over northern plain, through northern forest, but this time no horse, but a sledge, bears the wayfarer—the old hero of Finnish legend, Väinämöinen, monotonously speeding home, dull of heart. Suddenly the reiterated minor music brightens, blazes, dazzles with the blue sky, the white snow and the high sharp lights of winter. In this white fire of tones, crystal and crackling, on the top of the rainbow sits the wilful and wanton daughter of Pohjola. The old hero burns for her; she will descend to him if only he will make a boat for her out of her spindle and so fulfill her heart's desire. But Väinämöinen knows no such magic and wofully rides away. The icy brilliance fades out of the softening music; less the vision of the mocking girl than the vision of his longing remains in the old man's heart. It haunts, maybe it comforts, him. Again, as in the sea-piece and for that matter in the earlier tone-picture of the ride and the dawn, short rhythmic figures, time and again repeated, varied as imaginative composer—and imaginative conductor no less—may vary them, summon the Sibelian illusion, work the Sibelian spell. The motives expand into no large-spun melody until the music begins to sing the longing that, instead of Pohjola's daughter, sits besides Väinämöinen in the sledge. Upon the dark harmonies of the music the melody rides the darkness of the forest, the darkness of his heart. Between melody and background the inner emotional and the outer pictorial illusion are wholly fused. Out of subtlety of means flows exceeding directness of affect. The hearer's sensations answer to the music as they might answer to an old fantastic ballad sung in as rich voice as is Sibelius's with the orchestra. And never did music of ice and crystal air burn sharper, brighter, whiter than Sibelius's of the girl on her rainbow. His imagination and his idiom are hardly to be matched in potent individuality in the music of this day. And three such tone-poems in one afternoon!

The rest was the Beethoven of the overture to "Egmont" and the Beethoven of the concerto for violin at the hands of Mr. Spalding. In recent years, perhaps for many years, both have been played quite as often as need be at the Symphony Concerts, however eloquent the performance. No doubt the overture to Goethe's play well survives the years alongside the overture to "Coriolan." Agreed, that both are classic masterpieces, if they do miss the everlasting power of the third "Leonore" overture. But they are also hackneyed masterpieces. For the time, an overture of Beethoven that was not a masterpiece at all, that was even a job in the musical fashion of Vienna a century ago might sound fresher in ears staled beyond any new sensation from those repertory classics. Why not try one for once in a way—if Dr. Muck were so minded—try one even for sport's sake. If we were all disillusioned, to be so would at least be a new sensation from Beethoven.

Mr. Spalding's choice of the concerto was another matter and it is not in reason to expect an "assisting artist"—and at his first invitation to the Symphony Concerts—to consider how many times his practiced audience has heard the piece in which he would prove his prowess. Nay, familiarity with it may enable his hearers the better to appreciate his excellent parts with the music. So Mr. Hofman likes to reason, but Mr. Spalding is a modester spirit and may have chosen the concerto for no other reason than that it perennially charms by plastic and songful beauty and invites the finer distinctions of his tone and the more graceful qualities of his style. As it was, he played with keen perception of the quality of the concerto as a lyric and elegant music. His technical means, even in an exacting cadenza that may have been his own, were apt and supple to the instant in the music or the violin, suave always and unobtrusively artful. His tone was fine, clear, soft, bright, sensitive, undulating to the music, in edgeless euphony with the other instrumental voices—the shining thread in the web that Dr. Muck and the orchestra wove in tones as exquisitely as he. Mr. Spalding set the passage work of the first movement in lace-like pattern, as fine of texture as it was delicate of line and coloring. He drew out the slow song in musing but not sentimentalizing sweetness; he was light elegance itself in the finale. From the first measure to the last the sensibility of the violinist was as unerring as the fingers and wrists that gave it voice. The charm never dimmed, the elegance never faded. It was easy to imagine that the Vienna of Beethoven's time, which loved all these qualities in its virtuoso music, might so have heard the concerto. There are other Spaldings—larger of voice and style, mood and impression—than that which he disclosed yesterday, but it is his characteristic virtue to unify himself with his music.

H. T. P.

From the Transcript
Jan. 13, 1917.

Thursday evening, Feb. 1, in Sand... Theatre at Cambridge, the fifth of ... series of concerts by the Symphony ...chestra under Dr. Muck.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 2, in Symph... Hall, the thirteenth of the afternoon ...certs of the Symphony Orchestra under ... Muck, with Mr. McCormack for the as...ing singer.

From the
Globe
Jan. 13, 1917.

IMPRESSIVE NEW MUSIC BY SIBELIUS

Three Compositions Read by Dr Muck

Albert Spalding, as Soloist, Plays Beethoven Concerto Beautifully

At the Symphony concert yesterday Dr Muck produced for the first time in Boston three compositions by Sibelius. Albert Spalding, the violinist, was soloist for the first time at these concerts.

The pieces by Sibelius, the first to a published program, are these: "Pohjola's Daughter," symphonic fantasia, op. 49; "The Oceanides" ("Sallottaret") tone poem, op. 73; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, op. 55. The first was published in 1906, the third in 1909. The second was written for performance at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Conn, at the invitation of Mr and Mrs Carl Stoeckel, and was so performed for the first time, June 4, 1914. It does not bear the usual signs of music written by invitation or for an occasion.

The program book tells us that Sallottaret are the Oceanides of Finnish mythology, the daughters of the Titians, Oceanus and his sister Tethys, or according to Apollodorus of Uranus and Gaea, and that their names were Asia, Styr, Elektra, and "many others." The latest work from the great Finn shows his broad vision, his epic imagination, his majestic, rugged individuality in expression to be still a luminous, dynamic force in music. His thought obviously was of the sea. His score is saturated with the mystery, the terror, the lure of the myriad colored voice and bosom of the deep. His musical symbols suggest the infinite individuality of nature. One may say there is in the thematic outline an organic vagueness. There is identity, but it ebbs and flows through many phases.

Voices of the Sea

Compositions leaning heavily upon tonal color often reveal a paucity of ideas. The indeterminate character of this music has no association with the commonplace or vacuity. There is dominance of mood. There is incessant appeal to the imagination. Should one never having seen the sea, hear this music, he must feel ushered before a presence of awe and majesty, a cosmic force, not of yesterday or today, but of all time, the silent keeper of many tragedies, the treacherous mistress who makes no promise to deliver that intrusted unto her, yet invites with sunny skies and smiling waters other adventures. A score which at first hearing discourages a usual following of a theme or of its development, but seizes and controls with a narrative of primitive, elemental simplicity, with the conviction of poetic truth.

The Symphonic fantasia has a more definite program. From the verses printed in the score, the scholarly author of the program book would call it the homeward ride of Vainamoinen, he who was "one of the four principal heroes of the epic, the son of the Wind and of the virgin of the Air, represented as a vigorous old man, a patriarch, a minstrel."

Carried by an eagle to a spot near the castle of Pohjola, personifying the North Country, he is promised by Louhi, mistress of Pohjola, her beautiful daughter, if he will forge her a talisman. Replying that he cannot and will send his brother, a cunning smith, he is given a horse and sledge by the old women and sent homeward, with the warning to look only straight before him if he would avoid harm.

On the rainbow he sees Pohjola's daughter spinning. Her beauty entices him. She promises at length to come down and follow him if he will make a boat out of her spindle and to gratify a long desire—reveal the secret of his magic. He labors only to find the spell has gone from him. Rudely disappointed and disgruntled, he journeys on, but courage returns to him.

Fascinating Folk Lore

The myth reminds of analagous Biblical stories. The folk lore is fascinating in its wild ardor, its haunting melancholy. The metamorphosis of the beautiful daughter finally into a fearful and cruel woman is dramatic and picturesque. Sibelius spans the enchanting and the hideous with bold and commanding strokes. There is sharp contrast and sweeping characterization. The third piece less varied, maintained a remarkable development of the galloping rhythmic figure and followed with a resplendent picture in perspective and color which might have denoted the peace and grandeur of sunrise after the long feverish flight. All three pieces were read with the utmost sympathy by Dr Muck and played with virtuosity.

Mr Spalding, a welcome addition to the ranks of established soloists at these concerts, played the Beethoven concerto with fine conception of its nobility, its tenderness, its closing optimism, played with a ravishing beauty of tone, with a polished style which was of far more than mere surface, and with mastery in the beavura of the cadenzas that clearly established his title in this last new honor. Dr Muck and the orchestra assisted as only they can. The Egmont overture closed the program.

From the Transcript
Jan. 10, 1917.

Here in Boston

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler in the Metropolitan Opera House at New York next Tuesday evening for the profit of a charity for working girls, the pianist will play Schumann's concerto and sundry solo pieces; the violinist Mendelssohn's concerto and solo numbers, and the band under Dr. Muck, the overture to Smetano's opera, "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"—all three displayful music

From the
POST
Jan. 13, 1917.

SIBELIUS' PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Three Sketches Played for First Time in Boston

BY OLIN DOWNES

Three compositions by Jean Sibelius were played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall: "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceanides," "Night-Ride and Sunrise." Albert Spalding played the Beethoven violin concerto. The overture to Egmont brought the concert to an end.

NATURE SKETCHES

All of these pieces of Sibelius are nature sketches. "Pohjola's Daughter" is inspired by the charming episode of the Kalevala, the Finnish epic, in which the aged hero, Vainomoinen, encounters the daughter of Pohjola sitting on a rainbow. She weaves and laughs at his suit. She coquettishly suggests several tests of the hero's wisdom and valor. But his achievements are of no avail, and the sledge-ride is resumed.

The music starts in the manner of a legend, with a sort of recitative for the celli, which later becomes a persistent accompanying figure that suggests the ride. The vigorous rythm is developed with constantly more force and momentum. The brass choir throws out a wild call. This call is in the major key, and thus contrasts effectively and joyously with the minor tonality that has preceded and the intentionally monotonous rythm of the ride. Then comes the meeting with the daughter of Pohjola. There is laughter in the wood-wind, and dialogue which becomes more and more strenuous. There is a humorous suggestion of the anger of the enraged minstrel, and again the music of the ride returns.

New, Sensuous Theme

Again are heard the defiant fanfares of the brass, and a new theme, sensuous and full of melancholy—the longing, one would say, of him whose years and wisdom are increasing, for young arms and laughter. This melody, flung across the darkly colored pulsating orchestra, is not quickly forgotten. It is in its color, its suggestion and exceedingly ingenious manipulation of short figures that this piece makes its effect. And the effect is superbly imaginative and suggestive of the ruggedness and sadness of northern nature. There are colors not found in the orchestra of other composers than Sibelius. There is the emotion of one inspired by the nature about him and the legends of his own land.

In the "Oceanides" Sibelius is still more of an impressionist. This piece, too, has true imagination, but not such distinctive material, throughout, as the piece that preceded. Yet there are prodigious pages. There is the feeling of the vasty deep, of the thresh of waters and the sough of winds, of the song and the crash of great waves. Few composers could be so simple and elemental in feeling.

In "Night-ride and Sunrise" there are fantastical measures in the transition from the wood of suspense and darkness and agitation to the calmness and majesty of the rising sun, and at the last there are superbly simple and imaginative effects of color in the orchestra. But again, in the latter section, there is a tendency to harmonic commonplaceness. The earlier pages—those of the "nightride" have the suggestion of that which is mysterious, even sinister, and of grotesque shadows.

Mr. Spaulding in his performance of the Beethoven concerto showed his sincerity, his musical understanding, and a fine, clean-cut technic. It was a sane and satisfactory performance, and a performance by a young man too reverent toward his art to do other than place himself wholly at the service of the composer. Mr. Spaulding was heartily applauded and recalled.

From the Herald
Jan. 7, 1917.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

After an intermission of a week the ...mphony concerts resume next Friday ...fternoon and Saturday evening, Jan... and 13. The first part of the concert ...ll be devoted to three works by Si...lius, no one of which has been heard ...re. These are "Pohjola's Daughter," ...he Oceanides" and "Night-Ride and ...unrise." "The Oceanides" was writ...n by Sibelius for the Norfolk, Ct., ...estival two years ago. The second ...art of the program will comprise Beet...oven's Violin Concerto and the over...re to "Egmont." The soloist will be ...lbert Spalding, who will make his first ...ppearance with the Symphony Orches...

[64]

From the Monitor
Dec. 23, 1916.

"FAUST" SYMPHONY IN BOSTON; SOLOIST MR. PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, in ninth program of thirty-sixth season, afternoon of Dec. 22, Ignace J. Paderewski, soloist, male chorus from the Choral Music Society, and Arthur Hackett, tenor, assisting. The program: Liszt, "Faust" symphony in three character pieces (after Goethe); Schumann, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor.

In many respects the Boston Symphony concerts of this week will stand out as among the most noteworthy of the year. In the first place Dr. Muck reached a high point in conductorship and the orchestra in accomplishment in the "Faust" symphony; second, they are the occasion of Mr. Paderewski's regular appearance with the orchestra, and third, they witness the triumph of a new tenor singer who takes rank among the best of the younger singers of the country.

It would be difficult to point to an occasion on which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have surpassed or even equaled the performance of the symphony. Long and arduous rehearsal is implied in the delicacy of shading the obedience to the conductor's instinct for atmosphere or climax, the unusual excellence of attack, the unison bowing to the violins, the control and power of the woodwinds and the smooth sonority of the brasses. Likewise diligent study is indicated by the strong, clear characterization achieved by the conductor, the marvelous color and the intensity of dramatic feeling.

Hampered little by scholastic restrictions of development, because in the quasi-symphonic form he employed he was at liberty to treat his material in free fashion, Liszt used his themes not to tell a story, but to describe and characterize, and a genius for orchestration led him instinctively to give the statement of them to the proper instrument. Where Strauss is more concerned with cataloguing the affairs of his Don Juan, and creating a certain sympathy for his roguishness, Liszt in grander fashion sets forth his Faust clearly, for all to loathe, or to pity, quite unconcerned as to which emotion is stirred, and totally indifferent to a recital of the story of Faust's adventure.

So, too, with grave and delicate pathos he delineates Marguerite, describing not the object of Faust's affection, but the tremulous, maidenly joy and the womanly sorrow that culminate in the love before which Mephistopheles is powerless and through which Faust is finally transformed. And in the mocking Mephistopheles, no creature with cloven hoofs, tail and horns is manifest, but rather the diabolic perversity that would turn hope into despair, love into bestiality and nobleness into meanness. When finally the pure love of Marguerite redeems Faust from his baseness and leads him on it is no picture of celestial glories that appears, but aspiration, strong faith and glorious peace. Literalism has no place in Liszt's music; he deals with ideas.

Thus did Dr. Muck interpret the work, characterizing Faust and Mephistopheles clearly and eloquently, but not so definitely showing Marguerite, missing somewhat the tender dignity portrayed. Of the three movements the last was read with most power and the breathless climax achieved will linger long in the memory of those who heard it.

The singing of the men's chorus from the Choral Music Society showed proficiency of tone, and under Dr. Muck great flexibility and precision, but was somewhat lacking as to volume. Arthur Hackett in the tenor solo disclosed a wonderfully agreeable lyric quality of voice, admirably controlled. The young man received an ovation from the men of the orchestra when he appeared on the stage again after the intermission, and the audience was not slow to join in the approbation. The applause for conductor and men after the symphony was unusual in its heartiness and duration.

Mr. Paderewski chose what is perhaps the pleasantest to hear of all the popular concertos, and his understanding vested the music in new beauties. As showing the nature of his performance was his repetition of a theme stated by the orchestra early in the second movement; under his hands it took on a romantic delicacy noticeably at variance with its somewhat playful statement. As is his custom, Mr. Paderewski remained long at the piano in an attempt to satisfy the clamorous seekers of encores.

[65]

From the American
Dec. 23, 1916.

PADEREWSKI AND SYMPHONY PLEASE

It was ovation afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday—ovation for the orchestra after the playing of Liszt's Faust Symphony, and for Paderewski, after his part in the Schumann Concerto in A minor.

Musically, the performance of the Liszt work proved a surpassing feature.

The Faust effort, although variously criticized, is pleasing and its end marks a grand climax. Liszt's work presents a masterful series of character pictures, entitled Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

Of the purity and beauty of Gretchen, there can be no doubt. From the orchestra is demanded all that it can give, and Dr. Muck conducted the great work grandly.

The final chorus is particularly moving and imposing. The male chorus from the Choral Music Society assisted. Arthur Hackett, a young singer, sang the tenor part.

Paderewski enchanted his admirers with the Schumann Concerto. He was forced to lengthen his program by added pieces. Of all the Symphony soloists he is the only one to enjoy that privilege of responding to encores.

From the Monitor
Dec. 16, 1916.

MISS GERHARDT SINGS AS SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Miss Elena Gerhardt, Soloist—Eighth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Dec. 15: Mozart, symphony in D major (K. 385); Wagner, songs with orchestra, "Stehe still," "Träume" and "Schmerzen"; Wolf, songs with orchestra, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's"; Tschaikowsky, suite I in D minor, op. 43.

There is a kind of soloist that fits poorly into the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Gerhardt is a striking example. No fault can be found with her, however, for being that kind. The difficulty arises from a rule which the artistic administrator of the concerts seems to have laid down inflexibly, that no singer may take part in the programs, except with accompaniment of orchestra. The rule works delightfully with opera artists, who can come before the public with some classic aria that has a beautiful vocal melody and an impressive orchestral setting. But it works poorly with an artist like the one who assisted at this concert, whose efforts are confined to songs. For such an one must needs inflict on her listeners pieces with orchestral accompaniment arranged from piano. Almost invariably these are dull things, no matter who the arranger is; and the better the work in its original form, the worse, usually, it sounds in the adapted form. Hence the performance of the second group of solo pieces on Friday afternoon, Wolf's "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's," could redound little to the praise of the visitor and little, too, to the pleasure of the audience.

These selections have been heard before at the Symphony concerts; and like Liszt's "Lorelei," they are in the repertory apparently to stay. They might sound fairly well under certain program conditions, even as that piece does. But they are unspeakably weak when heard on the same day with Wagner's "Träume," which itself is much put to service because of the conductor's insistence on orchestral songs.

"Träume," to all intents and purposes an opera aria and not a song at all, was the piece which best gave scope for the soloist's technical and interpretive powers. Miss Gerhardt's tone found itself heightened against the Wagnerian instrumentation. Her exquisite phrasing found itself answered in the phrasing of violin, flute, oboe, clarinet and horn by the master musicians of the orchestra. Style, balance, blend and everything else that goes to make up brilliant execution were exemplified on the part of singer, conductor and players in a way to make the occasion memorable.

The solo numbers carried the principal burden of the day, since the Mozart and Tschaikowsky pieces are not the kind that stir listeners profoundly. Dr. Muck's reading of the symphony had great clarity; and in spite of the large volume of tone he permitted, and in spite of the heavy thrusts he gave to the rhythmic accents, it had much charm. The suite was of interest in its fourth movement, the marche-miniature, heard for the first time at these concerts, and in its fifth movement, the scherzo, for the light it throws on the music of Tschaikowsky's successor in the Russian school, Stravinsky. The march might do for the triumph of the prince and the princess in the ballet of the "Fire Bird." The little whining theme in the trio of the scherzo is certainly the prototype of the barrel-organ tune in the opening scene of the pantomime

From the
POST
Dec. 23, 1916.

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Liszt's "Faust" Given With Chorus—Paderewski Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was one of the most memorable in the history of this organization. Liszt's "Faust" symphony one of the great works of modern music, and a work of which Dr. Muck is an incomparable interpreter, was the orchestra's contribution, and Ignace Paderewski, the soloist of the occasion, played Schumann's piano concerto.

CHORUS AMPLE AND GOOD

Twice before Dr. Muck has given exceptionally impressive performances of Liszt's work, but never before in this city had the symphony been heard with such adequate forces. The male chorus heard at the last was for once sufficient in its numbers to make itself felt against the orchestra, and to summon whatever degree of sonority was required. The tenor soloist, Arthur Hackett, who was heard for the first time at these concerts, is the possessor of a voice of very exceptional freshness and beauty.

The chorus had been rehearsed for this performance by Stephen Townsend. It consisted not only of members of the musical society which he conducts, but of other singers, professional and non-professional, who had worked devoutly in preparation for the event, and more than vindicated their labors.

Highest Traditions Fulfilled

It was an occasion worthy of the highest traditions of this orchestra, and particularly appropriate to the season. Heretofore Christmas programmes have been made of music of a graceful or festive character, which implied that you could not afford to ask an audience to feel deeply or employ its intellect to any alarming degree in the days immediately before Christmas. But yesterday, as brilliant as was the effect of the concert, it had also the solemnity and the uplift of a religious occasion.

It would not be amiss, indeed, to have repetitions of this work each Christmas week, which, with Dr. Muck on the conductor's stand, and with the orchestra he has at his disposal, could hardly be given a more ideal performance anywhere in the world, even in times of peace. And in time of war, what could be nobler and less reminded of jealousies and strife than this exalted expression of Liszt?

Dr. Muck, the Master Conductor

Dr. Muck is beyond question one of the greatest, and perhaps the greatest, conductor the Symphony audiences have known. At the same time he has himself under control to a degree which causes some to misunderstand his sincerity and artistic enthusiasm. Under so finished an exterior, what is the man? But there are occasions, such as that of yesterday, when no amount of self-command and polish of demeanor hides the intensity of his devotion to the task in hand. And when this is the case the result is certain to be memorable, for the man who projects his artistic conceptions the most powerfully and effectively is the man with a sufficient grip of himself, for his feelings never get the better of him; and where other men, superficially more impulsive, might be made ineffectual with the half of Dr. Muck's comprehension of his music, his power of execution and command becomes the greater.

To conduct is a strong man's task, anyhow, and never was this better exemplified than yesterday. The man at the conductor's stand was as self-controlled as ever, but in the mind of every performer and listener, and in the atmosphere itself, was the reverence he feels toward the composer and the work which it was his task to interpret.

Liszt's Greatest Work

Therefore it was no wonder that the audience sat in the most intense absorption as this performance progressed and at the last applauded the conductor and the orchestra for nearly half of the intermission. As for the symphony itself, its significance becomes greater as it is better understood. Barring passages that today are the material of all the composers who have helped themselves so liberally and often so unconsciously to the heritage left by Liszt, the "Faust" symphony stands as one of his highest and most original inspirations. It is also, in the final movement, the irrefutable proof of the practical importance of Liszt's manner of metamorphizing his themes. Here are no new themes, but rather the themes of the preceding "Faust" and "Gretchen" movements [illegible]tated, and in the case of the the [illegible] of "Faust," parodied with a s[illegible] and ingenuity that gives moder[illegible] expression [illegible] Liszt's time. This [illegible]ressed the spirit of denial," of negation, the mocking of all effort and aspiration.

The "Mephistopheles" movement of the Faust symphony, by itself, would put Liszt in a niche of his own, and would explain a hundred pages of men like Richard Strauss. But the whole work is eloquent. The portrayal of Gretchen is for the writer the nearest approach to Goethe's heroine in music. This is the true loveliness and naivete of the character, not coarsened, as by Boito in his opera "Mefistofele," which is probably the next nearest approach to Goethe's character in music; not sentimentalized by a Gounod or made sensual as by Berlioz in his "Damnation of Faust"; but the true Marguerite, as she walks out of the pages of the poem.

Bombastic at Times

In the Faust movement there are theatrical passages, and passages of bombast, and yet the opening might be by the most modern mystic of them all, and the moods of aspiration, pride of spirit, despair, and the vision of Marguerite—all this is surpassingly dramatic and fascinating in the last degree.

But how many realized during this performance how much they were indebted to Dr. Muck for the refinement and distinction of the music? How miraculously he dusted off what was tawdry in it! How musical bombast became true dramatic fire! How the smallest detail of Liszt's masterly orchestration was exposed in its just relation to the whole! How incomparable the irony of the Mephistopheles music! It takes not only a composer of great genius to achieve such music, but a conductor of the highest idealism and musical and intellectual perception to present it adequately.

Paderewski Suffers Injury

Then came Mr. Paderewski, who, though he had hurt a thumb in playing at the rehearsal, and therefore suffered pain from it during the performance, played in a great spirit which gradually overcame all physical obstacles. It is rather singular that this concerto, which he plays with such fire and healthy romantic spirit, should not have been played before by him at any of the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony.

In March, 1892, he gave a performance of this concerto at a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony players, but the extraordinary success of that performance did not cause him to repeat it with the Boston organization before yesterday. It was a pleasure to hear such a poetic but broad and open-air treatment of the work. No sentimentalizing! No artifice for the sake of an effect! And yet a spontaneity, a wonderful singing tone, a clanging attack in the proper places and a virtuosic spirit that swept all before it. Then, making the exception to the Symphony ruling against encores by soloists, an exception only extended to this pianist, he added to the programme.

From the
Globe
Dec. 23, 1916.

"FAUST" SYMPHONY NOBLY PERFORMED

Mr Paderewski Inspired in Schumann Concerto

Remarkable Concert by Virtuoso Conductor, Pianist and Orchestra

A virtuoso conductor, pianist and orchestra, the rare, one might say unprecedented demonstration given Dr Muck, the aid in Liszt's "Faust" symphony of Arthur Hackett for the solo voice and of the male choir from the Choral Music Society of which Stephen Townsend is conductor, made yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall an extraordinary occasion, one to be remembered out of other concerts when the supreme genius of Dr Muck shone in its own splendor, or in understanding with a soloist of true distinction.

What other pianist than Mr Paderewski would have dared to follow Liszt's noble symphonic narrative and characterization, nobly performed as it was yesterday? For the great work, sweeping and transcendent in its expression of life, speaks with overwhelming dramatic power. The maiden innocence of Gretchen, Faust's brooding unrest, the song of love, the demon's ironic spirit of raillery and destruction, the note of culminating tragedy—all these denote the enkindling imagination and the astonishing warmth, vigor and fullness of romantic expression through the orchestra. This 60 years after the work was written, a period in which Wagner, Strauss, Debussy and now Stravinsky have developed an individual idiom to be narrative, expository, pictorial or characterizing.

As to the score found by Dr Muck at Wagner's home at Bayreuth and given him by Siegfried Wagner for use as he saw fit, we are told that Liszt's revisions made in 1883, three years before the body of the work, but affected principally the orchestration. The acquisition of the more modern bass clarinet reminds of its distinctive color in the first act of Verdi's "Othello" which its voice gives to the scenes denoting the nobility of the Moor's nature and fixing his rank.

Wagner's Comment

The Princess Caroline Wittgenstein who smoked long black cigars, and shared the domestic and artistic happiness of Liszt's sojourn at the Altenburg at Weimar, assumed the responsibility also of the final chorus and apotheosis of the "Faust." When Liszt first played the score to Wagner, the latter was delighted with the "delicate fragrance" of a last reminiscence of Gretchen.

[illegible] Eve of St. Agnes," [illegible] Mr. Paderewski [illegible] Schumann Concerto. [illegible] Liszt's "Faust" symphony [illegible] Dr. Muck's programme [illegible] Schubert's Unfinished Symphony [illegible] overture and Venusberg music [illegible] Wagner, amplified the latter for the production of his opera in Paris. Mme. Homer, the rich-voiced alto of the Metropolitan Opera House, will assist the orchestra singing two airs from Bach's oratorios and three of her husband's songs with orchestral accompaniment. The airs are "My Heart Ever Faithful" and "It Is Finished"—the latter from the Passion Music according to John; the songs are "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me—ing" and "The Song of the Shirt."

Marguerite—all this is surpassingly dramatic and fascinating in the last degree.

But how many realized during this performance how much they were indebted to Dr. Muck for the refinement and distinction of the music? How miraculously he dusted off what was tawdry in it! How musical bombast became true dramatic fire! How the smallest detail of Liszt's masterly orchestration was exposed in its just relation to the whole! How incomparable the irony of the Mephistopheles music! It takes not only a composer of great genius to achieve such music, but a conductor of the highest idealism and musical and intellectual perception to present it adequately.

Paderewski Suffers Injury

Then came Mr. Paderewski, who, though he had hurt a thumb in playing at the rehearsal, and therefore suffered pain from it during the performance, played in a great spirit which gradually overcame all physical obstacles. It is rather singular that this concerto, which he plays with such fire and healthy romantic spirit, should not have been played before by him at any of the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony.

In March, 1892, he gave a performance of this concerto at a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony players, but the extraordinary success of that performance did not cause him to repeat it with the Boston organization before yesterday. It was a pleasure to hear such a poetic but broad and open-air treatment of the work. No sentimentalizing! No artifice for the sake of an effect! And yet a spontaneity, a wonderful singing tone, a clanging attack in the proper places and a virtuosic spirit that swept all before it. Then, making the exception to the Symphony ruling against encores by soloists, an exception only extended to this pianist, he added to the programme.

Lyrical Conclusion

The lyrical A minor concerto of Schumann in ardently romantic, but not dramatic vein, was a fortunate choice to follow the soaring flight upon the mountain top. Purple or dithyrambic verse could have added nothing more. It was for the piano to sing in another mood, and Mr Paderewski, given an overwhelming welcome, played as an inspired poet, with improvisional freshness and beauty of song.

The intimate thoughts of Schumann were as secrets revealed to him in the characteristic phraseology which is only for the miniaturist to cherish, for the painter in water colors, as well as for him whom Schumann at times bids sweep a broader canvas. The slow movement glowed. The embroideries of the final one were appropriately rhapsodical, and in all the orchestra sang with equal loveliness.

Recalled thunderously, Mr Paderewski translated his hearers to the tenderness, the arch elegance, the old world grace of Rameau, or was it Conperin or one of their school? Then graciously he added Daquin's "Le Coucou," with its plaintive note of heavenly melancholy. The piano was closed and the lights lowered or the concert still might be unended. Altogether a towering vision of great thoughts and beautiful, and a transporting expression of them.

From the Traveler
Dec. 23, 1916.

Next Week's Symphony Concert.

The program for next week's Symphony concerts will be Beethoven's eighth symphony, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," given for the first time at these concerts, and Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on the Choral, "Wer nur den lieben Gott laszt welten."

The concert in Symphony Hall on the last day of the year, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 31, at 3:30, will be given by Mme. Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera Company and Eddy Brown, American violinist.

Louis Graveure, baritone, will be heard in a recital in Jordan Hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 5, at 3 o'clock.

Mme. Povla Frisch will be heard in song recital in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6, at 3 o'clock.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the artist for the Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, Jan. 7.

The extra concert to be given by the Flonzaley quartet in Jordan Hall, Monday evening, Jan. 8, is complimentary to subscribers, but the general public will be admitted at regular box office prices. Two quartets (one new to the Boston public) will be given by the Flonzaleys, in addition to a "Suite for Two Violins," which is another new work.

FROM Mr. Edward Ballantine, one of the teachers of music in Harvard College comes a new tone-poem. "The Eve of St. Agnes," suggested by Keats's like-named verse, which will be heard for the first times at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The other purely orchestral numbers on Dr. Muck's programme are familiar classics—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in biennial repetition and the overture and

From the
Herald
Dec.23,1916.

MEMORABLE PERFORMANCE BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra in Ninth Concert Plays Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Schumann's Piano Concerto—Tenor Arthur Hackett and Paderewski Take Part —Dr. Muck Conducts.

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Schumann's piano concerto. The orchestra was assisted in the symphony by Arthur Hackett, tenor, and a male chorus from the Choral Music Society. Mr. Paderewski was the pianist.

This concert will not soon be forgotten. The symphony made a marked impression when it was performed two seasons ago although the solo tenor, Mr. Draper, was not the man for the allotted task. Yesterday the impression made wos still deeper. The effect of the finale, the "Chorus mysticus," was overwhelming. The orchestra played throughout as though it were inspired by the genius of the composer and by the genius of the conductor. Mr. Longy outdid himself in the solo passages for oboe, nor were Messrs. Witek, Ferir, Sand, the only other virtuosos: every man in the orchestra was for the time being a virtuoso musician. The chorus, which had been prepared by Mr. Townsend, the conductor of the Choral Music Society, gave an imposing performance. Mr. Hackett, who sang at these concerts for the first time, has a true tenor voice of unusually agreeable quality; it is warm, pure, sympathetic, virile. He sang with musical and rhetorical understanding. For important concerts in this city it will not be necessary to import a tenor.

The program book showed at a glance what a prominent role Liszt has taken in the concerts of this orchestra since 1881. Yet there are some who still pooh-pooh his music and dismiss it in a lump as barren of ideas, bombastic, tricky. We find no less a man than Sir Charles Villiers Stanford in the recent "History of Music," written by him and Mr. Forsyth saying that Liszt as a composer was always "a virtuoso first and a composer afterwards"; the symphonic poems are "lacking in the power of development and concentration which alone could make them live"; and Sir Charles speaks of "Dante" and "Faust" as two "grandiose but unconvincing" symphonies. Is the "Faust" symphony "unconvincing"? Sir Charles should have heard the performance yesterday.

Liszt's greatest orchestral works demand an unusually efficent orchestra and a conductor who not only appreciates the imaginative pages of the symphonic poems and symphonies, but has the skill to impart vitality to pages that are more prosaic. Furthermore this conductor must not only be master of his orchestra, endowed with the qualities just named; he must also be a romanticist, not afraid of dazzling effects and startling contrasts, which, under the baton of an honest conductor, good enough in routine work, careful in paying tithe of mint and anise and cummin, but by nature a pedestrian, may seem brutal and vulgar. The ideal conductor of Liszt's music must drive Pegasus in his prancing and furious bursts of speed with loose reins. It is a pity, we repeat, that Sir Charles has not yet heard an important work of Liszt played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Muck.

After the colossal symphony with the movement entitled "Gretchen," one of the most beautiful and profoundly emotional things in all music; with a first movement in which the restless, unsatisfied mind of Faust is dramatically portrayed, with a characterization of Mephistopheles that has been surpassed only by Berlioz, and with the noble final chorus, the concerto of Schumann might have seemed tame if the pianist had not been Mr. Paderewski. The effect of Liszt's music would have made the skill of many pianists following seem impotent, but the concerto, as played by Mr. Paderewski in the peculiarly romantic and poetic manner that was befitting and necessary, was not in the nature of an anti-climax. Mr. Paderewski played as he alone can play when he is wholly in the mood. It would have been better if the audience had been dismissed with the memory of two unsurpassable performances. With his accustomed good nature Mr. Paderewski played charmingly a group of little pieces, for many hearers, insatiate as Oliver Twist, wished a memorable Symphony concert turned into a piano recital.

Dr. Muck was enthusiastically recalled again and again after the symphony. Mr. Paderewski was honored in his turn in a like manner.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program for next week will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Balakireff "Thamar" (first time at these concerts); Georg Schumann's Symphonic Variations on the Choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laestt walten."

From the
Herald
Jan.13,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Mr. Spalding Makes First Appearance with Players in Present Series and His Performance Is Both Thoughtful and Careful—Program Will Be Repeated Tonight.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter." "The Oceanides," "Night Ride and Sunrise" (the three for the first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto for Violin (Albert Spalding, violinist); overture to "Egmont."

"Pohjola's Daughter" was published in 1906: the "Night Ride" in 1909, and "The Oceanides" written at Mr. Carl Stoeckel's invitation, was performed for the first time at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union at Norfolk, Ct., in June, 1914, when the composer conducted it with other pieces by him.

Of the three pieces "Pohjola's Daughter," the earliest, is to us the most musically poetic. For inspiration Sibelius went to the Finnish epic, "Kalovala," and chose the episode in which the old and steadfast Vainamoinen is fascinated by Pohjola's daughter sitting and spinning on a rainbow. At once enamored, he begs her to come down and sit on his sledge. She lightly says that if he will fashion a boat out of her spindle she'll gladly follow him. This he fails to do, and, sorely wounded by the rebounding axe, he goes his way, alone, but with the memory of the girl's seductive voice, with the hope of winning her.

A condensed version of the story is printed in German verse in the score; but, fortunately, to our knowledge no commentator has pointed out different motives, the rainbow, the girl's mockery, the shaping of the boat, the axe, the wounded leg. As the music goes on, wildly beautiful for the most part, the hearer, if he is so disposed, can hear the story in the music, and say: "Now the hero is coming on his sledge; there sits the girl on the rainbow; I hear the talk and the work of the axe"; there will be no one to contradict him, though Sibelius, if he was present, might reply: "Not at all, my dear sir; you have the wrong theme"; or the hearer may be conscious only of something original, peculiar, forcible, always impressive and at times entrancing.

Now "Night Ride and Sunrise" has no printed argument. We are not told who rode, who saw the rising sun, or whether the title came from some personal experience in Finland that suggested the music. Some one rode, we infer also from the music; rode long, hard, and monotonously. The galloping figure is abused until it frets the nerves. The ride outlasted the night of a northern land. When the sun did rise, it made a mighty ado about it, but the sonorous pages at the end did not console one for the endless repetition in those preceding.

"The Oceanides" is unabashed impressionism. The daughters of Oceanus—or the corresponding sea-nymphs of Finnish mythology—disappear with the tootling of the flutes. Then there is a picture in tones of winds and waves. Here the composer does not seem to us to be so successful as Rimsky-Korsakoff in the sea music of "Scheherazade," as Debussy in his symphonic sketches, as Paul Gilson in his symphony played here a good many years ago, or even as the genteel Mendelssohn in his "Fingal's Cave" overture. We do not mention Rubenstein's "Ocean" symphony with so many movements that the hearers usually makes the second for himself. The tone-poem of Sibelius, however, should be heard again. It is not music to be recklessly accepted, or jauntily dismissed. Remy de Gourmont thought that the sea was the most original creation of the 19th century. "How beautiful the ocean must have been, when it was unknown and solitary! Now it has too many lovers. Few men and only some women embellish landscapes." The ocean may not yet be ready to confide its secrets to composers. Rimsky-Korsakoff had sailed the seas. Sibelius had crossed the Atlantic. But the ocean is not the same to even the imaginative.

Mr. Spalding appeared for the first time at these concerts. About five years ago he played with the visiting orchestra of Chicago the interminable and ungrateful concerto of Elgar and then showed courage and endurance. Of late years he has given recitals in which he displayed his steady growth in the finer and nobler qualities of violin playing. No doubt he thought it obligatory for him, a newcomer in concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to select either Beethoven's or Brahms's concerto. Would that the former could be laid on the shelf for a few seasons! Then played in a masterly manner, it might again be accepted as a marvellous work. Mr. Spalding gave a thoughtful, careful interpretation of it; a rather cool and chaste performance as a whole, though in the second movement his tone was warmer and his playing more emotional. His tone in the first movement was small and pure, his interpretation too often non-committal, and the movement seemed longer than ever before. We do not doubt his facility, or the [illegible] He has studied hard and with the earnest resolve to play not merely as a fiddling virtuoso. He is entitled to all respect at present, and we believe he will go still farther in his art.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestral pieces next week will be Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, "The Eve of St. Agnes," by Ballantine, and the Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." Mme. Homer will sing "It Is Finished" from Bach's Passion Music according to John the Evangelist; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and three songs of her husband's: "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me, Sing," and "The Song of the Shirt."

From the Advertiser
DEc. 23,1916.

PADEREWSKI AND ORCHESTRA EXCEL

TRIUMPH ACHIEVED BY ALL CONCERNED

Choral Musical Society Sings With Creditable Steadiness And Beauty

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Liszt—"Faust" Symphony.
Schumann—Piano Concerto.
Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Electricity was in the air, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and the concert was a triumph from beginning to end.

The program looks very short, in print, but it was not so in fact, for two reasons. First, both the symphony and the concerto are long works. Second, the "non-encore" rule is lifted when Paderewski appears in these concerts and there is always a Coda added by the great pianist.

Generally when Paderewski appears he swings the entire proceedings; it is "Paderewski et praetera nihil!" But yesterday, we are glad to say, it was a divided consulship, and the conductor and the orchestra shared the honors with the gifted artist, and those honors were an absolute triumph for all concerned.

After the performance of the first number one could exclaim, enthusiastically, with the ghost in "Hamlet,"—"Liszt, Liszt, oh Liszt!", for it was an inspiring work grandly interpreted. And it requires a good deal of tact to conduct the great works of the Hungarian.

His loyal disciple, the great conductor Weingartner, has summed up some of the points which are necessary. He confesses at once that the large works are unequal and suggests that the conductor emphasize the points where the spasmodic genius blazes forth. He believes in making especially powerful climaxes in order to conceal their similarity to each other. He suggests much free time-keeping—"Tempo Rubato." Something of diffuseness and prolixity must be hidden.

All of these points are instinctively attended to by Dr. Muck, who interprets this work better than anybody that we have ever heard. The whole symphony is made to excite the auditor so that he is far removed from an analytical mood. Three times have we had this symphony under Dr. Muck, and each time it has been a triumph. Yesterday afternoon it was especially so because of the lofty character of the choral ending.

The male chorus, the Choral Music Society, sang with a steadiness and beauty that was a credit both to themselves and their director. Stephen Townsend, and the tenor. Arthur Hackett, splendidly effective in the solo phrases.

Of the work itself nothing new can be spoken, it has been so recently reviewed in these columns, but one can state that the third movement, "Mephistopheles," grows more powerful with repeated hearing. The tender simplicity of the Gretchen movement makes it always the most intelligible and most popular portion of the symphony. The lofty aspirations of Faust, and the yearning of the lover, are also comprehensible enough, and the first movement reveals nothing new upon repetition. But one finds richer meaning, and more of sardonic sneering, in the Mephistopheles portion of the work, in renewed study of it.

The symphony awakened tremendous enthusiasm and, for once, the orchestral portion of the program was not merely a prelude to usher in the greatest living pianist. Dr. Muck was recalled over and over again, with great applause, and in every way the audience showed that they appreciated the fact that they had heard something far out of the common. Of all the great performances of the Faust Symphony the one of yesterday afternoon was the most inspiring, and we do not recall such excitement in a Symphony Hall concert for years.

Then came Paderewski and the Schumann piano concerto. It was a good object lesson to find this loyal and true-herated Pole choosing a great German work for this concert. The lesser men nowadays are allowing partisanship to warp their views music should know no national boundaries, and Paderewski's wonderful versatility makes him great in every school.

We have not had this concerto, we believe, since it was well played at a Friday afternoon concert (a few years ago) and turned into a musical hurdle-race in the concert of the day after, thanks to the caprice of a soloist.

We have found Paderewski somewhat too free in a previous intepretation of this work: yesterday he was broad, dignified and effective in every part of the concerto. The beauty of the chief theme of the opening movement was splendidly effective. This theme, in all its transformations, was made the most of, and if the piano was much in the foreground that fault was Schumann's and not Paderewski's.

One may find some fault with this work if one takes the strict concerto standpoint (as also with Chopin's two concertos), for it has not the symphonic, orchestral effect that one finds in Beethoven or in Brahms, when they used the concerto-form, but the richness of melodic invention, the beauty and romance of the themes and their treatment make the concerto a joy to listen to, and especially when Paderewski glorifies it as he did on this occasion. It is unnesessary to state again how frenzied the plaudits became, and all this extreme applause was deserved.

That was the end of the concert. But very few left their seats. The horny-handed encore-fiend was here in his proper element, for Paderewski does not seriously object to an Oliver-Twist demand for more, and in response to the usual wild enthusiasm he was soon again at the piano adding a recital to the symphonic occasion. This appendix requires no detailed criticism, greatly enjoyable although it was. Altogether those who were at this concert will not soon forget it.

From the Journal
Dec.23,1916.

SYMPHONY AND PADEREWSKI IN RARE CONCERT

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Schumann Concerto Played Brilliantly.

In this week's Symphony concerts the musical season in Boston reaches a climax. The performance of either one of the two numbers on the program—Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, with the choral finale, and the Schumann concerto for piano and orchestra, with Paderewski as soloist—would make the concert one of the extraordinary events of the year. Presented together, these two masterpieces lend memorable importance to Dr. Muck's ninth program, more particularly as the performance itself marks perhaps the most brilliant feat the Symphony Orchestra has yet achieved under its present distinguished conductor.

The "Faust" symphony, in its revised form, was performed here twice during the season of 1914-15. It is a monumental work, a series of symphonic poems depicting Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, the first two being suggested by themes of a lyrical character—the Gretchen theme, especially as played by Mr. Longy, is one of thrilling beauty—while the Evil Genius of the Goethe drama is represented by music that travesties the Faust and Gretchen themes in diabolical fashion.

It is a wonderful composition, notwithstanding its redundance—the performance yesterday occupied about 70 minutes—and in this instance the performance is eminently worthy of it. The orchestra is assisted by a chorus of male voices from the Choral Musical Society, with Arthur Hackett singing the tenor solo.

The always enthusiastic matinee audience outdid itself yesterday in acknowledgment of Dr. Muck's masterly conducting. It recalled him again and again. There was applause, also, for the orchestra and chorus and for Mr. Hackett.

Giants were fairly matched in the performance of the Schumann concerto—Paderewski and Dr. Muck and the players whom the prince of pianists has repeatedly acclaimed as the finest orchestra in the world. The romantic charm of the concerto was evoked most eloquently and poetically. Paderewski played as if stimulated by the performance of the symphony. With Dr. Muck's co-operation, he wove a spell as of magic harmony. Such beauty of tone, in piano and orchestra both, and such poetic utterance as marked this particular performance are among the joys tasted "once in a lifetime."

This, by the way, was the first time the premier pianist of the times ever played the Schumann concerto at one of the regular Symphony concerts. He, too, deserved his ovation. He responded with encores, although the hour was late.

Next week, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," will have its first performance at a Symphony concert. Georg Schumann's symphonic variations on the choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott laesst walten," will be presented for the first time since 1901. Beethoven's eighth symphony will complete the program.

From the
Monitor
Jam,13,1917.

ALBERT SPALDING HEARD AS SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor, Albert Spalding, Soloist—Eleventh program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Jan. 12: Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter," op. 49; "The Oceanides," op. 73; and "Night-Ride and Sunrise," op. 55 (first time in Boston). Beethoven, concerto for violin in D, op. 61, and overture to "Egmont," op. 84.

In just eight years, Mr. Spalding has grown from an apprentice among violinists to a master-player. And in five years, he has advanced from a soloist who was fortunate to get a chance to appear in Boston with a visiting orchestra, to one who does the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself honor by appearing with it, conservative though that institution is in choosing guests to assist in its august ceremonies at Symphony Hall Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. He might reasonably have been admitted into the fellowship of first-rank artists sooner, for that is what his engagement to play with the orchestra will mean hereafter, as he goes about on the North American concert circuit. But probably all the better for him, now that he is at last initiated, that the ministrants of the musical Eleusinia of the United States are so circumspect.

Standing up as soloist with the orchestra on this occasion, and stating himself before a large and permanently organized audience, he disclosed the same traits as when he stood up in January, 1909, before a sparse and casual group of listeners in a small hall. He showed himself at this time as then, one who speaks earnestly and profoundly and who will let no false accent or inflection mar what he says; as one, also, who speaks fluently and directly, leaving no gap between his thought and his expression of it for finicality or priggishness to occupy. In youth he came breaking the traditions of make-believe that have surrounded concert artists. In maturity he comes, still making no pretense about himself as a man of the platform, though asserting frankly enough the illusion of the poetic for his art.

The Beethoven violin concerto, performed by such an artist, could hardly help meaning something new. Almost never is a long Beethoven work presented with unbroken elegance of style. To the majority of interpreters the composer would not be himself if his music were so played. He would lack, for one thing, his supposed egotism. And then there might be monotony. But the violinist at the matinee played with consistent polish of phrase, and held the attention of his listeners to his discourse at the same time. Seldom, however, does a Beethoven work get presented with uniform smoothness and richness of tone. Yet the violin concerto was so performed, last movement and all. Nor was contrast of moods weakened by the procedure.

The violinist's methods reacted on the conductor, who gave an accompaniment for the concerto that was of almost string quartet delicacy. The visitor's methods, indeed, seemed to affect the program even where he had no part. The Sibelius selections, new to the repertory of the orchestra, were read with a lightness that was hardly to have been looked for, their contents considered. But if kept somewhat subdued, they were read with care on everybody's part for the best effects of interpretation. The three pieces are interesting experiments in the short story form, in which the Finnish composer is expert. They do not, however, represent him at his best in that form. They have none of the beauty of the "Swan of Tuonela" music. The "Pohjola's Daughter" fantasia has much preluding in the grave registers of the wood, wind instruments, which leads to little except academic developments in the acute registers of the violins. "The Oceanides" was written to order for a music festival, and there seems no good reason for anybody's denying that the order was honestly enough filled. "Night-Ride and Sunrise" for the first half is an interesting study in rhythm, having somewhat the same irresistible mingling of realism and romance as Schubert's "Erlking" song. The composer, exchanging in the middle of the work rhythm for color, may have carried out logically some scheme of description, but he gives the idea of having arbitrarily fastened together two independent narratives, rather than of having told one tale in two chapters.

From the Record
Jan.13,1917.

Next week's Symphony soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer. She will sing songs by her husband. The orchestra will play "The Eve of St. Agnes," symphonic poem by Edward Ballantine of the Harvard music department.

[66]

From the American
Dec.17,1916.

Gala Program for Christmas Concerts

THE Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present the gala program of the year. There will be but two numbers, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A Minor, with Paderewski as soloist. Perhaps the most notable achievement of Dr. Muck since he first came to Boston was the performance of the "Faust" Symphony two years ago.

At the coming performances the male chorus will be that of the Choral Music Society, of which Stephen Townsend is conductor. There will be ninety voices. The tenor solo will be by Arthur Hackett.

The "Faust" Symphony will come first on the program. Its performance takes an hour. There will be nothing in the second part of the program except the Schumann Concerto, but it is likely that Mr. Paderewski will follow his custom of the past of adding solo numbers at the conclusion of the concerto. This will be Mr. Paderewski's only appearance with the orchestra this year.

From the Traveler
Dec.16,1916.

ELENA GERHARDT PLEASING SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The magnet which drew many to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was the opportunity afforded to hear Elena Gerhardt sing with the orchestra rather than the program itself, for there was little outside of portions of the Tschaikowsky number to appeal.

Mme. Gerhardt was charming as ever, singing as too few of the artists of today can sing and imparting new interest to each song given. While one might take exceptions to her choice of songs, particularly the Wagner numbers, none are inclined to question her artistry.

Dr. Muck made all possible of the Mozart symphony, but even that failed to make the work impressive. Next week, however, the program promises to make full amends.

However, whatever the holiday offerings may lack in quantity, there is no lack of quality, notably the program for next week's Symphony concerts, when Liszt's "Faust" Symphony appears on the program and Paderewski makes his only appearance this season with the orchestra as soloist. There are but two numbers on the program, the Symphony and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

In the Symphony the orchestra will be assisted by 90 voices from the male chorus of the Choral Music Society and Arthur Hackett, tenor. The presentation of the Symphony takes an hour. Of course there will be enthusiastic demands for "extras" from Paderewski in the concerto, and doubtless they will be granted.

From the
Globe
Dec.17,1916.

Paderewski and Choral Music at the Symphonies

The Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present the gala program of the year. There will be but two numbers, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, with Paderewski as soloist. Perhaps the most notable achievement of Dr Muck since he first came to Boston was the performance of the "Faust" Symphony two years ago. It will be remembered that it was given at two sets of concerts in the season of 1914-1915.

At the coming performances the male chorus will be that of the Choral Music Society, of which Stephen Townsend is conductor. There will be 90 voices, 30 more than were used two years ago. This will add much to the impressiveness of the close of the Symphony.

The tenor solo will be sung by Arthur Hackett, the young singer who made such a favorable impression with his work at the brief season of "Pop" concerts last September.

The "Faust" Symphony will come first on the program. Its performance takes an hour. There will be nothing in the second part of the program except the Schumann Concerto, but it is likely that Mr Paderewski will follow his custom of the past of adding solo numbers at the conclusion of the concerto. This will be Mr Paderewski's only appearance with the orchestra this year.

From the Traveler
Jan,13,1917.

Louise Homer to Sing with the Symphony

Popular Contralto Will Be Soloist at Next Week's Concerts.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

Special interest attaches to next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra through the announcement that Mme. Louise Homer, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera company, will be the soloist. The program comprises the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert, two arias by Bach, "It Is Finished" from "The Passion According to St. John," and "My Heart Ever Faithful"; the Symphonic Poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," by Ballantine; three songs with orchestra by Sidney Homer, "From the Brake the Nightingale" (words by Henley); "Sing to Me, Sing" (words by Henley), and "The Song of the Shirt" (words by Thomas Hood). The final number will be the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser."

For his concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon Paderewski will play the following program:

Sonata in C minor, op 111.....Beethoven
Papillons.....Schumann
Sonata, op. 21.....Paderewski
Nocturne.....Chopin
Two Mazurkas.....Chopin
Scherzo in C sharp minor.....Chopin
Chant d'amour.....Stojokski
Pres du ruisseau.....Stojowski
Midsummer Night's Dream Fantasia.....Mendelssohn-Liszt

From the American
Jan.15,1917.

SYMPHONY PLAYS SIBELIUS MUSIC

By F. J. McISAAC.

Three tone poems by Sibelius which had never been played in Boston were featured at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The Finnish composer is growing very fashionable, and his works crop up every few weeks on Dr. Muck's programs.

These unfamiliar pieces are "Pohjola's daughter," "The Oceanides" and "Night Ride and Sunrise," all romantic and descriptive in character. To me they seemed the poorest Sibelius pieces that I have yet heard. "Pohjola's Daughter" is a fairy tale from the Kalevala, the Finnish epic poem.

It is apparently descriptive of Vainamoinen's ride home in a sledge during which he looks up and beholds Pohjola's daughter sitting on a corner of the rainbow. The music is soggy, laborious, cacophonous and dull.

The second number, "The Oceanides," is descriptive of the sea in the manner of Debussy, and is equally uninspired. The third piece has a picturesque galloping figure running through it and is rather more effective than the others, but all three are below the Sibelius we are acquainted with at the Symphony concert.

Albert Spaulding, the American violinist, was soloist. He chose to play the Beethoven concerto in D, which contains much exquisite music but which is interminably long. Mr. Spaulding has grown in workmanship and artistry since he was last here. He plays with a dash and spirit and beautiful tone.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
ess: New York City
JAN 7 1917

Für das am Abend des 16. d. Mts. im Metropolitan Opera House stattfindende Galakonzert zu Gunsten der „Vacation Association", das sich zum Glanzpunkt der Saison zu gestalten verspricht, gibt sich das größte Interesse kund. Kein Wunder, wenn man bedenkt, daß das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester im Verein mit Paderewski und Kreisler eine wirklich sensationelle künstlerische Kombination bedeuten. Herr Kreisler wird mit Orchesterbegleitung das Mendelssohn'sche E-Moll-Konzert, sein eigenes „Tambourin Chinois" und Wieniawski's „Airs Russes" spielen. Herr Paderewski wird sich mit einer Gruppe von Solopianostücken einführen. Das Orchester spielt Smetana's Ouvertüre zur „Verkauften Braut", Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel" und Rimsky Korsakoff's „Caprice Espagnole".

HERALD
New York City
JAN 17 1917

Paderewski, Kreisler and Boston Orchestra Give $25,000 Benefit

Miss Anne Morgan's Vacation Association to Receive Income from Remarkable Performance at Metropolitan—Cat Climbs to Stage and Views a King of Pianists.

Paderewski, Kreisler, Boston Symphony Orchestra, magic names in music were enough to pack the Metropolitan Opera House last night at a benefit concert for the Vacation Association, of which Miss Anne Morgan is the treasurer. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president and Mrs. Wendell Baker, vice president.

Although orchestra seats sold for $10 each and others in proportion, there was not a vacant seat in the auditorium, and the standees were limited only by the fire laws. The receipts reached $25,000.

The concert was a long one, to the joy of the great audience. It was half-past eight o'clock when Dr. Karl Muck and his musicians from Boston played the overture from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," and it was half-past eleven when Mr. Paderewski, in conclusion, played several piano solos and encorse. Mr. Kreisler, who, like the pianist, received an ovation, also contributed a group of violin solos in addition to Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, opus 64. The pianist also appeared in Schumann's concerto in A minor, opus 54. The orchestra also played "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Ctrauss and Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine."

The Metropolitan's stage cat entered unexpectedly into the programme as Mr. Paderewski was about to open his concerto. With the best of intentions but to the great anonyance of the pianist and the evident amusement of Dr. Muck the animal, that makes it home beneath the stage, crawled up through the prompter's box just to prove that a cat can look at a great pianist.

Mr. Paderewski scowled. Dr. Muck smiled. Anton Wittek, concert master, jabbed the intruder with the bow of his violin but all to no avail. Pussy, snuggled comfortably among the unused footlights, purred through the three movements of the concerto.

Miss Morgan enjoyed the music from box No. 8 with Mr. and Mrs. Ernesto G. Fabbri and Mr. Gaston Liebert, Consul General of France in New York, among her guests. The group in another parterre box included Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Miss Mabel Beardsley and Miss Miriam Oliver, who are directors of the association.

Others in the boxes were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, whose guests were Mr. and Mrs. S. R. Guggenheim and the Duchesse de Chaulnes; the Misses Edith and Maude K. Wetmore, in box No. 14; Mrs. Wendell Baker and a party in box No. 24; Mrs. Joseph Harriman, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrilu Hatch and Miss Jane B. Wallach, in box No. 6; Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Iselin, in box No. 42; Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Breitung and Miss Maria de Barril, in box No. 29; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, with guests in box No. 11; Mrs. Whitney Warren and Mr. and Mrs. William Greenough in box No. 16; Mr. and Mrs. William Pierson Hamilton and Mr. and Mrs. John Dyneley Prince, in box No. 18, and Mme. Gatti-Casazza and Miss Susan Dresser, in box No. 48.

Others present were Mr. and Mrs. Newbold Leroy Edgar, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. James F. D. Lanier, Mr. and Mrs. Walter E. Maynard, Mrs. James Speyer, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Charles Devello Lathrop, Miss Vera A. H. Cravath, Mr. and Mrs. Karrick Kiggs, Miss Pauline Riggs, Mr. Charles M. Robinson, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. William P. Douglas, Mrs. W. Storrs Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Iselin, Miss Louise M. Iselin, Mr. and Mrs. William Ayrault Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Gordon Norrie, Mrs. Richard W. Lindabury, Miss Marion Hollins, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hastings, Mr. Frederick H. Allen, the Misses Barbara and Jean Allen, Mrs. Cadwalader Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rathbone Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Belmont and Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont.

m EVENING NEWS
ress: Baltimore, Md.
e Jan 5, 1917.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The third concert of this season's series to be given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of a far more ingratiating character than its immediate predecessor, for the program was so constructed as to produce a peculiarly consistent impression of serene beauty and elevation.

Dr. Muck deserves all thanks for reminding us of the existence of the now so rarely heard Rhenish Symphony of Schumann. The four symphonies of this composer contain so vast a wealth of romantic beauty and so infinite a variety of mood and style that, at first sight, their everwaning popularity is bewildering. Looked at more closely, however, the reason is fairly obvious. The orchestra is essentially not Schumann's natural medium of expression, for his thoughts are too subtle, too inward, to be adequately conveyed by ensemble work of any kind, and added to this is the obvious timidity of his scoring for the brass and wood-wind. Again, seldom as in the case of Beethoven and others, is one conscious of that unified inspiration that makes any particular theme inseparable from the particular instrument or instruments used. Next on the program came Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," one of the most perfect and individual expressions extant of the composer's genius, and played with the most subtle refinement and understanding of its exotic and sensuous beauty.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, one of the most refined and finished pianists of the day, was heard in Rachmaninoff's second concerto for pianoforte with orchestra—a work which was played here some years ago by the composer himself.

This composition is ideally suited to the peculiar gift and temperament of Mr. Gabrilowitsch, for it just calls for that supreme refinement and delicacy so essentially characteristic of all his work. Added to this there was, last night, such purity of conception, and glowing spontaneity and intensity of feeling in his playing as made the loftiest kind of appeal. And yet, somehow, he does not convey just that impression of absolute greatness which assures the listener of stores of still unexpended power.

The concerto itself is a work full of beauty of an unassuming and graceful order, but is not representative of this composer in his more fiery and powerful moods.

H. D. P.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City

Date.....

Packed to the gilded roof with an equally gilded audience, the Metropolitan Opera House opened its doors last night to the Vacation Association and housed for the first time in over a score of years the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By grace of the aid of Paderewski and Kreisler the evening was made memorable as one of the most brilliant concerts in every particular held in New York in many years.

Beauty met you at the door when you stepped in and charged you beauty's price for a programme. Beauty was in every box, parterre and above. Beauty was in the orchestra, the circles, the balcony—and even in the toppermost places where, standing three deep, the devotees of Beauty and Vacation Funds had no opportunity to give either one or the other of them vacation.

Under Dr. Muck the Boston orchestra played magnificently. The orchestral pieces which the noted conductor had chosen were well fitted to display the scope and virtuous power of his organization. Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture began the concert; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" had a rendition such as to awake the dullest imagination to the old German market place and the imp who made mischief and commotion there; Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody in A Major," given here in the early fall by another orchestra which could hardly do justice to the wild thumping rhythms, the ricochetting shrieks of it, presented a Balkan peasantry in martial celebration. Without doubt no orchestra in America could have given such a clean-cut, definite and deep picturesqueness to these last two numbers.

Mr. Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, carrying the house away with its first passionate allegro, his violin a whole orchestra in itself, his tones warmly and stirringly Kreislerian. Mr. Paderewski's concerto was the Schumann in A minor, which he played in the very same spot with the same orchestra behind him twenty-three years ago at a concert to aid the building of the Washington Arch. The arch is respectably old and weathered by now, but Schumann, in Paderewski's hands, remains a thing of youth—indomitably stormy, everlastingly graceful and tender.

For soli pieces, Mr. Kreisler played one of the Granados Spanish dances, the tripping ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," his own "Tambourin Chinois" and "Rondino on a Beethoven Theme"—the last winning an entire repetition. His "Caprice Viennese" was a popular encore. Paderewski's soli were all from Chopin, ballades and waltzes—four of them to be exact, and another demanded for encore. Given on a sombre lighted and deserted stage, they sent the fashionable audience home sighing most un-

From WORLD
Address: New York City

VACATION CONCERT A $25,000 TRIUMPH

Boston Symphony, Paderewski and Kreisler Fill Metropolitan at Benefit for Girls' Free Outing Association.

The many thousand young girls and women interested in the Vacation Association, in addition to sponsors who planned last night's benefit entertainment at the Metropolitan Opera House, will be delighted that the concert, in financial returns, takes a place among the record performances of a regular nature in the history of the Metropolitan.

Close to $25,000 was realized from the sale of tickets and programmes. The first circle of boxes, seating six, sold for $150 each; boxes on the grand tier brought $100, and seats on the main floor were sold at $10. Some who had purchased seats sent them back at the last minute to be resold, and there was an eager crowd to take care of this unexpected supply.

Special performances for the benefit of past impresarios at the Metropolitan have realized as high as $50,000, but they scarcely can be compared with last night's entertainment.

The music was supplied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck; Ignace Paderewski, pianist, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist. The programme was: "Die Verkaufte Blaut," Smetana; Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin and orchestra; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, Schumann; Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine, and solo groups by Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler.

There was much enthusiasm for the work of the soloists and orchestra, and Kreisler was forced to play encores when his solo numbers were over.

Many persons distinguished in society, philanthropy and professional circles were present and numerous "Vacation Girls" took advantage of the opportunity to hear the concert from the more moderate priced locations.

Among the boxholders were:

Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Herbert Satterlee, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss de Forrest, Mrs. Henry Payne Whitney, Mrs. Henry C. Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Charles Smith, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Mrs. Edward N. Breitung, Mrs. Horace Hill, Clarence Mackay, C. W. Watson, Charles Steele, Arthur Ryle, Mrs. D. W. B. Dickerman, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. Edward Guggenheim and Miss Terese O'Donohue.,

Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Maurice Kosminski, Mme. Paderewski, Mrs. William Salomon, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. John Parsons, A. C. Gurnee, Mrs. Arthur Dodge, Mrs. Henry Evans, Mrs. Newbold Edgar, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Mrs. Frederick Allen, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. W. E. Hooper, Mrs. Newcomb Carlton, Miss Fohenkneck, Mrs. William P. Hamilton, George Whelan and Mrs. Kreisler.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date JAN 14 1

TUESDAY night is to bring one of the important incidents of the winter in music, a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, with Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler as soloists. It will be for the benefit of the Vacation Association.

Boxes and seats have been retained by Mmes. Arthur M. Dodge, Charles Freeman, Vincent Astor, Newbold Le Roy Edgar, Henry Evans, Adrian Iselin and J. G. Dreyfus, Miss Terese O. Donohue, Mmes. Charles H. Ditson, William B. Dillon, Henry F. Davison, William Bayard Cutting, Charles Steele, James Cushman, Frederick H. Allen, Perry Belmont, James J. Higginson, Simon R. Guggenheim, Henry C. Frick, E. B. Dickerson, Edward N. Breitung, John Greenough, Albert Goodhart, C. E. B. Gardner, Edmond Guggenheim, E. V. Frothingham, Selden Bacon, William Cummings, F. K. Curtis, Paul D. Cravath, Alfred Cook, Washington Connor, Horace Hill, Rogers H. Bacon, Ignace J. Paderewski, E. A. Coffin, Henry Clews, Stephen Clark, W. T. Carrington, N. M. Bruere, S. C. Borg, George Blumenthal, August Belmont, Wendell Baker, W. H. Walker, Maurice Kosminiski, Horace Hill, Newcomb Carlton, C. W. Watson, Henry Payne Whitney, William K. Vanderbilt, William Salomon, Arthur Ryle, Herbert L. Satterlee and Ponsonby Ogle, Mr. Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan and Miss Anne Morgan.

[67]

TRIBUNE

New York City

GROUP CONCERTS GAIN IN VOGUE

Brilliant Artists and Audience Last Night at Metropolitan

CHERNIAVSKYS PLAY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Violinist, Pianist and 'Cellist Are Heard in Joint Recital

By H. E. KREHBIEL

There have been some signs of a change in concert activities of late, which may have seemed like gleams of hope to the weary observer who is rapidly becoming pessimistic. For one thing, the number of concerts has fallen off; fewer have been announced since the holidays than before, and of those announced some have been postponed. No matter what the alleged cause—they have been postponed.

There has also been a falling off in the attendance despite what there is good reason to suspect is an increase in the percentage of punched tickets. Cards of admission, which have been perforated by an industrious manager, count in the records of the doorkeeper, but not in the cash returns made by the gentleman whose face you see through the box office window.

There have been large audiences, which have made the observing doorkeeper long for an unpunched ticket which he might beg of the management to paste in his memory book.

Visited Two Concerts

We looked in on one such concert yesterday, and also we saw another where punched tickets were as scarce as hen's teeth and where the speculation as to how much money the "house" represented ranged from $20,000 to $25,000. But that was an unusual affair, though it illustrated another phase of the change which is taking place.

It was a combination concert, in which three factors coöperated, each one of which singly and alone might have drawn at least one-fifth of the amount at normal prices, while at this gala meeting the prices were quadrupled.

This occasion was the concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last night for the benefit of the Vacation Association, in which the Boston Orchestra, Paderewski and Kreisler were combined, and which was as brilliant as an artistic and social function as it was as a financial undertaking.

With two of its aspects we have nothing to do, and of the third it is possible to speak with brevity because of the familiarity of its manifestations, but not without enthusiasm, for that was challenged by nearly every one of its features.

Similar Concert Given

There was an affair of almost the same artistic magnitude last week when the Philadelphia Orchestra played at Carnegie Hall, with Josef Hofmann and Mr. Kreisler as special attractions; but at this philanthropy played no part, and the music was largely permitted to make its own appeal, though the aid of social influence was also invoked.

These two concerts, however, were distinctly out of the ordinary course of events, though we have cited them as illustrating one of the phases which we have set down as marking a change in the manner of concert giving. The smaller combinations were commented on before the breathing spell which the holiday season brought with it came.

Yesterday three foreign artists gave a concert in Carnegie Hall. They are not in the class of Bauer-Thibaud, Bauer-Casals, Kreisler-Friedburg, and so on, because they were of one family, and though they exploited themselves as units it was obvious that they have cultivated ensemble playing as a specialty.

Cherniavskys Play

They were the Cherniavskys—Russians—a pianist, violinist and violoncellist, musicians of deservedly good repute abroad, highly trained artists, elegant and finished salon players at least, if nothing else. We fancy they are something better, though their ideals, singly and in unison, seemed yesterday to be circumscribed by the notion that the giving of sensuous pleasure to the average listener is the all-sufficient mission of the musical artist.

To return to the gala concert at the Metropolitan Opera House; there were hundreds, perhaps thousands, to whom it was as much an inspiration as it was an unusual sensation. The society folk in the boxes and orchestra stalls, who paid extraordinary prices, were not so impressive a sight as the hundreds of "vacation girls" who crowded all the standing room on the main floor and top gallery and paid $2 each for the privilege of hearing what the old-fashioned agent would have called "the great aggregation" play. Dr. Muck chose pieces for the orchestra which were all calculated to let its virtuoso

---

...the overture to "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and the first Rumanian Rhapsody of Enesco, but the great popular interest centred in the playing of Paderewski and Kreisler.

The latter was not in his finest fettle in the Mendelssohn concerto, which was somewhat nervously played, as disclosed by restless tempi and occasional lapses from just intonation. But the performance of Schumann's pianoforte concerto was a supreme achievement on the part of Mr. Paderewski, as well as Dr. Muck. It was the high water mark of the season's offerings in the concerto field, especially in its exhibition of sympathetic coöperation between the solo performer and the conductor of the orchestra. It was a pure joy.

History Is Recalled

The combination concerts, which have been given with success thus far, bring to mind a bit of ancient history which has also a place in the reflections awakened by the Philharmonic Society's festival week. Seventy years ago Henri Herz was brought to New York by the impresario Ullman. He found here a veteran French pianist named D. G. Etienne, one of the founders of the Philharmonic Society and the conductor of the overture to "Oberon" at its first concert given seventy-five years ago next April. Other local pianists active in New York at the time were Jules Fontana, one of the few real pupils of Chopin; Scharfenberg and Trimm, whose names loom large in Philharmonic history.

With these three pianists, twelve others of less fame and himself, sixteen men in all, Herz gave a concert at which an arrangement of the overture to "Semiramide" for eight pianofortes, thirty-two hands, made by Czerny to be played by members of the Austrian nobility at a charity concert in Vienna, was performed. What was done seventy years ago might be done on a larger scale now. We have heard solo performances from over fifty pianists thus far this season; there are at least twenty more in the offing. Cannot our managers get together and lump their threatened performances? It would save time and money, and the advertisement would be great.

---

om EVENING SUN

ldress: New York City

ate

Society is interested in the concert to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House under the auspices of the Vacation Association for the benefit of the organization. Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck are to be the chief features.

The concert has an unusual interest for the reason that the Vacation Association has always been very near to the heart of New York society. Hitherto there has never been any difficulty in getting all the money required, but the many demands for contributions for relief abroad have had their effect, and meritorious work at home has been less noticed.

Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Robinson Smith, Mrs. Wendell Baker and Miss Maude Wetmore are among the directors of the association, which has expanded very much beyond its original idea of merely assisting young women to save money for healthful vacation outings, and now has many other interesting activities.

Among the box holders are Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, Mrs. Frances Bacon, Mrs. Charles Freeman, Mrs. Henry Evans, Mrs. N. L. Edgar, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Joseph Duveen, Mrs. J. G. Dreyfus, Miss Terese O'Donohue, Mrs. Charles Ditson, William B. Dillon, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Miss Katherine Davenport, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. James Cushman, Mrs. Frederick Allen, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. M. Hooker, Mrs. James J. Higginson, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Miss Frick, Miss De Forrest and Mrs. Edward Breitung.

EVENING GLOBE

s: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A notable concert will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, in aid of the Vacation Association of this city. The concert will enlist the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck; Mr. Paderewski, and Mr. Kreisler. It will be the first time in twenty-three years that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series.

In the spring of 1893, with Mr. Paderewski as soloist, the orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch, gave a special concert at the Metropolitan Opera House in aid of the fund to build the Washington Arch. Incidentally, Mr. Paderewski played then, as he will Tuesday night, the Schumann concerto, and, curiously enough, he had not played that concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since that occasion until the Christmas concerts of the orchestra this season. The programme is as follows:

Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; concerto for piano, Schumann; solos for violin; "Capriccio Espagnol," Rimsky-Korsakoff; solos for piano.

---

ress: Providence, R. I.

Boton Symphony Orchetra

Under the masterly direction of Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented their third concert of the season at Infantry Hall last evening to an unusually good sized audience. Throughout the concert the players' response to the direction of Dr. Muck was spontaneous and they carried off the honors for the best work of the season thus far.

The soloist, Miss Irma Seydel, the charming American violin virtuoso, pleased with a delicate, yet fiery rendition of Saint-Saens' concerto for the violin in B-flat Major. She was well and deservedly received.

The concert itself was comprehensive and wholly interesting, but was nothing (except Chabrier's Espana) that would lead the neophyte up the stairs of masterly appreciation of symphonic compositions by reason of its heavy effect. This was particularly so in Frank's symphony in D-minor.

The following program constitutes the concert:

Symphony in D-minor .....Franck
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo
Overture to "Euryanthe" .....Weber
Concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61.....Saint-Saens
I. Allegra non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro no troppo.
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra.....
..... Chabrier

It is well known what a storm of protest the rendition of Frank's symphony evoked and the denial of the critics of its intrinsic worth or its merit as a symphonic composition. The only thing that seemed to be the trouble with the critics then (about a century ago) was that they perhaps did not realize that there was such a thing as a new form, a new style in the composition of a symphony. Frank believed there was and throughout his life he wrote more beautiful and original movements than probably any other man of his time. The first movement to his symphony has a colorful swing to it which hardens later and modulates by turns, making a whole that is at once agreeable to the ear and soothing to the nerves.

More familiar is Weber's overature to "Euryanthe" which was played with skill and nervous energy. The orchestra seemed imbued with something last evening which inspired it to better work than has been heard in many months. There was perfect unison and co-ordination of instruments, the wind and reed instruments and viols blending together in harmonious and pleasuably colorful work.

Miss Seydel played Saint-Saen's work with a technic that one would expect only in one of mature years. Her bow work was particularly brilliant, especially in the third movement which required work that would tax the art of the celebrated virtuosos. She was a pupil of C. M. Leoffler.

The music more readily understood by the majority was perhaps Chabrien's "Espana," a rapid-fire piece that smacks of Spain and her famous dances. In fact Chabrier admits that he was inspired through this concept. It was delightfully rendered by the orchestra.

---

om EVENING WORLD

ldress: New York City

ate

A remarkable gala concert is announced for the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening in aid of the Vacation Association. It will enlist the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler. It will be the first time in twenty-three years that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series. In the spring of 1893, with Mr. Paderewski as soloist, the Orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera House in aid of the fund to build the Washington Arch. Incidentally, Mr. Paderewski played then, as he will on Tuesday night, the Schumann concerto, and, curiously enough, he had not played this concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since that time until the Christmas concerts of the Orchestra this season.

The New York City Orchestra, assisted by Carrie Bridewell and Alfred Newman as soloists and by a chorus of 1,000, will give a free concert at the City College to-night.

---

rom TRIBUNE

ddress: New York City

A concert will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening for the benefit of the Vacation Association. Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear. Among those who have taken tickets are Mrs. Arthur Murray Dodge, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Henry F. Davison, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. August Belmont Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan and Clarence H. Mackay.

AMERICAN

ss: New York City

RECORD CROWD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra, Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler Excel in Vacation Benefit at the Metropolitan—Receipts Total $25,000

By MAX SMITH.

FOR the first time in the history of the organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leaving its haunts on Fifty-seventh street, played last night in the Metropolitan Opera House.

That in itself was an item interesting enough. With two such luminaries as Fritz Kreisler and Ignaz Paderewski to exert their individual persuasions on the public, this gala concert for the benefit of the Vacation Association attracted a vast throng. Information came from official sources that the gross box office receipts reached the record sum of $23,000, and that the sale of programmes at 50 cents brought in an additional $2,000.

From a musical point of view, the concert proved to be thoroughly enjoyable, though inordinately long; but it offered nothing novel save the opportunity of hearing Dr. Muck and his virtuoso band in new surroundings.

Needless to say that the purely orchestral contributions, which included Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine in A major, opus 11, No. 1, were performed with great finish and brilliancy.

However, one could not help harking back to the notable interpretation—technically less perfect, perhaps, but far more tense and stirring—which Strauss's tone poem received in the same auditorium under Arturo Toscanini's vitalizing baton. In comparing the two readings one might say that Dr. Muck's stood in much the same ratio to the Italian conductor's as the scholarly Wilhelm Gericke's (former conductor of the Boston Orchestra) to Dr. Muck's.

Fritz Kreisler elected to play Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor; Ignaz Paderewski had chosen Schumann's A minor concerto for the principal vehicle of his art. Both musicians, however, were heard also in a group of solo pieces, which, of course, had to be supplemented with various encores.

The famous Polish pianist had occasion, as so often happens in his case, togive a little exhibition of nerves. He made emphatic gestures in the direction of the prompter's box immediately before and after the first movement of the concerto, but no one seemed to know whether a draught or some zoological intruder (say a rat or a cat) was bothering him.

Inquiry subsequently elicited the information that two gum-chewing boys, with disconcertingly mobile jaws, had caused all the excitement.

"Had this happened in 'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks,'" said Paderewski laughingly to Dr. Muck afterwards, "there would have been no reason for complaints. But those two grimacing faces at my feet in Schumann's concerto! No, that was too much."

TIMES

ess: Washington, D. C.

SOCIETY AT CONCERT

Distinguished Company Attend Recital at Playhouse.

A distinguished company attended the very charming recital given at the Playhouse yesterday afternoon by Mrs. George Peabody Eustis and the Boston Quartet. The concert is one of the series of four chamber music concerts Mrs. Eustis has arranged, the proceeds of which will go to the Emergency Hospital, the Home for Incurables and Noel House.

Among those at the recital were Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, Mrs. F. B. Moran, Mrs. Abraham Garrison McClintock, Mrs. George Barnett, Mrs. Eveleth E. Whiting, Mrs. Larkin Glazebrook, Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. William Ritter, Mrs. Richard Harlow, Miss Catherine Harlow, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mrs. Gillett Hill, Mrs. Joseph E. Thropp, Mrs. Howe Totten, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Wilcox, Miss Bessie Hickey and George Peabody Eustis.

---

om EVENING SUN

dress: New York City

te

There was a large sum realized for the Vacation Association fund on the success of the concert held at the Metropolitan Opera House last night for the benefit of that organization. Paderewski and Kreisler were the principal artists, and they were assisisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. There was an interesting audience present.

From the Transcript Jan. 18, 1917.

Mr. Ballantine's New Tone-Poem for Symphony Hall—Miss Seydel, Mme. Stutzkow-Ryder and Mr. Williams—Items and Announcements

ON the programme for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, between Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the overture and the Venusberg music from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," stands a new symphonic poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," written by Edward Ballantine, resident of Boston and instructor at Harvard. Keats's like-named poem stirred the composer to his music and by a singular coincidence, at the concert of Saturday evening, it will actually be heard on the eve of St. Agnes's day—Jan. 21 by the ecclesiastical calender. Hitherto no piece from Mr. Ballantine's hand has been played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston, but his prelude to Mr. Hagedorn's play, "The Delectable Forest," was included in a concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Dec. 10, 1914, and is announced for performance by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 2 and 3 next. The present piece was finished in the summer of 1914 when the composer was working at the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough. While Keats's familiar poem suggested the course of the music, it does not cling to the text, though at the beginning in particular it contains definitely descriptive passages.

A note that Mr. Ballantine has courteously written for The Transcript outlines the music as follows: "The symphonic poem begins in E-flat major with a tremolo in the strings suggestive of the snow and cold. The theme of St. Agnes Eve is announced in the bass clarinet. The horns then take part of the theme of St. Agnes Eve harmonized with a succession of chords which form the motive of the Magic Spell. The 'cellos now return to the opening theme and are followed by the theme of prayer in the wood-wind. The harp and celesta, soon joined by flute, play a variant of the theme of St. Agnes Eve and the motive of the Magic Spell. Then comes a passage beginning in F-sharp minor for strings in which the theme of prayer is used to typify the sorrows of the ancient Beadsman. A little later the theme of the Eve of St. Agnes is presented in chorale form pianissimo in the high registers.

"Then the 'silver snarling trumpets' begin to 'chide' allegro D major. This trumpet motive stands for the 'Hyence foemen' and the revelry in the castle. The revelry continues until the theme of Madeline appears in the strings, a major Andante Espressimo. The theme of The Magic Spell follows with a hint of Porphyro's theme in the oboe and English horn. After a transition the theme of Porphyro enters 'Energico' in trumpets and strings, a theme in three parts—heroic, playful, thoughtful. The theme of The Magic Spell is sounded by the trombones, while celesta and strings give a reminiscence of the theme of Madeline.

"The middle portion of the symphonic poem is supposed to represent in general a conflict between Porphyro and his foes, and his struggles toward the winning of Madeline. The success and triumph of Porphyro are denoted by the St. Agnes Eve theme in chorale form for brass fortissimo, followed by his own theme in C major for full orchestra; and then, very quietly, by Madeline's theme, also in C major. The rest of the piece is an orchestral love song based on the previous themes. Near the end the strings resume the tremolo suggestive of the snowstorm outside, while the main motives are heard quietly in E-flat major."

EVENING
From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

Date JAN 11 17

Benefiz-Vorstellung gewaltiger Erfolg.

Die Ergebnisse des gestrigen Konzerts des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters im Metropolitan Opernhause zum besten des Ferien-Fonds für arbeitende Mädchen ist über alle Erwartungen groß ausgefallen. Der Ertrag übersteigt die Summe von $25,000, wovon allein $2000 durch den Verkauf von Programmen aufgebracht wurden. Das Orchester stand unter der bewährten Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck. Als Solisten wirkten Ignaz Paderewski und Fritz Kreisler mit, zwei Künstler, die Meister ihres Instrumentes sind. Die Darbietungen wurden von dem das Haus bis auf den letzten Platz füllenden Publikum mit Enthusiasmus aufgenommen.

---

om EVENING POST

dress: New York City

te

A number of artists, among them being Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take part in the concert which will be given this evening in the Metropolitan Opera House 884 for the benefit of the Vacation Association. Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Miss Anne T. Morgan, and Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith have arranged the affair. Nearly all of the regular boxholders at the Metropolitan have retained their boxes for the occasion.

[68]

From LIFE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date AUG 3 1917

THERE was a judicious combination of the classic with the modern in the program which Dr. Muck arranged for the third of the regular subscriptions of the Boston Orchestra in the Academy Friday evening. To begin there was the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, that delightful little symphony that sings the purest joy in life, and to close the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Between and of the moderns were the Second Piano Concerto of the Russian Rachmaninoff with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist and Borodin's interesting but unimportant orchestral sketch, "on the Steppes of Middle Asia."

ONE likes to dwell upon the F Major Symphony. It was composed within a very few months during the summer of 1812, an unusual feat for Beethoven who was notoriously a slow and careful worker. Indeed, the theme of the Allegretto apparently sprang full-panoplied from the brain of the modern Jove, for there are no traces of its devlopment in the sketch-books. The thematic material of the other movements was, it is true, the result of more careful effort, but even it shows meagerly in the sketch-book, when compared with those of the rest of the symphonies. The entire work is that of the boisterous, fun-loving Beethoven. It is the expression of a Rabelaisian humor that teems with the virility that Beethoven possessed above all other composers. It is remarkable that this symphony should be so joyous, for at this time in the composer's life he was much disturbed by the unfortunate connection that his brother Ludwig had entered into with Therese Obermeyer. We know that he left Teplitz where he had been spending the summer of 1812 to go to Linz on the Danube for the particular purpose of breaking off the attachment, and that in order to carry out the plans which he believed to be for the best interests of his brother and the family he even went so far as to come to blows with Ludwig, after all attempts to drive the lady from the city by means of the authorities had failed. He was checkmated in his scheme, however, and the object of his wrath married Ludwig the following December. In spite of the family trouble and in spite of the deafness which had now become complete, there is little but the most extravagant humor in the composition, though some traces of a Titan rage may be marked in the first and final movements.

THE use of the minuet instead of the scherzo also marks a difference between this symphony and its predecessors. Whether the movement so marked should be played slowly or not has been a ground of contention. Wagner in his essay on the conducting of the Beethoven symphonies is in favor of a comparatively slow tempo, but there may have been some spite in this opinion inasmuch as Mendelssohn was in the habit of giving it a more rapid reading and Wagner in his antipathy may have stultified himself to this extent in order to hit at a man he disliked, a not remote hypothesis as the younger man never lost an opportunity to hit at an opponent. The probability is that Mendelssohn was correct in his reading. The spirit of the entire work argues for the more rapid tempo in the minuet, for the more rapid tempo more accurately depicts the humor that fills the symphony's every measure.

THE date of the publication is a significant one. Between the eighth and its successor, the Choral Symphony, is a stretch of eleven years, during which the composer turned to other forms of composition. That he was far from idle is attested by the quantity of compositions that in the interim were given to the world. The opus number of the Eighth is "93"; that of the Ninth "125"; between them were composed the Missa Solennis, sonatas, songs, overtures and quartets. In this time the composer was busy, but apparently he had grown tired of the form which he had developed to the full and felt the need of other fields to conquer.

DR. MUCK'S conducting of the work Friday evening discovered the spirit of Beethoven, the arch-humorist of music, and poured forth for the delectation of his hearers all the music's boisterous mirth. With the exception of the compositions of Brahms, the conductor of the Boston band is most at home in the works of Beethoven. Their every performance is a labor of love, to which he brings a profound musicianship and sound knowledge of the Beethoven tradition, a knowledge that is only too often lacking these days and the lack of which sometimes results in curious distortions of the spirit of Beethoven's symphonies. That part of the orchestra that was used in the performance (the trombones have nothing to do) as usual met every demand composer and conductor laid upon it, with the result that the composition received a reading that we are likely to meet with but seldom.

TURNING to the moderns Dr. Muck regaled us with the oriental beauties of the Borodin score, in which the woodwinds had full scope for the manifestation of their peculiar color and then with Gabrilowitsch made of the Rachmaninoff Concerto, one of the most significant compositions of its kind that has been vouchsafed us in many a year. This work, unlike its predecessor, is of real beauty and goes far to confute the statement made recently by a writer of considerable prominence on musical affairs that Rachmaninoff is a composer of only mediocre ability.

DR. MUCK took the "Euryanthe" overture at an amazing pace. When Toscanini conducted the revival of the opera two years ago at the Metropolitan he made a glorious "tour de force" of the overture which has been heard so much in our concert halls but so little in its operatic connection, and orchestras have always enjoyed doing it as a stunt of virtuosity; but the writer has never heard it more brilliantly nor he believes more in the spirit of Weber's conception than last Friday evening. The brilliant score glittered under Dr. Muck's baton while the technical difficulties fled before the skill of his men. The deep contrast of the slow intermezzo —a later idea of the composer—on the other hand was uncannily magical with its slowly shifting, mysterious harmonies.

EVENING TELEGRAM
ess: New York City
JAN 17 1917

The sum of $25,000 was raised for the Vacation Association at a benefit performance at the Metropolitan Opera House. Orchestra seats sold for $10 and others in proportion, but there was not a vacant seat in the house, and the standing room was all taken. The musical programme was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Paderewski and Kreisler. The benefit was arranged by Miss Anne Morgan, treasurer of the Vacation Association; Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, and Mrs. Wendell Baker, vice president.

The programme opened with Dr. Karl Muck conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the playing of Smetana's "Bartered Bride." It was concluded with piano solos and encores by Paderewski. Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor and other violin solos. Both artists received a great ovation, as did the orchestra. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine" were played by the orchestra.

The Metropolitan's stage cat entered unexpectedly into the programme as Mr. Paderewski was about to open his concerto. With the best of intentions, but to the great annoyance of the pianist and the evident amusement of Dr. Muck, the animal, that makes its home beneath the stage, crawled up through the prompter's box just to prove that a cat can look at a great pianist.

Mr. Paderewski scowled. Dr. Muck smiled. Anton Wittek, concert master, jabbed the intruder with the bow of his violin, but all to no avail. Pussy, snuggled comfortably among the unused footlights, purred through the three movements of the concerto.

Miss Morgan enjoyed the music from box No. 8 with Mr. and Mrs. Ernesto G. Fabbri and Mr. Gaston Liebert, Consul General of France in New York, among her guests. The group in another parterre box included Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Miss Mabel Beardsley and Miss Miriam Oliver, who are directors of the association.

Others in the boxes were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, whose guests were Mr. and Mrs. S. R. Guggenheim and the Duchesse de Chaulnes; the Misses Edith and Maude K. Wetmore, in box No. 14; Mrs. Wendell Baker and a party, in box No. 24; Mrs. Joseph Harriman, Mr. and Mrs. Cyril Hatch and Miss Jane B. Wallach, in box No. 6; Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Iselin, in box No. 42; Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Breitung and Miss Maria de Barril, in box No. 29; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, with guests, in box No. 11; Mrs. Whitney Warren and Mr. and Mrs. William Greenough, in box No. 16; Mr. and Mrs. William Pierson Hamilton and Mr. and Mrs. John Dyneley Prince, in box No. 18, and Mme. Gatti-Casazza and Miss Susan Fish Dresser, in box No. 48.

Others present were Mr. and Mrs. Newbold Leroy Edgar, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. James F. D. Lanier, Mr. and Mrs. Walter E. Maynard, Mrs. James Speyer, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Charles Develle Lathrop, Miss Vera A. H. Cravath, Mr. and Mrs. Karrick Rigga, Miss Pauline Riggs, Mr. Charles M. Robinson, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. William P. Douglas, Mrs. W. Storrs Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Iselin, Miss Louise M. Iselin, Mr. and Mrs. William Ayrault Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Gordon Norrie, Mrs. Richard V. Lindabury, Miss Marion Hollins, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hastings, Mr. Frederick H. Allen, the Misses Barbara and Joan Allen, Mrs. Cadwalader Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rathbone Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Belmont and Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont,

SUN
ess: New York City
JAN 14 19

With an array of distinguished artists, including Paderewski, Kreisler and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, there is every promise of a large and brilliant audience at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday night for the concert to be given under the auspices of the Vacation Association for the benefit of that organization. Mrs. August Belmont, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and other women of prominence are actively interested in the welfare of this association, and the proceeds of the concert will be used to carry on its welfare work.

Among those who have subscribed for boxes and seats are Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. John Greenough, Mrs. Albert Goodhart, Mrs. E. C. B. Gardner, Mrs. Edmond Guggenheim, Mrs. E. V. Frothingham, Mrs. Selden Bacon, Mrs. William Cummings, Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Alfred Cook, Mrs. Washington E. Conner, Mrs. Horace Hill, Miss Alice P. Converse, Mrs. Rogers Bacon, E. A. Coffin, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Stephen Clark, Mrs. William T. Carrington, Miss Mary Cass Canfield, George Blumenthal, Miss Blodgett, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. W. H. Walker, Mrs. Maurice Kosminski, Mrs. Newcomb Carlton, C. W. Watson, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, William Salomon, Arthur Ryle, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan and Miss Anne Morgan.

EVENING JOURNAL
ss: New York City.
JAN 17 1917

PADEREWSKI AND KREISLER PLAY AT BENEFIT

One of those prodigious feasts of music which only a mental digestion assuredly struthionic could possibly assimilate was spread before some thousands of the omnivorous at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The management of the Vacation Association, to raise funds for its charitable work, offered this Brobdignagian repast, bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler together to provide it.

This program was not designed for the edification of the cognoscenti, but to draw the multitude, and it succeeded in its purpose. No extended spilling of critical comment is necessary. The Boston Orchestra began the lengthy proceedings with the overture to "The Bartered Bride," and after Mr. Kreisler had played the Mendelssohn concerto with a tender regard for such superficial beauties as it possesses, the orchestra played its virtuoso tricks with Richard Strauss's tricksy "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Paderewski followed Strauss, whose symphonic rondo rather puzzled this audience. He played the Schumann concerto, in which he has not been heard in New York in a considerable time. At his hands this lovely music of the arch-romanticist became utterly lyric expression. There were few times when the pianist considered it necessary to play more ponderously than forte. And frequently, especially in the first movement, the concerto spoke with a sob only half repressed.

The concert continued with a number of those short pieces of Mr. Kreisler, beloved of all—when not heard too often; the first of the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Georges Enesco, and Mr. Paderewski bringing matters to a conclusion with a number of short pieces for the piano alone.

There was an avalanche of applause for everything and everybody concerned in this evening of much music, and especially so, perhaps, for Mr. Paderewski.

SUN
ess: New York City

$25,000 IS RAISED FOR VACATION FUND

Elaborate Programme Presented in Concert to Aid Working Girls.

More than $25,000 was raised last night at the gala concert given at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the vacation fund in aid of working girls. An official statement quoted these figures, which include $2,000 realized from the sale of programmes alone.

The programme, an elaborate one, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conductor, as well as Ignace Paderewski, pianist, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloists. The orchestra played Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine" in A major.

During the first half of the programme Mr. Kreisler gave a performance of the Mendelssohn violin concerto and Mr. Paderewski of Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte. Following the intermission and before and after the Enesco number each solo artist gave a group of solos. The entire performance was received with enthusiasm by an audience that filled the house.

Among the boxholders were Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Miss Caro De Forest, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Henry Payne Whitney, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. George Whelan, Mrs. Henry C. Frick, Mrs. C. Robinson Smith, Mrs. W. Pierson Hamilton, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Frederick H. Allen, Mrs. Henry Clews, Miss Katherine C. Blodgett, Mrs. Charles W. Watson, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. Newbold Le Roy Edgar, Mrs. Arthur Ryle, Augustus C. Gurnee, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. Edward Guggenheim, Miss Terese O'Donohue, William Salomon, Mme. Paderewski, Mrs. Maurice Kozminski, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Edward N. Breitung, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. D. W. R. Dickerman and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt.

om STAATS-ZEITUNG
dress: New York City
te JAN 17 19

Das Konzert.

Der Kritiker hätte es leicht, wenn es lauter Konzerte gäbe wie das gestrige Abendkonzert im Metropolitan, das die Bostoner Meisterspieler, Paderewski und Kreisler ins Treffen führte, und zwar in einem Programm, dessen Länge nur durch die Größe des Gebotenen gerechtfertigt werden konnte. In einem solchen Fall muß die Kritik die Waffen strecken, und der, welcher die eindrucksvollsten und blumigsten Epitheta für gewaltige Darbietungen finden könnte, wäre der beste Referent.

Die gestrige Veranstaltung soll auch nicht kritisiert werden. Wozu auch? Man weiß, was die gestrigen Erfolgsfaktoren bedeuten, was sie leisten können! Ein jeder für sich allein ist eine garantierte Anziehungskraft, deren Wirkung so sicher ist als bares Geld — die Bostoner unter Dr. Muck, der berühmte Pianist und der nicht minder berühmte Violinist, die gestern noch dazu in größter Verfassung sich befanden. Man braucht daher nur die einzelnen Nummern des, wie gesagt, gigantischen Programms herzusetzen, und wer nicht dabei war, wird sich einen lebhaften Begriff von den künstlerischen Genüssen machen, die gestern so freigebig vorgesetzt wurden.

Dr. Muck dirigirte an der Spitze seines in lauterer Klangpracht schimmernden Virtuosen-Orchesters die „Verkaufte Braut"-Ouverture von Smetana, Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel", und die „Rumänische Rhapsodie" von Enescu. Kreisler spielte das Mendelssohn'sche Violinkonzert mit Orchesterbegleitung mit unsagbarem Schmelz und Virtuosität und brillierte auch in einer Reihe kleinerer Kompositionen, lauter Perlen in dem reichen Schatz seines Repertoires. Paderewski brachte das Schumann'sche A Moll-Pianokonzert zu ganz gewaltiger Wirkung und bezauberte in einigen kleineren Kompositionen. Alle Mitwirkende brachten das Publikum bis zur Siedehitze der Begeisterung. Das Metropolitan, das wegen der Eleganz und der Toiletten- und Juwelen-Pracht berühmt ist, hat nicht häufig eine so erlesene Versammlung gesehen, als es gestern der Fall war. Alle Notabilitäten in Politik, Handel, Industrie, Beamtenwelt und Kunst schienen sich da ein Stelldichein gegeben zu haben. Billig waren die Preise nicht, da der Orchestersitz 10 Dollars kostete, und die Logen $100, aber frei war auch nicht das allerkleinste Plätzchen, und im Stehparterre stauten sich die Leute förmlich. Dem wohltätigen Zweck — der Reinertrag galt der „Vacation Association" — muß ein ungemein reicher Betrag zugeflossen sein.

m MORNING TELEGRAPH
dress: New York City
JAN 14 1917
e

The Vacation Fund Concert.

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House next Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year, and C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, promises that it will be another twenty-three years before the orchestra comes to New York to give another special concert.

n STAATS-ZEITUNG
ress: New York City
JAN 7 1917

Konzerte.

Die Bostoner boten uns auch in ihrem gestrigen Nachmittagskonzert in Carnegie Hall ganz erlesen Schönes. Die Webersche „Euryanthe"-Ouverture habe ich nicht häufig so wundervoll ausgelegt und virtuos gespielt bewundern können, und in der Haydn'schen C-Moll-Symphonie warb Mucks Dirigentenstab um Sympathien und Freunde mit allem Zauber der lieblichsten Ueberredungskunst, und das Orchester prangte in herrlichster Leichtigkeit und Feinheit. Wohl den größten Erfolg aber bedeutete die selten gehörte Tschaikowskysche D-Moll-Suite, op. 43, nicht sowohl wegen der Qualitäten des Werkes als wegen der einfach bestrickend graziösen und meisterhaften Ausführung durch das Orchester. Das Publikum, welches Carnegie Hall bis auf das letzte Plätzchen dicht besetzt hielt, bereitete den Gästen einen rauschenden Erfolg.

[69]

LIFE

From

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

THERE was a judicious combination of the classic with the modern in the program which Dr. Muck arranged for the third of the regular subscriptions of the Boston Orchestra in the Academy Friday evening. To begin there was the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, that delightful little symphony that sings the purest joy in life, and to close the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Between and of the moderns were the Second Piano Concerto of the Russian Rachmaninoff with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist and Borodin's interesting but unimportant orchestral sketch, "on the Steppes of Middle Asia."

ONE likes to dwell upon the F Major Symphony. It was composed within a very few months during the summer of 1812, an unusual feat for Beethoven who was notoriously a slow and careful worker. Indeed, the theme of the Allegretto apparently sprang full-panoplied from the brain of the modern Jove, for there are no traces of its development in the sketch-books. The thematic material of the other movements was, it is true, the result of more careful effort, but even it shows meagerly in the sketch-book, when compared with those of the rest of the symphonies. The entire work is that of the boisterous, fun-loving Beethoven. It is the expression of a Rabelaisian humor that teems with the virility that Beethoven possessed above all other composers. It is remarkable that this symphony should be so joyous, for at this time in the composer's life he was much disturbed by the unfortunate connection that his brother Ludwig had entered into with Therese Obermeyer. We know that he left Teplitz where he had been spending the summer of 1812 to go to Linz on the Danube for the particular purpose of breaking off the attachment, and that in order to carry out the plans which he believed to be for the best interests of his brother and the family he even went so far as to come to blows with Ludwig, after all attempts to drive the lady from the city by means of the authorities had failed. He was checkmated in his scheme, however, and the object of his wrath married Ludwig the following December. In spite of the family trouble and in spite of the deafness which had now become complete, there is little but the most extravagant humor in the composition, though some traces of a Titan rage may be marked in the first and final movements.

THE use of the minuet instead of the scherzo also marks a difference between this symphony and its predecessors. Whether the movement so marked should be played slowly or not has been a ground of contention. Wagner in his essay on the conducting of the Beethoven symphonies is in favor of a comparatively slow tempo, but there may have been some spite in this opinion inasmuch as Mendelssohn was in the habit of giving it a more rapid reading and Wagner in his antipathy may have stultified himself to this extent in order to hit at a man he disliked, a not remote hypothesis as the younger man never lost an opportunity to hit at an opponent. The probability is that Mendelssohn was correct in his reading. The spirit of the entire work argues for the more rapid tempo in the minuet, for the more rapid tempo more accurately depicts the humor that fills the symphony's every measure.

THE date of the publication is a significant one. Between the eighth and its successor, the Choral Symphony, is a stretch of eleven years, during which the composer turned to other forms of composition. That he was far from idle is attested by the quantity of compositions that in the interim were given to the world. The opus number of the Eighth is "93"; that of the Ninth "125"; between them were composed the Missa Solemnis, sonatas, songs overtures and quartets. In this time the composer was busy, but apparently he had grown tired of the form which he had developed to the full and felt the need of other fields to conquer.

DR. MUCK'S conducting of the work Friday evening discovered the spirit of Beethoven, the arch-humorist of music, and poured forth for the delectation of his hearers all the music's boisterous mirth. With the exception of the compositions of Brahms, the conductor of the Boston band is most at home in the works of Beethoven. Their every performance is a labor of love, to which he brings a profound musicianship and sound knowledge of the Beethoven tradition, a knowledge that is only too often lacking these days and the lack of which sometimes results in curious distortions of the spirit of Beethoven's symphonies. That part of the orchestra that was used in the performance (the trombones have nothing to do) as usual met every demand composer and conductor laid upon it, with the result that the composition received a reading that we are likely to meet with but seldom.

TURNING to the moderns Dr. Muck regaled us with the oriental beauties of the Borodin score, in which the woodwinds had full scope for the manifestation of their peculiar color and then with Gabrilowitsch made of the Rachmaninoff Concerto, one of the most significant compositions of its kind that has been vouchsafed us in many a year. This work, unlike its predecessor, is of real beauty and goes far to confute the statement made recently by a writer of considerable prominence on musical affairs that Rachmaninoff is a composer of only mediocre ability.

DR. MUCK took the "Euryanthe" overture at an amazing pace. When Toscanini conducted the revival of the opera two years ago at the Metropolitan he made a glorious "tour de force" of the overture which has been heard so much in our concert halls but so little in its operatic connection, and orchestras have always enjoyed doing it as a stunt of virtuosity; but the writer has never heard it more brilliantly nor he believes more in the spirit of Weber's conception than last Friday evening. The brilliant score glittered under Dr. Muck's baton while the technical difficulties fled before the skill of his men. The deep contrast of the slow intermezzo —a later idea of the composer—on the other hand was uncannily magical with its slowly shifting, mysterious harmonies.

EVENING TELEGRAM

ess: New York City

JAN 17 1917

The sum of $25,000 was raised for the Vacation Association at a benefit performance at the Metropolitan Opera House. Orchestra seats sold for $10 and others in proportion, but there was not a vacant seat in the house, and the standing room was all taken. The musical programme was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Paderewski and Kreisler. The benefit was arranged by Miss Anne Morgan, treasurer of the Vacation Association; Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, and Mrs. Wendell Baker, vice president.

The programme opened with Dr. Karl Muck conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the playing of Smetana's "Bartered Bride." It was concluded with piano solos and encores by Paderewski. Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor and other violin solos. Both artists received a great ovation, as did the orchestra. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine" were played by the orchestra.

The Metropolitan's stage cat entered unexpectedly into the programme as Mr. Paderewski was about to open his concerto. With the best of intentions, but to the great anonyance of the pianist and the evident amusement of Dr. Muck, the animal, that makes its home beneath the stage, crawled up through the prompter's box just to prove that a cat can look at a great pianist.

Mr. Paderewski scowled. Dr. Muck smiled. Anton Wittek, concert master, jabbed the intruder with the bow of his violin, but all to no avail. Pussy, snuggled comfortably among the unused footlights, purred through the three movements of the concerto.

Miss Morgan enjoyed the music from box No. 8 with Mr. and Mrs. Ernesto G. Fabbri and Mr. Gaston Liebert, Consul General of France in New York, among her guests. The group in another parterre box included Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Miss Mabel Beardsley and Miss Miriam Oliver, who are directors of the association.

Others in the boxes were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, whose guests were Mr. and Mrs. S. R. Guggenheim and the Duchesse de Chaulnes; the Misses Edith and Maude K. Wetmore, in box No. 14; Mrs. Wendell Baker and a party, in box No. 24; Mrs. Joseph Harriman, Mr. and Mrs. Cyril Hatch and Miss Jane B. Wallach, in box No. 6; Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Iselin, in box No. 42; Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Breitung and Miss Maria de Barril, in box No. 29; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, with guests, in box No. 11; Mrs. Whitney Warren and Mr. and Mrs. William Greenough, in box No. 16; Mr. and Mrs. William Pierson Hamilton and Mr. and Mrs. John Dyneley Prince, in box No. 18, and Mme. Gatti-Casazza and Miss Susan Fish Dresser, in box No. 48.

Others present were Mr. and Mrs. Newbold Leroy Edgar, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. James F. D. Lanier, Mr. and Mrs. Walter E. Maynard, Mrs. James Speyer, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Charles Develio Lathrop, Miss Vera A. H. Cravath, Mr. and Mrs. Karrick Riggs, Miss Pauline Riggs, Mr. Charles M. Robinson, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. William P. Douglas, Mrs. W. Storrs Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Iselin, Miss Louise M. Iselin, Mr. and Mrs. William Ayrault Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Gordon Norrie, Mrs. Richard V. Lindabury, Miss Marion Hollins, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hastings, Mr. Frederick H. Allen, the Misses Barbara and Joan Allen, Mrs. Cadwalader Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rathbone Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Belmont and Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont.

SUN

ess: New York City

With an array of distinguished artists, including Paderewski, Kreisler and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, there is every promise of a large and brilliant audience at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday night for the concert to be given under the auspices of the Vacation Association for the benefit of that organization. Mrs. August Belmont, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and other women of prominence are actively interested in the welfare of this association, and the proceeds of the concert will be used to carry on its welfare work.

Among those who have subscribed for boxes and seats are Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. John Greenough, Mrs. Albert Goodhart, Mrs. E. C. B. Gardner, Mrs. Edmond Guggenheim, Mrs. E. V. Frothingham, Mrs. Selden Bacon, Mrs. William Cummings, Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. Alfred Cook, Mrs. Washington E. Conner, Mrs. Horace Hill, Miss Alice P. Converse, Mrs. Rogers Bacon, E. A. Coffin, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Stephen Clark, Mrs. William T. Carrington, Miss Mary Cass Canfield, George Blumenthal, Miss Blodgett, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. W. H. Walker, Mrs. Maurice Kosminski, Mrs. Newcomb Carlton, C. W. Watson, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, William Salomon, Arthur Ryle, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan and Miss Anne Morgan.

[69]

EVENING JOURNAL

ss: New York City.

PADEREWSKI AND KREISLER PLAY AT BENEFIT

One of those prodigious feasts of music which only a mental digestion assuredly struthionic could possibly assimilate was spread before some thousands of the omnivorous at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The management of the Vacation Association, to raise funds for its charitable work, offered this Brobdignagian repast, bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler together to provide it.

This program was not designed for the edification of the cognoscenti, but to draw the multitude, and it succeeded in its purpose. No extended spilling of critical comment is necessary. The Boston Orchestra began the lengthy proceedings with the overture to "The Bartered Bride," and after Mr. Kreisler had played the Mendelssohn concerto with a tender regard for such superficial beauties as it possesses, the orchestra played its virtuoso tricks with Richard Strauss's tricksy "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Paderewski followed Strauss, whose symphonic rondo rather puzzled this audience. He played the Schumann concerto, in which he has not been heard in New York in a considerable time. At his hands this lovely music of the arch-romanticist became utterly lyric expression. There were few times when the pianist considered it necessary to play more ponderously than forte. And frequently, especially in the first movement, the concerto spoke with a sob only half repressed.

The concert continued with a number of those short pieces of Mr. Kreisler, beloved of all—when not heard too often; the first of the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Georges Enesco, and Mr. Paderewski bringing matters to a conclusion with a number of short pieces for the piano alone.

There was an avalanche of applause for everything and everybody concerned in this evening of much music, and especially so, perhaps, for Mr. Paderewski.

SUN

ess: New York City

$25,000 IS RAISED FOR VACATION FUND

Elaborate Programme Presented in Concert to Aid Working Girls.

More than $25,000 was raised last night at the gala concert given at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the vacation fund in aid of working girls. An official statement quoted these figures, which include $2,000 realized from the sale of programmes alone.

The programme, an elaborate one, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conductor, as well as Ignace Paderewski, pianist, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloists. The orchestra played Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine" in A major.

During the first half of the programme Mr. Kreisler gave a performance of the Mendelssohn violin concerto and Mr. Paderewski of Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte. Following the intermission and before and after the Enesco number each solo artist gave a group of solos. The entire performance was received with enthusiasm by an audience that filled the house.

Among the boxholders were Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Miss Caro De Forest, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Henry Payne Whitney, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. George Whelan, Mrs. Henry C. Frick, Mrs. C. Robinson Smith, Mrs. W. Pierson Hamilton, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Frederick H. Allen, Mrs. Henry Clews, Miss Katherine C. Blodgett, Mrs. Charles W. Watson, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. Newbold Le Roy Edgar, Mrs. Arthur Ryle, Augustus C. Gurnee, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. Edward Guggenheim, Miss Terese O'Donohue, William Salomon, Mme. Paderewski, Mrs. Maurice Kozminski, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Edward N. Breitung, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. D. W. R. Dickerman and Mrs. W. E. Hooper.

om STAATS-ZEITUNG

ldress: New York City

te JAN 17 19

Gala-Konzert.

Der Kritiker hätte es leicht, wenn es lauter Konzerte gäbe wie das gestrige Abendkonzert im Metropolitan, das die Bostoner Meisterspieler, Paderewski und Kreisler ins Treffen führte, und zwar in einem Programm, dessen Länge nur durch die Größe des Gebotenen gerechtfertigt werden konnte. In einem solchen Fall muß die Kritik die Waffen strecken, und der, welcher die eindrucksvollsten und blumigsten Epitheta für gewaltige Darbietungen finden könnte, wäre der beste Referent.

Die gestrige Veranstaltung soll auch nicht kritisiert werden. Wozu auch? Man weiß, was die gestrigen Erfolgsfaktoren bedeuten, was sie leisten können! Ein jeder für sich allein ist eine garantierte Anziehungskraft, deren Wirkung so sicher ist als bares Geld — die Bostoner unter Dr. Muck, der berühmte Pianist und der nicht minder berühmte Violinist, die gestern noch dazu in größter Verfassung sich befanden. Man braucht daher nur die einzelnen Nummern des, wie gesagt, gigantischen Programms herzusetzen, und wer nicht dabei war, wird sich einen lebhaften Begriff von den künstlerischen Genüssen machen, die gestern so freigebig vorgesetzt wurden.

Dr. Muck dirigirte an der Spitze seines in lauterer Klangpracht schimmernden Virtuosen-Orchesters die „Verkaufte Braut"-Ouverture von Smetana, Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel", und die „Rumänische Rhapsodie" von Enescu. Kreisler spielte das Mendelssohn'sche Violinkonzert mit Orchesterbegleitung mit unsagbarem Schmelz und Virtuosität und brillierte auch in einer Reihe kleinerer Kompositionen, lauter Perlen in dem reichen Schatz seines Repertoires. Paderewski brachte das Schumann'sche A Moll-Pianokonzert zu ganz gewaltiger Wirkung und bezauberte in einigen kleineren Kompositionen. Alle Mitwirkende brachten das Publikum bis zur Siedehitze der Begeisterung. Das Metropolitan, das wegen der Eleganz und der Toiletten- und Juwelen-Pracht berühmt ist, hat nicht häufig eine so erlesene Versammlung gesehen, als es gestern der Fall war. Alle Notabilitäten in Politik, Handel, Industrie, Beamtenwelt und Kunst schienen sich da ein Stelldichein gegeben zu haben. Billig waren die Preise nicht, da der Orchestersitz 10 Dollars kostete, und die Logen $100, aber frei war auch nicht das allerkleinste Plätzchen, und im Stehparterre stauten sich die Leute förmlich. Dem wohltätigen Zweck — der Reinertrag galt der „Vacation Association" — muß ein ungemein reicher Betrag zugeflossen sein.

om MORNING TELEGRAPH

ldress: New York City

te JAN 14 1917

The Vacation Fund Concert.

The gala concert to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House next Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, should break all records in the matter of receipts for concerts if the present prospects are fulfilled. Miss Robinson-Smith, president of the Vacation Association, reports that already the sale has been active. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York this year, and C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, promises that it will be another twenty-three years before the orchestra comes to New York to give another special concert.

n STAATS-ZEITUNG

ress: New York City

JAN 17 1917

Konzerte.

Die Bostoner boten uns auch in ihrem gestrigen Nachmittagskonzert in Carnegie Hall ganz erlesen Schönes. Die Webersche „Euryanthe"-Ouverture habe ich nicht häufig so wundervoll ausgelegt und virtuos gespielt bewundern können, und in der Haydn'schen C-Moll-Symphonie warb Mucks Dirigentenstab um Sympathien und Freunde mit allem Zauber der lieblichsten Ueberredungskunst, und das Orchester prangte in herrlichster Leichtigkeit und Feinheit. Wohl den größten Erfolg aber bedeutete die selten gehörte Tschaikowskysche D-Moll-Suite, op. 43, nicht sowohl wegen der Qualitäten des Werkes als wegen der einfach bestrickend graziösen und meisterhaften Ausführung durch das Orchester. Das Publikum, welches Carnegie Hall bis auf das letzte Plätzchen dicht besetzt hielt, bereitete den Gästen einen rauschenden Erfolg.

EVENING GLOBE
ss: New York City

Music.

Paderewski, Kreisler, and Boston for Charity.

Benefit concerts usually pass without criticism, and the charity has been known to cover, from the point of view of art, quite the proverbial allowance of sins. However, such a concert can benefit the public, and its nature may be such as to make criticism not only proper, but indispensable.

The "gala concert" of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening is a case of point. It was of benefit to the association, of about $25,000 worth of benefit. At the same time it was of benefit to the public—at least to so much of the public as could squeeze into an opera house which groaned its capacity at a ten dollar price scale. The performers were Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed, naturally, by Dr. Muck.

The occasion was notable in the first place because the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played here out of its regular subscription series in nearly twenty-four years. The appearance of either Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Kreisler alone as soloist would have meant much; the appearance of both meant more. Altogether it was one of those occasions which some insist should be marked with a white stone or a red letter, or other emblem of color or non-color.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major of Enesco. Dr. Muck and the orchestra literally set the pace in Smetana's whirlwind overture. I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening!—In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssohn and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifiying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them. I suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Mr. Paderewski's performance in the Schumann concerto (the work, by the way, which he played as soloist at the Washington Arch concert of the Boston orchestra nearly twenty-four years ago) was of the beauty which is peculiar unto him. During the performance of the work the eminent pianist seemed considerably put out by the prompter's box, beside which stood his piano. Dr. Muck, too, though conducting, found time to shake his baton in menacing gesture toward that encumbrance. A sympathetic audience shivered, imaging to itself some pernicious draught out of the hooded cave. It transpired, however, that two urchins solemnly chewing gum under the hood while they took in the performance of Mr. Paderewski and the orchestra were the disturbing factor.

Mr. Kreisler played in splendid form the Mendelssohn concerto, and later delighted the house with a group of the short pieces of which he makes a specialty. At the end of the programme, on a stage now darkened, Mr. Paderewski played Chopin as only he can.

The applause was in tune with a night pitched to superlatives.

PITTS SANBORN.

From the Traveler
Jan.6,1917.

Next Week's Symphony Program.

The first part of Dr. Muck's program for the Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week will be devoted to three works by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, none of which has been heard in Boston. These are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceanides" and "Night-ride and Sunrise." "The Oceanides" was written by Sibelius for the Norfolk, Connecticut, festival of two years ago. The second part will comprise Beethoven's violin concerto and the overture to "Egmont." The solist will be Albert Spalding, who at these concerts is making his first appearance with our Symphony orchestra.

Irma Seydel, violinist, is to be the soloist at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening next, playing Saint-Saens' third concerto.

Fritz Kreisler's program for his concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be:

Suite in E minor	J. S. Bach
Chaconne (for violin alone)	J. S. Bach
Concerto No. 2 in F-sharp minor	Vieuxtemps
Melody in D minor	Gluck
Scherzo in B-flat major	Dittersdorf
La Chasse (Caprice)	Cartier
Larghetto in B-flat major	Weber
Moment Musical	Schubert
Rondo in G major	Mozart
Indian Lament	Dvorak-Kreisler
Three Old Vienna Dances	Kreisler

(1) Liebesleid. (2) Schoen Rosmarin. (3) Liebesfreud.

Paderewski will be the soloist for the Symphony Hall concert on Sunday afternoon Jan. 14.

From the N.Y. Globe
Jan.17,1917.

Music.

Paderewski, Kreisler, and Boston for Charity.

Benefit concerts usually pass without criticism, and the charity has been known to cover, from the point of view of art, quite the proverbial allowance of sins. However, such a concert can benefit the public, and its nature may be such as to make criticism not only proper, but indispensable.

The "gala concert" of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening is a case of point. It was of benefit to the association, of about $25,000 worth of benefit. At the same time it was of benefit to the public—at least to so much of the public as could squeeze into an opera house which groaned its capacity at a ten dollar price scale. The performers were Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed, naturally, by Dr. Muck.

The occasion was notable in the first place because the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played here out of its regular subscription series in nearly twenty-four years. The appearance of either Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Kreisler alone as soloist would have meant much; the appearance of both meant more. Altogether it was one of those occasions which some insist should be marked with a white stone or a red letter, or other emblem of color or non-color.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major of Enesco. Dr. Muck and the orchestra literally set the pace in Smetana's whirlwind overture. I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening!—In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssohn and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifiying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them. I suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Mr. Paderewski's performance in the Schumann concerto (the work, by the way, which he played as soloist at the Washington Arch concert of the Boston orchestra nearly twenty-four years ago) was of the beauty which is peculiar unto him. During the performance of the work the eminent pianist seemed considerably put out by the prompter's box, beside which stood his piano. Dr. Muck, too, though conducting, found time to shake his baton in menacing gesture toward that encumbrance. A sympathetic audience shivered, imaging to itself some pernicious draught out of the hooded cave. It transpired, however, that two urchins solemnly chewing gum under the hood while they took in the performance of Mr. Paderewski and the orchestra were the disturbing factor.

Mr. Kreisler played in splendid form the Mendelssohn concerto, and later delighted the house with a group of the short pieces of which he makes a specialty. At the end of the programme, on a stage now darkened, Mr. Paderewski played Chopin as only he can.

The applause was in tune with a night pitched to superlatives.

PITTS SANBORN.

From the
GLOBE
Jan. 16,1917.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN N Y

Symphony Players Will Give a Concert Tonight From Which the Receipts Will Be $24,000

The Symphony Orchestra with its entire personnel leaves Boston this morning for New York, where it will give this evening a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera House in aid of the Vacation Association. The orchestra will have the assistance of Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists.

The prices of tickets for this concert range from $1 for the back of the topmost gallery to $10 for the entire parquet and boxes have sold at $150 and $100 each. The house is sold out and the receipts will be about $24,000.

The orchestra returns at midnight.

SUN
ess: New York City

JAN 14

A gala concert will be given in aid of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler as the soloists. The pianist will play the Schumann concerto, and the violinist the Mendelssohn concerto. Each soloist will be heard also in a group of solos. The orchestra will play the overture Smetana's "Die Verkaufte Braut," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the "Caprice Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

[70]

From the N.Y. Post
Jan.17,1917.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A Gala Concert and Others.

Karl Klindworth once tried to give a concert in Steinway Hall at $10 a seat. So did Adelina Patti. They did not get rich from the sale of seats. Heinrich Conried, on the other hand, added a hundred thousand or more to the Metropolitan's bank account when he gave a series of "Parsifal" performances at $10 a parquet seat. Last night the Metropolitan held a "Parsifal" audience of some $25,000 value; but the entertainment was not Wagner's swan song; it was a concert given by Paderewski, Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of Anne Morgan's Vacation Association for Working Girls.

Judging by the enthusiasm, those who had paid so liberally for their seats got more than their money's worth in hearing Kreisler play the Mendelssohn concerto and Paderewski the Schumann, not to speak of additional groups of titbits. They both showed once more that they are at the head of their class. To be sure, their playing would have been still more enjoyable in a smaller auditorium. Even the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not appear to such advantage as it does in Carnegie Hall. It played three virtuoso pieces: Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," under Dr. Muck's energetic bâton. The season has been a hard one on great artists, what with playing and relief work. Both Paderewski and Kreisler looked pale and tired. Paderewski leaves to-day for the South and Cuba, for a rest for his wife and himself.

From the
Transcript
Jan.17.1917.

NEWS OF MUSIC

As New York Heard Dr. Muck, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski in a Single Concert—Young Players and Fresh Music—Items and Announcements

THE desire of Miss Anne Morgan is at last fulfilled. For two years she has purposed a concert in New York at which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski should all appear for the profit of her Vacation Association, a charity for working girls. The difficulty in the way was the discovery of an evening on which the orchestra, the violinist and the pianist could join forces without disarrangement of their several schedules. Last season it could not be found, this season managerial fate and adjustments have been kinder and on Tuesday evening the concert of concerts befell in the Metropolitan Opera House. Upstairs and down, boxes, parquet, galleries and standing room, it was filled to the last place; prices were uniformly high and the gross receipts are estimated at $25,000. The concert was proportionately long, beginning at eight-thirty and ending at eleven-thirty after the orchestra had been heard in three numbers, Mr. Kreisler in a concerto and solo pieces; Mr. Paderewski in like items. All this music was familiar; for the orchestra Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's tone-poem of Eulenspiegel and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody," light and displayful numbers suiting the occasion; for the violinist, Mendelssohn's easy concerto and four trifles; for the pianist, Schumann's songful concerto and a similar miscellany. All concerned from Dr. Muck and the two virtuosi downward dutifully fulfilled expectations and the only perceptible shadow on the occasion was the wish of a few to hear Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler together in a single piece. Double concertos for piano, violin and orchestra are, however, an unknown quantity and the Metropolitan is hardly the place for sonatas. The unusual, however, was not altogether lacking, thanks to the cat of the opera house. Though he has been schooled to shun the stage when opera is set upon it, he knew no such restriction in the case of concerts; ascended through the prompter's box; observed Mr. Paderewski to that pettish pianist's obvious annoyance; amused the patiently waiting Dr. Muck and finally, under prodding from Mr. Witek's bow, withdrew to repose among the unlighted footlights. Otherwise the first appearance of the Symphony Orchestra in New York in twenty-three years—outside the annual series of subscription concerts—was uneventful.

From WORLD
Address: New York City

Mr. Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will furnish the programme for the concert to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House next Tuesday evening for the benefit of the Vacation Association, Inc., Miss Robinson Smith, President.

Among those who have taken tickets are Mrs. Arthur Dodge, Mrs. Henry Evans, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Newbold Edgar, Mrs. Henry E. Davison, Mrs. Frederick Allen, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Edward Breitung, Mrs. Henry Clews, Miss Katherine Bledgett, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan and Miss Anne Morgan.

From the
GLOBE
Jan. 6,1917.

Compositions by Sibelius at This Week's Symphonies

The Symphony program this week will contain three novelties. The first part of the concert will be devoted to three works by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, none of which has been heard in Boston. These are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceansides" and "Night-ride and Sunrise." "The Oceansides" was written by Sibelius for the Norfolk Connecticut Festival two years ago.

The second part of the program will comprise Beethoven's violin Concerto and the Overture to "Egmont." The soloist will be Albert Spalding, the admirable American artist, who at these concerts is making his first appearances with our Symphony Orchestra.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

Miss Irma Seydel, the talented young violinist, who is a native of this city and well and favorably known here, will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening. The program comprises Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Saint-Saens' third concerto for violin in B minor and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

EVENING MAIL
ess: New York City

FOR the benefit of the Vacation Association a concert will be given this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler as soloists.

Among those who have taken boxes and seats are Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Miss Cutting, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Newbold Edgar, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Charles H. Ditson, Mrs. Henry F. Davison, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Henry Frick, Mrs. John Greenough, Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. W. T. Carrington, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Alfred Cook, Mrs. Albert Goodhart, Mrs. William B. Dillon and Mrs. James Cushman.

From the Monitor
Jan.20,1917.

LOUISE HOMER SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra in twelfth concerts of season, Jan. 19 and 20, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, soloist. The program: Schubert, symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"); Bach, air, "It Is Finished," from "St. John Passion," "My Heart Ever Faithful"; Ballantine, "The Eve of St. Agnes" (first time at these concerts); Sidney Homer, three songs with orchestra, "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me—Sing," "The Song of the Shirt"; Wagner, introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Act I.

Not until the Wagner number at the end of the program did Dr. Muck and his men measure up to the standard of a Boston Symphony performance. The Schubert symphony, beloved of many for its warmth of poetry, its wealth of melody and its wholesomeness of emotion, was strangely ineloquent. Even mere beauty of sound, which at least might have been expected, eluded the effort of the conductor, except for certain flashes, as in the second movement, where the oboe and the clarinet rise in transcendent song against a background of shimmering string tone.

Mr. Ballantine's symphonic poem, played for the first time at these concerts, fared somewhat better, and the composer, who was forced to rise in his seat to acknowledge the applause, may congratulate himself that his music had a fine and fair presentation. How many instructors of music in institutions of learning are privileged to hear their early efforts given the careful attention that Dr. Muck bestows on all that he undertakes? For all that this is a well-made piece, with careful attention to form and orchestration, it is to be hoped that it will soon be surpassed by the young composer. The hasty impression of a single hearing leaves much to be desired in the way of more definite statement of themes, clearer contrasts of themes, and indeed more worth in the themes themselves. In favor of the composition, however, and it counts for much in the way of promise of work to come, is a rigorous resistance of the temptation to elaborate and develop beyond the importance of the idea. Mr. Ballantine in repressing the academic tendency to squeeze all there is out of a musical idea has gone far on his way.

Mme. Homer, warmly and affectionately welcomed, gave her best interpretation in her husband's setting to Thomas Hood's "The Song of the Shirt." The "Heart Ever Faithful" aria of Bach demands a certain steadiness and smoothness of tone that Mme. Homer did not quite achieve.

From the Journal
Jan.20,1917.

MME. HOMER IS SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

Harvard Instructor's Tone Poem Played—McCormack Next Soloist.

Greater Boston figures with unusual prominence on this week's Symphony program. The orchestral novelty is a symphonic poem by Edward Ballantine, a young musician who lives in this city and teaches at Harvard. It is entitled "The Eve of St. Agnes," as it is based upon the beautiful poem by Keats, although it does not translate the whole text literally into tone. The soloist of the concerts is Mme. Louise Homer, who lived in Boston for many years and here made her professional start; and three of the songs she sings are works by her husband, Sidney Homer, a Bostonian by birth.

Mr. Ballantine, who wrote the new tone poem, was present yesterday and he responded modestly to the applause that followed its performance. On the whole it is perhaps the most agreeable composition presented in recent years by any member of the Harvard school of composers. It reflects much of the spirit of Keats' verses, and, wonderful to relate, largely in a melodious and therefore grateful and becoming manner. It is modern enough in its orchestration. Too many of the new writers are content with technical displays, and maybe that is the best they can do. Mr. Ballantine writes poetically as well as skilfully. The audience took pleasure in the music.

Mme. Homer was also roundly applauded for her singing. Her voice has a quality all its own. Yesterday it sounded as rich and fresh as ever. Her numbers are two Bach airs, "It Is Finished" and "My Heart Ever Faithful," and three songs by Mr. Homer, two of which are settings of Henley poems, "From the Brake of the Nightingale" and "Sing to Me, Sing;" and the third is a setting of Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt."

Dr. Muck conducted a charming performance of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." The program ends with the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser," Paris version.

The orchestra will be out of town all next week. At the concerts on Feb. 2 and 3 John McCormack, who has just decided to become an American citizen, will be the soloist. As he is acknowledged to be the foremost exponent of the classic style of singing, he will naturally be heard in old operatic airs. "Per Pieta non Ricercate," from Mozart's "Il Curioso Indiscreto;" and "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," are the numbers he has chosen. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Reger's "Variations on a Theme by Hiller," and one of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan."

From the Traveler
Jan.27.1917.

McCormack Soloist with Symphony

By FRANK BERTWALL.

To many, the feature of next week's Symphony concerts will be the debut of John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular concert tenor of the day, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is just a bit of curiosity as to whether his popularity will lead Dr. Muck to allow an encore, which privilege has as yet been granted only to Paderewski of all soloists appearing with this orchestra.

McCormack's first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto"; his second, the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and his third, the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

The program for the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, will be: Ceasar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING GLOBE
s: New York City

Music.

Paderewski, Kreisler, and Boston for Charity.

Benefit concerts usually pass without criticism, and the charity has been known to cover, from the point of view of art, quite the proverbial allowance of sins. However, such a concert can benefit the public, and its nature may be such as to make criticism not only proper, but indispensable.

The "gala concert" of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening is a case of point. It was of benefit to the association, of about $25,000 worth of benefit. At the same time it was of benefit to the public—at least to so much of the public as could squeeze into an opera house which groaned its capacity at a ten dollar price scale. The performers were Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed, naturally, by Dr. Muck.

The occasion was notable in the first place because the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played here out of its regular subscription series in nearly twenty-four years. The appearance of either Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Kreisler alone as soloist would have meant much; the appearance of both meant more. Altogether it was one of those occasions which some insist should be marked with a white stone or a red letter, or other emblem of color or non-color.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major of Enesco. Dr. Muck and the orchestra literally set the pace in Smetana's whirlwind overture. I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening!—In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssohn and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifiying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them. I suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Mr. Paderewski's performance in the Schumann concerto (the work, by the way, which he played as soloist at the Washington Arch concert of the Boston orchestra nearly twenty-four years ago) was of the beauty which is peculiar unto him. During the performance of the work the eminent pianist seemed considerably put out by the prompter's box, beside which stood his piano. Dr. Muck, too, though conducting, found time to shake his baton in menacing gesture toward that encumbrance. A sympathetic audience shivered, imaging to itself some pernicious draught out of the hooded cave. It transpired, however, that two urchins solemnly chewing gum under the hood while they took in the performance of Mr. Paderewski and the orchestra were the disturbing factor.

Mr. Kreisler played in splendid form the Mendelssohn concerto, and later delighted the house with a group of the short pieces of which he makes a specialty. At the end of the programme, on a stage now darkened, Mr. Paderewski played Chopin as only he can.

The applause was in tune with a night pitched to superlatives.

PITTS SANBORN.

From the Traveler
Jan.6,1917.

Next Week's Symphony Program.

The first part of Dr. Muck's program for the Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week will be devoted to three works by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, none of which has been heard in Boston. These are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceanides" and "Night-ride and Sunrise." "The Oceanides" was written by Sibelius for the Norfolk, Connecticut, festival of two years ago. The second part will comprise Beethoven's violin concerto and the overture to "Egmont." The solist will be Albert Spalding, who at these concerts is making his first appearance with our Symphony orchestra.

Irma Seydel, violinist, is to be the soloist at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening next, playing Saint-Saens' third concerto.

Fritz Kreisler's program for his concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be:

Suite in E minor	J. S. Bach
Chaconne (for violin alone)	J. S. Bach
Concerto No. 2 in F-sharp minor	Vieuxtemps
Melody in D minor	Gluck
Scherzo in B-flat major	Dittersdorf
La Chasse (Caprice)	Cartier
Larghetto in B-flat major	Weber
Moment Musical	Schubert
Rondo in G major	Mozart
Indian Lament	Dvorak-Kreisler
Three Old Vienna Dances	Kreisler

(1) Liebesleid. (2) Schoen Rosmarin. (3) Liebesfreud.

Paderewski will be the soloist for the Symphony Hall concert on Sunday afternoon Jan. 14.

From the N.Y. Globe
Jan.17,1917.

Music.

Paderewski, Kreisler, and Boston for Charity.

Benefit concerts usually pass without criticism, and the charity has been known to cover, from the point of view of art, quite the proverbial allowance of sins. However, such a concert can benefit the public, and its nature may be such as to make criticism not only proper, but indispensable.

The "gala concert" of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening is a case of point. It was of benefit to the association, of about $25,000 worth of benefit. At the same time it was of benefit to the public—at least to so much of the public as could squeeze into an opera house which groaned its capacity at a ten dollar price scale. The performers were Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed, naturally, by Dr. Muck.

The occasion was notable in the first place because the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played here out of its regular subscription series in nearly twenty-four years. The appearance of either Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Kreisler alone as soloist would have meant much; the appearance of both meant more. Altogether it was one of those occasions which some insist should be marked with a white stone or a red letter, or other emblem of color or non-color.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major of Enesco. Dr. Muck and the orchestra literally set the pace in Smetana's whirlwind overture. I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening!—In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssoln and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifiying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them. I suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Mr. Paderewski's performance in the Schumann concerto (the work, by the way, which he played as soloist at the Washington Arch concert of the Boston orchestra nearly twenty-four years ago) was of the beauty which is peculiar unto him. During the performance of the work the eminent pianist seemed considerably put out by the prompter's box, beside which stood his piano. Dr. Muck, too, though conducting, found time to shake his baton in menacing gesture toward that encumbrance. A sympathetic audience shivered, imaging to itself some pernicious draught out of the hooded cave. It transpired, however, that two urchins solemnly chewing gum under the hood while they took in the performance of Mr. Paderewski and the orchestra were the disturbing factor.

Mr. Kreisler played in splendid form the Mendelssohn concerto, and later delighted the house with a group of the short pieces of which he makes a specialty. At the end of the programme, on a stage now darkened, Mr. Paderewski played Chopin as only he can.

The applause was in tune with a night pitched to superlatives.

PITTS SANBORN.

From the
GLOBE
Jan. 16,1917.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN N Y

Symphony Players Will Give a Concert Tonight From Which the Receipts Will Be $24,000

The Symphony Orchestra with its entire personnel leaves Boston this morning for New York, where it will give this evening a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera House in aid of the Vacation Association. The orchestra will have the assistance of Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists.

The prices of tickets for this concert range from $1 for the back of the topmost gallery to $10 for the entire parquet and boxes have sold at $150 and $100 each. The house is sold out and the receipts will be about $24,000.

The orchestra returns at midnight.

SUN
ess: New York City

JAN 14

A gala concert will be given in aid of the Vacation Association at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler as the soloists. The pianist will play the Schumann concerto, and the violinist the Mendelssohn concerto. Each soloist will be heard also in a group of solos. The orchestra will play the overture Smetana's "Die Verkaufte Braut," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the "Caprice Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

[70]

From the N.Y. Post
Jan.17,1917.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A Gala Concert and Others.

Karl Klindworth once tried to give a concert in Steinway Hall at $10 a seat. So did Adelina Patti. They did not get rich from the sale of seats. Heinrich Conried, on the other hand, added a hundred thousand or more to the Metropolitan's bank account when he gave a series of "Parsifal" performances at $10 a parquet seat. Last night the Metropolitan held a "Parsifal" audience of some $25,000 value; but the entertainment was not Wagner's swan song; it was a concert given by Paderewski, Kreisler, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of Anne Morgan's Vacation Association for Working Girls.

Judging by the enthusiasm, those who had paid so liberally for their seats got more than their money's worth in hearing Kreisler play the Mendelssohn concerto and Paderewski the Schumann, not to speak of additional groups of titbits. They both showed once more that they are at the head of their class. To be sure, their playing would have been still more enjoyable in a smaller auditorium. Even the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not appear to such advantage as it does in Carnegie Hall. It played three virtuoso pieces: Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," under Dr. Muck's energetic bâton. The season has been a hard one on great artists, what with playing and relief work. Both Paderewski and Kreisler looked pale and tired. Paderewski leaves to-day for the South and Cuba, for a rest for his wife and himself.

From the
Transcript
Jan.17.1917.

NEWS OF MUSIC

As New York Heard Dr. Muck, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski in a Single Concert—Young Players and Fresh Music—Items and Announcements

THE desire of Miss Anne Morgan is at last fulfilled. For two years she has purposed a concert in New York at which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski should all appear for the profit of her Vacation Association, a charity for working girls. The difficulty in the way was the discovery of an evening on which the orchestra, the violinist and the pianist could join forces without disarrangement of their several schedules. Last season it could not be found, this season managerial fate and adjustments have been kinder and on Tuesday evening the concert of concerts befell in the Metropolitan Opera House. Upstairs and down, boxes, parquet, galleries and standing room, it was filled to the last place; prices were uniformly high and the gross receipts are estimated at $25,000. The concert was proportionately long, beginning at eight-thirty and ending at eleven-thirty after the orchestra had been heard in three numbers, Mr. Kreisler in a concerto and solo pieces; Mr. Paderewski in like items. All this music was familiar; for the orchestra Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's tone-poem of Eulenspiegel and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody," light and displayful numbers suiting the occasion; for the violinist, Mendelssohn's easy concerto and four trifles; for the pianist, Schumann's songful concerto and a similar miscellany. All concerned from Dr. Muck and the two virtuosi downward dutifully fulfilled expectations and the only perceptible shadow on the occasion was the wish of a few to hear Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler together in a single piece. Double concertos for piano, violin and orchestra are, however, an unknown quantity and the Metropolitan is hardly the place for sonatas. The unusual, however, was not altogether lacking, thanks to the cat of the opera house. Though he has been schooled to shun the stage when opera is set upon it, he know no such restriction in the case of concerts; ascended through the prompter's box; observed Mr. Paderewski to that pettish pianist's obvious annoyance; amused the patiently waiting Dr. Muck and finally, under prodding from Mr. Witek's bow, withdrew to repose among the unlighted footlights. Otherwise the first appearance of the Symphony Orchestra in New York in twenty-three years—outside the annual series of subscription concerts—was uneventful.

From WORLD
Address: New York City

Mr. Paderewski, Fritz

Symphony Orchestra will for the concert to be giv Opera House next Tue benefit of the Vacation Ass
inson Smith, President.

Among those who hav
Arthur Dodge, Mrs. He Iselin, Mrs. Vincent As
Mrs. Henry E. Davis
Mrs. August Belmont, M
Henry Clews, Miss Kath
Belmont, Mrs. Harry P
Vanderbilt, Mrs. Her
Pierpont Morgan and

J. S. N.. nex
0 o'clock at ther in Was ding of M

ghter of Mr.
Ligny, to Ja
this afternoo ired and Ei s the Apostl cholas Avenue at the Hote Hundred a o'clock

ork, 188

From the
GLOBE
Jan. 6,1917.

Compositions by Sibelius at This Week's Symphonies

The Symphony program this week will contain three novelties. The first part of the concert will be devoted to three works by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, none of which has been heard in Boston. These are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Oceansides" and "Night-ride and Sunrise." "The Oceansides" was written by Sibelius for the Norfolk Connecticut Festival two years ago.

The second part of the program will comprise Beethoven's violin Concerto and the Overture to "Egmont." The soloist will be Albert Spalding, the admirable American artist, who at these concerts is making his first appearances with our Symphony Orchestra.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

Miss Irma Seydel, the talented young violinist, who is a native of this city and well and favorably known here, will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening. The program comprises Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Saint-Saens' third concerto for violin in B minor and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

EVENING MAIL
ess: New York City

FOR the benefit of the Vacation Association a concert will be given this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler as soloists.

Among those who have taken boxes and seats are Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Miss Cutting, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Newbold Edgar, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Charles H. Ditson, Mrs. Henry E. Davison, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Henry Frick, Mrs. John Greenough, Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. W. T. Carrington, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. Horace Hill, Mrs. Alfred Cook, Mrs. Albert Goodhart, Mrs. William B. Dillon and Mrs. James Cushman.

From the Monitor
Jan.20,1917.

LOUISE HOMER SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra in twelfth concerts of season, Jan. 19 and 20, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, soloist. The program: Schubert, symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"); Bach, air, "It Is Finished," from "St. John Passion," "My Heart Ever Faithful"; Ballantine, "The Eve of St. Agnes" (first time at these concerts); Sidney Homer, three songs with orchestra, "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me—Sing," "The Song of the Shirt"; Wagner, introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Act I.

Not until the Wagner number at the end of the program did Dr. Muck and his men measure up to the standard of a Boston Symphony performance. The Schubert symphony, beloved of many for its warmth of poetry, its wealth of melody and its wholesomeness of emotion, was strangely ineloquent. Even mere beauty of sound, which at least might have been expected, eluded the effort of the conductor, except for certain flashes, as in the second movement, where the oboe and the clarinet rise in transcendent song against a background of shimmering string tone.

Mr. Ballantine's symphonic poem, played for the first time at these concerts, fared somewhat better, and the composer, who was forced to rise in his seat to acknowledge the applause, may congratulate himself that his music had a fine and fair presentation. How many instructors of music in institutions of learning are privileged to hear their early efforts given the careful attention that Dr. Muck bestows on all that he undertakes? For all that this is a well-made piece, with careful attention to form and orchestration, it is to be hoped that it will soon be surpassed by the young composer. The hasty impression of a single hearing leaves much to be desired in the way of more definite statement of themes, clearer contrasts of themes, and indeed more worth in the themes themselves. In favor of the composition, however, and it counts for much in the way of promise of work to come, is a rigorous resistance of the temptation to elaborate and develop beyond the importance of the idea. Mr. Ballantine in repressing the academic tendency to squeeze all there is out of a musical idea has gone far on his way.

Mme. Homer, warmly and affectionately welcomed, gave her best interpretation in her husband's setting to Thomas Hood's "The Song of the Shirt." The "Heart Ever Faithful" aria of Bach demands a certain steadiness and smoothness of tone that Mme. Homer did not quite achieve.

From the Journal
Jan.20,1917.

MME. HOMER IS SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

Harvard Instructor's Tone Poem Played—McCormack Next Soloist.

Greater Boston figures with unusual prominence on this week's Symphony program. The orchestral novelty is a symphonic poem by Edward Ballantine, a young musician who lives in this city and teaches at Harvard. It is entitled "The Eve of St. Agnes," as it is based upon the beautiful poem by Keats, although it does not translate the whole text literally into tone. The soloist of the concerts is Mme. Louise Homer, who lived in Boston for many years and here made her professional start; and three of the songs she sings are works by her husband, Sidney Homer, a Bostonian by birth.

Mr. Ballantine, who wrote the new tone poem, was present yesterday and he responded modestly to the applause that followed its performance. On the whole it is perhaps the most agreeable composition presented in recent years by any member of the Harvard school of composers. It reflects much of the spirit of Keats' verses, and, wonderful to relate, largely in a melodious and therefore grateful and becoming manner. It is modern enough in its orchestration. Too many of the new writers are content with technical displays, and maybe that is the best they can do. Mr. Ballantine writes poetically as well as skilfully. The audience took pleasure in the music.

Mme. Homer was also roundly applauded for her singing. Her voice has a quality all its own. Yesterday it sounded as rich and fresh as ever. Her numbers are two Bach airs, "It Is Finished" and "My Heart Ever Faithful," and three songs by Mr. Homer, two of which are settings of Henley poems, "From the Brake of the Nightingale" and "Sing to Me, Sing;" and the third is a setting of Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt."

Dr. Muck conducted a charming performance of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." The program ends with the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser," Paris version.

The orchestra will be out of town all next week. At the concerts on Feb. 2 and 3 John McCormack, who has just decided to become an American citizen, will be the soloist. As he is acknowledged to be the foremost exponent of the classic style of singing, he will naturally be heard in old operatic airs. "Per Pieta non Ricercate," from Mozart's "Il Curioso Indiscreto;" and "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," are the numbers he has chosen. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Reger's "Variations on a Theme by Hiller," and one of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan."

From the Traveler
Jan.27.1917.

McCormack Soloist with Symphony

By FRANK BERTWALL.

To many, the feature of next week's Symphony concerts will be the debut of John McCormack, unquestionably the most popular concert tenor of the day, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is just a bit of curiosity as to whether his popularity will lead Dr. Muck to allow an encore, which privilege has as yet been granted only to Paderewski of all soloists appearing with this orchestra.

McCormack's first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto": his second, the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and his third, the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

The program for the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, will be: Ceasar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Advertiser
Jan.20,1917.

WORK BY SCHUBERT IS WARMLY GREETED

"UNFINISHED" SYMPHONY IS WELL PERFORMED

Followed by "It Is Finished" By Mme. Homer—Ballantine Composition Given

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Schubert—B Minor Symphony.
Bach—Air from St. John Passion-Music, "My Heart Ever Faithful" (Whitsuntide Cantata).
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.
Ballantine—"The Eve of St Agnes." Symphonic poem.
Sidney Homer—Three songs with orchestra.
Mme. Louise Homer.
Wagner—Introduction and Bacchanale, "Tannhaeuser."

A program which avoided musical problems from first to last. The way in which Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony holds its own is a good proof that there is something imperishable in pure melody, for this work has the maximum of tune and the minimum of development. The two movements were given with a directness and lack of affectation that merited all praise. Of course there is nothing technical in them but what is child's play for our orchestra, but there is a temptation to over-refine, just as a Prima Donna does with a Falk-song, and this flaw was not altogether avoided.

Every time that one hears this simple and sweet symphony it sets the musician wondering what Schubert would have been like if he had lived five years longer and had taken the proposed contrapuntal lessons from Sechter. He might have become greater than Beethoven, but it is by no means certain. It might have happened as with that "natural" eye doctor in France, who excited the amazement of the trained physicians so that they had him thoroughly educated in surgery; but after that he feared to make the operations that he had boldly done before, and his technical training ruined his career. It is possible that Schubert might not have dared to have been so simply melodic after he had achieved a contraputal education. But this is one of the "ifs" of musicial history. As it is, musician and non-musician unite in loving the "Unfinished" symphony, and laughing at the audacious German who tried to "Finish" it. It was bountifully applauded by the large audience.

After the "Unfinished" symphony Mme. Homer sang "It Is Finished," which seemed flatly to contradict the statement regarding the Schubert work. The two Bach numbers were delightfully contrasted and beautifully sung. Sometimes the music-lover finds greater pleasure in hearing a broad contralto voice than in listening to a showy, flexible soprano. The first number was sad and serious, the second ("My Heart Ever Faithful") full of jubilation. How much there is in rhythmic treatment of a melody! If any of our readers will compare the beginning of this aria with the first part of Jensen's "Murmuring Breeze" they will find the same musical thought, but with the widest possible difference.

Mme. Homer gave the joy of this happiest of Bach arias with charming effect, which was only heightened by its contrast with the first number. Spite of the fact that it was originally a soprano song, it suited well to the singer's voice, and won a decided success.

It may have been conjugal loyalty which caused Mme. Homer to sing three of her husband's songs—just as Katherine Goodson (Mrs. Arthur Hinton) puts her husband's concertos upon her programs; but that did not concern us since the numbers were excellent in their own right.

There were broad climaxes in each of the songs, and these were made the most of. The "Song of the Shirt," is long enough (but not varied enough) to be made into a cantata rather than a solo song, and the music does not always reflect the words. The ending is as powerful as if the singer were making a shirt of mail. "Sing to Me, Sing" is a very fine work and very effective. It was a noble composition nobly sung, and won a deserved and emphatic success.

We should like to dwell longer upon the excellences of Mr. Homer's songs, and Mme. Homer's singing of them, but a large composition by a new and native composer demands the space. Mr. Edward Ballantine has given a long and heavily scored composition for his debut in these concerts. By a pretty coincidence "St. Agnes' Eve" will tonight be played on St. Agnes' Eve itself.

We do not find Mr. Ballantine as impregnated with Keats as our other native composer, Mr. Frederick S. Converse. He does some touches of combat which are not in the poem at all, but such a deviation is more than pardonable, since it gives effective contrast. But at the beginning there is definite tone-picturing, and the tremolo strings, we imagine, portray:—

"St. Agnes' Eve—Ah, bitter chill it was!
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
The hare limped trembling through the frozen grass,
And silent was the flock in woolly fold."

But there is nothing like the bleakness here which Puccini attains with his empty fifth-progressions in the third act of "La Boheme."

There are motives and guiding themes galore in the work. St. Agnes, the patient, holy beadsman," Madeline, Porphyro, and several others have their musical tags, some of which, as the simple tenderness of the Madeline motive, and the heroic character of the Porphyro theme, are very fitting and commendable.

But the music which Porphyro hears when he is smuggled into the enemy's house scarcely reaches the sublimity of Keats' line—"The Music, yearning, like a God in pain." The sweetness of the Madeline theme is added to by the sugar of the Celesta, while Porphyro has trumpet passages for his own. The old beldame, Angela—"weak in body and soul," we could not, on a first hearing, identify.

Mr. Ballantine was right not to follow Keats too closely in the Castle music which Porphyro hears. Keats describes it as:—

"The boisterous midnight, festive clarion,
The Kettle-drum, the far-heard Clarionet," which is about as bad as Tennyson's "violin, flute, bassoon," which he invites Maud to come into the garden to hear; (we hope she didn't go); these poets sometimes evolve strange bands of music.

We did not find adequate portrayal of the chamber-scene (only paralleled by the celebrated Shankesprian Balcony Scene), nor was there a graphic portrayal of the tiptoeing exit of the eloping pair. A Chorale theme however indicates triumph, and the Madeline and Porphyro themes indicate who triumphs, and these come in C major, as if Mr. Ballantine wished to elucidate Browning's line ("Abt Vogler")—

"My rest is found, the C major of this life." The end is tranquil. If the work is not great it was worth doing nevertheless, even to exhibit and encourage a new native composer of merit.

The work showed much skill in the handling of a large orchestra—but they all have that. The composer received an ovation at its close, and was obliged to bow twice from his seat in the audience.

Not since Abraham started to sacrifice Isaac was there such a musical sacrifice as when Wagner discarded his "Tannhaeuser" overture because it did not represent his ideas of continuity, and replaced it with a much cheaper Prelude, leading into the first scene of the opera. If only he had been stayed as Abraham was! There is no finer climax in modern overture music than the apotheosis of the Pilgrim's Chorus at the end of that overture. This is cut out altogether in the so-called "Paris Version," and replaced by inferior fortissimo maunderings which finally lead into the Bacchanale of the first act, when matters are quieter but still somewhat dull.

We wish the "Paris Version" might be shelved altogether and the great overture come into its full rights again. Of course it was interesting as a matter of curiosity to those auditors familiar with the troubles that beset the first performances of the opera in Paris, but those who had this curiosity might have satisfied it by looking over the score, or the piano transcription. The long selection does not display Wagner at his best, especially through its central and final portion.

It was played excellently and read with the utmost intelligence, so that none of the effects went to waste. But here the musical public will discard Wagner's hobby-horse and choose the original overture almost unanimously, and spare the Bacchanale altogether.

From the Traveler
Jan.20,1917.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was something out of the usual with its first hearing of the symphonic poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," the work of Edward Ballantine of the music department of Horvard University, the appearance of Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera company as soloist, her selections including three songs by her husband, Sidney Homer, Schubert's unfinished symphony and the introduction and Bacchanal from "Tannhauser." Enthusiasm was the order of the afternoon with Mr. Ballantine, Mme. Homer, Dr. Muck and the orchestra sharing in the honors.

The Bollantine work made a favorable impression, although it gives the impression of one running ahead of his powers of expression. Mme. Homer was in excellent voice and was an enthusiastically recalled. The feature of the concert, however, was the unfinished symphony, a beautiful work read as in Dr. Muck's best vein.

From the
Herald
Jan.20,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S 12TH CONCERT

Dr. Muck and His Players Give Beautiful Performance of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor, the Opening Work — Mme. Homer Sings Several Songs.

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED THIS EVENING

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Homer was the singer. The program was as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B minor; Bach, Air, "It Is Finished"; Air, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; Ballantine, Symphonic Poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes" (after Keats); Sidney Homer, three songs: "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me, Sing," "The Song of the Shirt"; Wagner, Introduction and Bacchanale, "Tannhaeuser."

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave an uncommonly beautiful performance of Schubert's music. For once the second motive sung by the violoncellos in the first movement was not sentimentalized. The delicacy of the treatment throughout was never finical. There was an ever abiding sense of poesy. Even the second movement, a falling off in imagination from the first, for once did not seem too long drawn out, and its sweetness was not cloying.

Mr. Ballantine's symphonic poem was played for the first time. Born at Oberlin, O.; reared in Springfield of this commonwealth, he studied music at Harvard University, later in Berlin, and for a short time in Paris. Living in Boston, he is an instructor of music at Harvard.

It is a bold man who thinks of illustrating by purely orchestral music Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," or poems by Swinburne, Shelley, Poe and Keats. The music of the verse mocks the composer. It may be said that there are contrasting episodes and action in "The Eve of St. Agnes." There are the "hyena foemen," the sworn enemies of Porphyro's family; there is the thought of magic spells worked by maidens expectant of a lover; there is the revelry of the "bloated wassailers"; there is the flight of Madeline and Porphyro. But these are only incidental. The lines that speak of them are not in sharp contrast with the prevailing mood. That mood is sensuous. The "snarling trumpets" are "silver." The magic spell is described most sensuously. The foemen do nothing except quaff Rhenish. The lovers "glide like phantoms" into the storm without. The poem reeks with sensuousness. Even the supper that Porphyro prepares for Madeline is described in a famous stanza: "And lucent syrops, tinct with cinnamon," is only one of the lush lines.

Tennyson's "St. Agnes" is a nocturne in the purest, chastest white. "The Eve of St. Agnes" is like unto a tapestry gorgeous with all the colors of Luxury.

Mr. Ballantine, in order to gain relieving episodes and dramatic contrasts, lays stress on that which is incidental. There is really no "conflict between Porphyro and his foes"; no fierce struggle to win his ladylove; yet there is much music that suggests this; there is more than a hint at Porphyro with his sword drawn. Too much of the symphonic poem is out of keeping with the prolonged mood of the poem itself, and the music describing the unessential is the least satisfactory. The most poetic section of the music is the final love song, but as an illustration of the poem it would be short and fragmentary. If the whole symphonic poem were a love song, there would be no contrasts. The choice of a subject, therefore, seems to us unfortunate.

There are undeniably musical thoughts and there are pages of felicitous orchestral expression. The thematic material is too often cerebral when there should be, if not passion, at least the sensuousness of Keats, the poet that put red pepper on his tongue so that claret might seem the cooler to him, for the misguided man insisted that claret should be cold. We should like a more rapturous, a more ecstatic note in the love song, or even a touch of amorous languor. The music is that of a composer, musical by nature and of a fine taste, who has studied intelligently and learned much, but does not yet speak with full authority; whose thoughts are as yet episodic, whose expression is not flowing and continuous. His melodic sense is not sufficiently developed; he is reticent when he should speak freely, as Hazlitt would have said, with gusto. The Symphonic poem is written for a large orchestra, which includes three kinds of drum, cymbals, triangle, and tam-tam. Keats, it is true, speaks of the boisterous clarion, "the kettle drum, and far-heard clarionet"—we regret to say that he spelled clarinet with an "o"—but he adds, "though but in dying [illegible] and Madeline or St. Agnes's Eve with pulsatile instruments. The music was received by the audience with marked favor.

Mme. Homer sang two airs by Bach and three by her husband. "It is finished" from Bach's "Passion music according to John" is not well suited to concert performance and, though to be rank heresy to say it, is a perfunctory setting of music to the words, without religious emotion, quite dull. Mrs. Homer sang "My Heart Ever Faithful," with the fitting jubilant note. Bach gave the indication "Presto." It would be interesting to know the precise significance of this indication in his time.

The piano accompaniment of Sidney Homer's song was orchastrated by Mr. Stock, the conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and none too well. That of the first song is particularly ineffective. Of the three songs the second has the most character. The music to "The Song of the Shirt" is singularly incongruous. The woman of Hood's poem sang "with a voice of dolorous pitch." Her heart was sick, her brain benumbed, her hand weary. The composer turns her into a dramatic singer; the song into a cantata. The only music for the poem should be an intense, subdued, monotonous wail. That would not do for concert purposes, and there would be no room for Mr. Stock's orchestration, some of it mere clap-trap. Mme. Homer sang her husband's song dramatically and was loudly applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of Feb. 2-3 will include Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Reger's variations on a theme by Hiller, and Strauss's "Don Juan." John McCormack will sing an air from Mozart's "Il Curioso Indiscreto" and an air from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

From the N.Y. Tribune
Jan.17,1917.

FACTORY GIRLS DELIGHTED AT PADEREWSKI CONCERT

Metropolitan Opera House Crowded by Members of Vacation Association

Paderewski has swayed vast audiences before, but never such an one as he delighted at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. High up in the galleries factory girls who had never heard the great pianist before applauded as only true music lovers can.

It was the concert of the Vacation Association, the organization of working girls headed by Miss Anne Morgan. In the sale of seats preference had been given to the working girls.

There was no lack of radiance in the diamond horseshoe, however. The boxes had been sold out two weeks ago to those interested in the welfare of the organization. The boxholders were:

Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Herbert Satterlee, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss De Forrest, Mrs. Henry Payne Whitney, Mrs. Henry C. Frick, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Charles Smith, Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie, Mrs. Edward Breitung, Mrs. Horace Hill, Clarence Mackay, C. W. Watson, Charles Steel, Arthur Ryle, Mrs. D. W. B. Dickerman, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, Mrs. Edward Guggenheim, Mrs. W. E. Hooper, Miss Terese O'Donohue, Adrian Iselin, Mrs. Maurice Kosminski, Mme. Paderewski, Mrs. William Salomon, Mrs. William J. Higginson, Mrs. John Parsons, A. C. Gurnee, Mrs. Arthur Dodge, Mrs. Henry Evans, Mrs. Newbold Edgar, Mrs. Henry E. Davison, Mrs. Frederick Allen, Mrs. Henry Clews, Miss Katherine Blodgett, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Wendell Baker, Mrs. W. E. Hooper, Mrs. Newcomb Carlton, Miss Frohenkneck, Mrs. William P. Hamilton and George Whelan.

From the American
Jan.28,1917.

John McCormack, the noted tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the thirteenth pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

As Mr. McCormack has long excelled in the singing of the suave music of the 18th century, it is but natural that he should go to Mozart and Handel for his composers. His first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin, "Per Pieta non Ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

* * *

From the Globe
Jan.28,1917.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. There will be no soloist. The programme will comprise Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Post
Jan.20,1917.

HOMER IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays New Work by Ballantine

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Louise Homer was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She sang two airs of Bach, "It Is Finished," from the Passion music according to St. John, and "Heart Ever Faithful," from the cantata "For God So Loved the World," and three songs by her husband, Sidney Homer: "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to Me, Sing," and "The Song of the Shirt." The orchestral pieces were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Wagner's Introduction and Bacchanal from Tannhauser (Paris version), and a new work by Edward Ballantine, of the music department of Harvard University, "The Eve of St. Agnes," symphonic poem after Keats.

INSPIRING SUBJECT

Mr. Ballantine's work does not consist in slavishly realistic treatment of episodes from Keats' poem. But there are melodic ideas definitely associated with certain fragments of the text. There is the suggestion of the night and the driven snow; of the charm, of the melancholy of the old Beadsman, etc. There are themes for Porphyro and Madileive. The most realistic moment is that of the "silver snarling trumpets" which "begin to chide." Here is the thought of the "hyena foemen." Later the themes thus stated are treated freely and with brilliant instrumentation, and sensuous love music brings the conclusion.

The subject is one calculated to inspire a composer to musical expression. Mr. Ballantine has been moved to such experiment, and certainly for his own good, since he has now heard his composition and can profit by the perspective. We personally think that he has undertaken to fill a frame that is larger than his present powers warrant. This composition is weak in invention and it lacks firmness of structure and force and originality in the development of the ideas.

Patch-Work Impression

What is pleasing is an evident refinement and poetic intention wholly appropriate to the matter in hand. But the ideas do not stand out each with a convincing physiognomy of its own, and, while the love themes have a pleasing curve and sufficiently colorful orchestration they are not original in character and there is seldom the impression of continuous thought. Rather is there the impression of patch-work.

This is a composition of a composer's formative period, chiefly valuable for what it teaches him. The work was played concientiously and brilliantly by Dr. Muck and his men. Tonight, when it is repeated, will be the anniversary of St. Agnes' Eve. After the performance there was cordial applause, and the composer, who was present, rose twice to bow his acknowledgements.

Mme. Homer Welcomed

There were other American compositions—witness the songs of Mr. Homer. The first two of these songs are mediocre. The third, "The Song of the Shirt," made an immediate impression by reason of its directness and force and the definiteness of the ideas. It was the one song of the three which justified orchestral setting, a setting very effective. But the song would stand whatever the nature of the accompaniment. Mr. Homer feels his text and interprets it in his own way. So doing, he moves his hearers. Mme. Homer sang with her wonted simplicity and sincerity, and was recalled repeatedly by the audience.

The performance of Schubert's symphony was a model of proportion, euphony, and dramatic eloquence. It is one of the greatest symphonic fragments in existence. It is the token of a genius who, if he had lived longer, might have obliged the world to listen to another Beethoven.

From the
POST
Jan.27,1917.

Cambridge Symphony

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. There will be no soloist. The programme will comprise Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Globe Jan.20,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"St Agnes Eve" New Work of Poetic Qualities

Mme Homer, Dramatic Singer, in Her Husband's Songs

The Symphony concert last night offered music familiar and new. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," a microscopic glass to enjoy the art of the virtuosi in the wood wind choir, is always a pleasure. Dr Muck paid it many deft and tender courtesies yesterday, keeping its music eternally fresh, buoyant, a pure spring of inspired song. Mme Homer, grown in vocal, and as the three grateful songs of Mr Homer denoted, also in interpretative powers, was a well received soloist.

The Paris version of the overtures and Bacchanale of "Tannhauser" was played with gorgeous beauty of color. One might have awaited, as in the theatre, to hear the voice of the knight awakening to the sound of bells. The Symphonic Poem, "The Eve of St Agnes," by Edward Ballantine, the instructor in the music department of Harvard University, was performed for the first time.

Mr Ballantine based his score upon Keats' poem of the saint whose name figures in religious legend, in the dreams of virgins and their divinations of a lover. Employing the subject, it is reassuring that Mr Ballantine has avoided the frequent sickly sentimentality of style of his literary inspiration. Without considering too literally the parallelism between Madeline, her lover, Porphyro, and the "hyena foemen"—a noble, swashbuckling phrase, one to set the teeth into—and their themes, also the Magic Spell, there is enjoyable music for itself.

Romantic Flavor

As a whole, the score has a romantic poetic flavor. The ideas have form and usually significance. There is characterization; ther are adroit and imaginative touches in orchestral color and in the harmonic scheme, although Mr Ballantine does not continually remind the hearer that he strives to outdo Stravinsky.

He does not effect dissonance for its own sake nor does he assume the mask of genius and end merely by being a bore or exhibiting bad taste. There are instances early in the work of fine transitions from mood to mood, effective contrasts, as of the foemen's introduction. Later, as in the love song, there would seem to be prolix development; there is nothing more of importance to be said and the close well could be hastened. Altogether a score with much to admire in spirit and execution. The composer was compelled to rise from his seat on the floor twice if not three times.

Mme Homer's Singing

Mme Homer sang two excerpts from Bach's music for the church service, the air "It Is Finished," from "The Passion According to St John," and the "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the cantata "God So Loved the World." Applause is incongruous after the first, nor is it appropriate for the concert hall, although noble in sustained line as in the dramatic passage. The second shows its hybrid character and is preferably for high voice.

Frederick Stock has orchestrated Mr Homer's three songs with a cunning hand, preserving their individuality, and in the last, the grimly sordid "Song of the Shirt," has given dramatic touches in orchestral detail, as the dissonant horn on the word "dirt" of the last stanza. The lyric, "From the Brake the Nightingale," and the rhapsodic "Sing to Me, Sing," called forth appropriate sentiment and a prodigal wealth of beautiful tone on long-spanned phrases from the singer.

In the last she became the dramatic interpreter and colorist with poignant intensity. Not within memory has an assisting singer at these concerts been heard only in the English language and Mme Homer's texts were heard having both clearness and character.

From the Herald Jan.28,1917.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. There will be no soloist. The program will comprise Franck's Symphony in D minor, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Transcript Jan.27,1917.

Thursday evening, Feb. 22, in Symphony Hall, a third concert by Mr. McCormack, the applauded tenor, along the lines above specified.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Symphony Hall, the fifteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke of the string choir playing the solo parts in Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello.

Saturday evening, Feb. 24, in Symphony Hall, the fifteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Brahms's double concerto as above noted.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 9, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and with Mr. Gebhard for the assisting pianist. Busoni's Chinese suite, "Turandot" for orchestra and assisting choir stands on the programme.

From the Transcript Jan.20.1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MME. HOMER AND A NEW TONE-POEM

The Singer Under Nervous Disadvantage and in None Too Happily Chosen Pieces —Mr. Ballantine's Music to Keats's "Eve of St. Agnes" — A Hard Task Variously Accomplished—Schubert and Wagner for Beginning and End

NOT to use the phrase despitefully, if there is an old hand of the opera house and the concert hall, it is Mme. Louise Homer. For eighteen years she has practiced her profession of singing-actress in the theatres of Europe and America; for almost as many she has been a familiar figure of the stage that is set only with orchestra or piano. Four times, as long ago as 1904, as recently as 1914, she has sung with the Symphony Orchestra here in Boston. Yet, when for the fifth occasion, she appeared in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, she was too nervous to do herself justice. That perturbation is the chronic malady of the "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts for which, as yet there is no remedy. Almost invariably it affects newcomers and for a few minutes last Saturday evening Mr. Spalding, the violinist, experienced a severe seizure; while Mr. McCormack—to sing with the orchestra early next month for the first time—is reported as already disclosing unmistakable symptoms. Sometimes there is no recovery from it, and to this day Mr. Ysaye, the violinist of many stages and many concerts, vows that he can never play at his best with the Symphony Orchestra behind him and the public of the Symphony Concerts before him. Again there are occasional relapses and it was such mischance that on Friday befell Mme. Homer—the more susceptible, perhaps, since she had three of her husband's songs among her numbers. Yet others more illustrious than she have experienced these disturbing tremors. Mme. Melba at the noon of her powers has confessed to them; the poised Mr. Kreisler does not deny them. Of such is the established prestige of the orchestra and the accepted prestige of the audiences—and there scrutiny may stop.

Mme. Homer's uneasiness disclosed itself in the usual fashion—in the dryness and even occasional sharpness, of tones that are normally warm, round and mellow, in sundry slips from the true pitch and in sedulous and unconcealed pains, especially with details, that deprived her singing of the customary freedom. In a sense she was herself, as the long and loud applause of that mistrusted audience testified, but it was an unstable, laboring and somewhat overclouded herself. Perhaps, too, other numbers would, from two points of view, have lent her more confidence and more freedom. She does well to search out the airs of Bach; but her first choice—music of sombre meditation from "The Passion According to John"—little impresses ear or imagination out of its place in the course and circumstance of the whole oratorio. Interjected into the concert of yesterday, it did no more than serve the darker colors of Mme. Homer's tones and her practised skill with broad declamatory phrases. Her second number from Bach—the more familiar "My Heart Ever Faithful" out of one of his last church cantatas—bears ill transposition from a soprano to an alto voice. So shifted, the music loses ardor, elasticity; while Mme. Homer's singing itself was not exactly plastic and ardent with the gladsome progressions. Moreover, in spite of all her honest zest with them, Mr. Sydney Homer's songs are hardly distinguished pieces, with or without the orchestral decoration and over-decoration Mr. Stock has bestowed upon them. The swift, expansive upward progressions of "Sing to Me, Sing" are a well-tried means to a sure effect, no less effective because it happens to be only a blur racing past ear and fancy. "The Song of the Shirt," in turn, is too simple commonplace and reiterated a ballad to bear the tone-poem in little that Mr. Homer has erected upon it with a tingling modulation as often as the text gave him remotest warrant for it. In fact, the far less aspiring and labored song of the nightingale and the rose—melancholy musing upon the transitory nature of all created things—better proved him a composer of pleasant lyrical invention and sensibility. Wifely zeal and rising confidence warmed Mme. Homer's tones in these final songs, and once again she sang in rich and long-spanned phrases. Her audience heard kindly.

The other adventure of the concert was Mr. Edward Ballantine's tone-poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," suggested and in some degree following the like-named verbal poetry of Keats. The verse teems with sensuous imagery, sensuous sensation, translated into streaming word, silver-splendent phrase and velvety or gleaming cadence. There are sensuous musics akin to it, such as Strauss, for example, has written in "Don Juan," or Stravinsky in parts of "The Fire-Bird" and "The Nightingale," or Wagner in the rites of the grail in "Parsifal." Keats's poetry, in and out of "The Eve of St. Agnes," may well tempt composers to translate the sensuous sensation that pulses endlessly through it into a medium that can be, at a tone-poet's hand, yet more sensuous. But the anomaly—repeated time and again in all the arts—is that the composer who essays the translation may be, so far as his work discloses him, obviously lacking in the essential sensuousness of mind and will, invention and imagination. Not by meditation alone, not by carefully considered means, not by expert application of them, may the suggestion of sensuous verse pass into the suggestion of sensuous tones. With the best will and the keenest application in the world, Mr. Ballantine seems not of the temperament that achieves "Don Juans," "Fire-Birds" or even "Eves of St. Agnes."

Thoughtfully the composer apprehends every image, every impression of which was to Keats a sensuous tremor radiating as sensuous a melody. Thoughtfully, he sets about the making of the design, the assembling and the working of the means by which these sensations shall pour through him into his music. He gains his end, as it seems by a curious mingling of insistent will and adroit procedure, at the beginning of the tone-poem in the music of the still, silvery, glinting cold; in the music that weaves the spell by which maidens on St. Agnes's Eve—this very night by the way—may vision their lovers. The means are ultra-modern in harmonic and instrumental color, in play with chord and progression; imagination utilizes them; the impression is keen, subtle, sensuous, mysterious. Thence forward, however, the tone-poem withers into thoughtful ingenuity, making discriminating use of artful resource. Madeline is appropriately defined rather than glowingly visioned in her white fires. There is large stress upon a conflict "of foemen" that is more of the composer's than of Keats's imagining, since the formula for a symphonic poem and of orthodoxy in music in general insists upon contrasting passages. There is final love-music, as of Madeline and her knight, but music that lacks tingling eagerness and piercing elation, that is of mental rather than spiritual process. (Besides, the figures of Keats's imagining were by no means bodiless). In a word, once past cold and spell, which praise him, Mr. Ballantine's music misses the moonlit shimmer, the silvery melody, the passion white and virginal in youth as well as maid that are the sensuous beauty, the sensuous thrill of "The Eve of St. Agnes." As he should he has written a finely-tempered and finely-fibred music—that for most of the way gives off cerebral, not sensuous impression. It lacks the molten silver which in the poem was Keats's ink.

There was no lack of sensuous quality in the repertory piece that began the concert, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, or of sensual quality in the repertory piece that ended it, the abbreviated version of the overture to "Tannhauser" as Wagner joined it to his mature and Parisian music of the Venusberg. Neither, however, was played—as few are in Dr. Muck's day—after the manner of a repertory piece. In fact, the Unfinished Symphony, like Beethoven's eighth symphony of three weeks ago, deserves more to be counted among the finer virtuoso pieces of orchestra and conductor than three "Españas" or six "Spanish Caprices." Where in these virtuoso pieces with intention so to be, may the wood-wind choir play with such loveliness of translucent tone, with such perfection of euphonious phrase as they may through music of Schubert? Where may the strings flow in such perfectly rhythmed tone? Where may the conductor seem more the master who finds the animating and distinctive voice for motive and melody and then leads it, like some radiant figure of even Keats's imagining, through the lights and shades of Schubert's fancy and Schubert's feeling that welled on the instant into the making of music? A few have said that Dr. Muck's insistence upon the flawlessly exact phrase stays the flight of such a lyric music as Schubert's. Rather it mounts higher on such sure and gleaming wing.

Some like to flatter themselves—and impress others—with the belief that they have outgrown Schubert. As well outgrow the pleasures of spring sunshine, spring air, spring impulses, spring melancholy, for with all the undernote of passing passion and pain, the Unfinished Symphony sings a springtime music. Some also flatter themselves that they have outgrown the very different music of the Venusberg—conventional Wagner, conventional nineteenth-century romanticism, conventional eroticism of the opera house. But who before or who since has written such music of impulses and excitements that are not less human because even the arts usually hush them, or satiated them out of the imaginative power of music that first kindles and then burns them away? No: the Venusberg music is unique in a kind that even the super-sensual generation presumed to follow Wagner, has not remotely attained. And the Paris version is not a new one, as it was possible to hear in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, "made by the French on account of the war." And for thirty long years there has been a programme-book.

H. T. P.

From the Globe Jan.21,1917.

Last Tuesday evening a special concert was given at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Vacation Association by Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this is what Pitts Sanborn of the New York Globe says about "our band": I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening! In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssohn and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them, suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Tour of Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its January trip of a week to the Middle West. Its first concert will be given in Syracuse tomorrow evening, then it will proceed in order to Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. It will return direct from Detroit to Boston arriving here next Sunday evening.

From the Journal Jan.27.1917.

M'CORMACK TO BE STAR WITH THE SYMPHONY

Famous Tenor to Sing Classic Airs at Concerts Next Week.

John McCormack will make his first appearance as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

As Mr. McCormack has long excelled in the singing of the suave music of the 18th century, it is but natural that he should go to Mozart and Handel for his selections. His first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-set opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin "Per Pieta non Ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

M'CORMACK WEEK

The week of Feb. 18 may well be considered, musically speaking, McCormack week, for the popular tenor is to give four concerts in eight days at Symphony Hall. These concerts will be given Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18, Tuesday evening, Feb. 20, Thursday evening, Feb. 22 and Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. These will be McCormack's only appearances in Boston this season.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday. The program comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Monitor Jan.27.1917.

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

John McCormack, tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the thirteenth pair of concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His first number will be an air from Mozart's one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin "Per pietà non ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's "Acis and Galatea." The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme by Hiller, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will comprise César Franck's symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Record Jan. 26,1917.

The great event in the near future at Symphony Hall, however, is the sixth appearance of John McCormack, the Irish tenor. Mr. McCormack will sing as soloist with the Symphony Friday and Saturday of next week. He will sing arias by Mozart and Handel. The invitation to the Irish tenor is a well deserved honor, his friends think. He is so essentially the singer for the people—for whom he sings ballads which make an immediate and obvious appeal—that one is sometimes inclined to forget his rare artistry. Few singers on the stage today are blessed with a finer natural voice, few sing with more consideration of the rule of singing that Mr. McCormack.

He has often offended by choice of songs, but that one artistic sin should not ostracize him from occasional appearances with America's finest band of instrumentalists. His four other appearances will be on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18; Tuesday evening, Feb. 20; Thursday evening, Feb. 22, and Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. These will be McCormack's only recital appearances in Boston this season.

From the Globe Jan.27,1917.

John McCormack Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

John McCormack, the popular tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As Mr McCormack has long excelled in the singing of the suave music of the 18th century, it is but natural that he should go to Mozart and Handel for his composers.

His first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin "Per Pieta non Ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overtures to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a "Merry Theme," by Hiller, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

ENQUIRER

ess: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 24 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

Under the able direction of Dr. Karl Muck, pronounced by many critics as the world's foremost orchestral conductor, the company of accomplished musicians comprising the Boston Symphony orchestra, delighted a capacity audience of music lovers in Elmwood Music hall last evening.

Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39, an elaborate composition by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, was the first number on the programme. This was in four parts. In the first was brought out the wonderful tonal qualities of Dr. Muck's organization. The strings, predominating in the initial passages, lead to a crescendo climax of the theme by full orchestra. Part two, Adante, E flat, major, contains a beautiful motive, with melody for horn, delicately assisted by violins and harp. In part three, the themes are treated capriciously. In the finale, most prominent of the movements is the mood of lamentation, followed by an overpowering climax, tempestously passionate.

The ovation accorded Dr. Muck at the conclusion of this Sibelius presentation must have warmed his heart. Such scenes as was that ovation are not common to Elmwood Music hall, and not typical of Buffalo audiences.

The second number on the programme, the overture to Richard Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman," a familiar work, must have been selected as the chief medium for bringing out the full individual and collective talents of the Boston Symphony.

Brahm's "Variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56-a", was no exception to the skillful presentation resulting from each effort. The theme, adopted by Brahms from Haydn's unpublished collection, is a masterly one of complex nature, and, as read by Dr. Muck last night, delighted every hearer.

Tte closing number was the overture to Von Weber's romantic opera, "Oberon." Violins predominate in the first part, and throughout the composition there is shown constantly that perfect execution, that instant response from lead instruments to smallest minor parts, to the direction of the conductor, and the thorough artistry of every cog in the Boston machine of classic music, that has always featured its concerts.

LEADER

ss: Pittsburgh, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Coming Here Soon

Two of the world's greatest orchestras are to visit Pittsburg this month, and noteworthy programs will be presented by each.

On Wednesday evening, January 24, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players will give the closing concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie Music hall, and on Monday evening, January 29, and Tuesday afternoon, January 30, the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, will give the third pair of concerts in the Pittsburg Orchestra association series.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra for its annual visit in January is always a notable event, and this season it promises to attract even greater interest than before owing to the exceptional program to be given by Dr. Karl Muck, which is announced here for the first time, and the following numbers are sure to arouse enthusiasm.

Sibelius .....

Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39

Beethoven.....

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

Brahms .....Variations

on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56

Debussy .....

(Prelude to the Afeternoon of a Faun.)

Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune.

Chabrier .....

..."Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra

[72]

From the Globe Jan.20,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"St Agnes Eve" New Work of Poetic Qualities

Mme Homer, Dramatic Singer, in Her Husband's Songs

The Symphony concert last night offered music familiar and new. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," a microscopic glass to enjoy the art of the virtuosi in the wood wind choir, is always a pleasure. Dr Muck paid it many deft and tender courtesies yesterday, keeping its music eternally fresh, buoyant, a pure spring of inspired song. Mme Homer, grown in vocal, and as the three grateful songs of Mr Homer denoted, also in interpretative powers, was a well received soloist.

The Paris version of the overtures and Bacchanale of "Tannhauser" was played with gorgeous beauty of color. One might have awaited, as in the theatre, to hear the voice of the knight awakening to the sound of bells. The Symphonic Poem, "The Eve of St Agnes," by Edward Ballantine, the instructor in the music department of Harvard University, was performed for the first time.

Mr Ballantine based his score upon Keats' poem of the saint whose name figures in religious legend, in the dreams of virgins and their divinations of a lover. Employing the subject, it is reassuring that Mr Ballantine has avoided the frequent sickly sentimentality of style of his literary inspiration. Without considering too literally the parallelism between Madeline, her lover, Porphyro, and the "hyena foemen"—a noble, swashbuckling phrase, one to set the teeth into—and their themes, also the Magic Spell, there is enjoyable music for itself.

Romantic Flavor

As a whole, the score has a romantic poetic flavor. The ideas have form and usually significance. There is characterization; ther are adroit and imaginative touches in orchestral color and in the harmonic scheme, although Mr Ballantine does not continually remind the hearer that he strives to outdo Stravinsky.

He does not effect dissonance for its own sake nor does he assume the mask of genius and end merely by being a bore or exhibiting bad taste. There are instances early in the work of fine transitions from mood to mood, effective contrasts, as of the foemen's introduction. Later, as in the love song, there would seem to be prolix development; there is nothing more of importance to be said and the close well could be hastened. Altogether a score with much to admire in spirit and execution. The composer was compelled to rise from his seat on the floor twice if not three times.

Mme Homer's Singing

Mme Homer sang two excerpts from Bach's music for the church service, the air "It Is Finished," from "The Passion According to St John," and the "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the cantata "God So Loved the World." Applause is incongruous after the first, nor is it appropriate for the concert hall, although noble in sustained line as in the dramatic passage. The second shows its hybrid character and is preferably for high voice.

Frederick Stock has orchestrated Mr Homer's three songs with a cunning hand, preserving their individuality, and in the last, the grimly sordid "Song of the Shirt," has given dramatic touches in orchestral detail, as the dissonant horn on the word "dirt" of the last stanza. The lyric, "From the Brake the Nightingale," and the rhapsodic "Sing to Me, Sing," called forth appropriate sentiment and a prodigal wealth of beautiful tone on long-spanned phrases from the singer.

In the last she became the dramatic interpreter and colorist with poignant intensity. Not within memory has an assisting singer at these concerts been heard only in the English language and Mme Homer's texts were heard having both clearness and character.

From the Herald Jan.28,1917.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. There will be no soloist. The program will comprise Franck's Symphony in D minor, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Transcript Jan.27,1917.

Thursday evening, Feb. 22, in Symphony Hall, a third concert by Mr. McCormack, the applauded tenor, along the lines above specified.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Symphony Hall, the fifteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke of the string choir playing the solo parts in Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello.

Saturday evening, Feb. 24, in Symphony Hall, the fifteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Brahms's double concerto as above noted.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 9, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and with Mr. Gebhard for the assisting pianist. Busoni's Chinese suite, "Turandot" for orchestra and assisting choir stands on the programme.

From the Transcript Jan.20.1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MME. HOMER AND A NEW TONE-POEM

The Singer Under Nervous Disadvantage and in None Too Happily Chosen Pieces —Mr. Ballantine's Music to Keats's "Eve of St. Agnes" — A Hard Task Variously Accomplished—Schubert and Wagner for Beginning and End

NOT to use the phrase despitefully, if there is an old hand of the opera house and the concert hall, it is Mme. Louise Homer. For eighteen years she has practiced her profession of singing-actress in the theatres of Europe and America; for almost as many she has been a familiar figure of the stage that is set only with orchestra or piano. Four times, as long ago as 1904, as recently as 1914, she has sung with the Symphony Orchestra here in Boston. Yet, when for the fifth occasion, she appeared in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, she was too nervous to do herself justice. That perturbation is the chronic malady of the "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts for which, as yet there is no remedy. Almost invariably it affects newcomers and for a few minutes last Saturday evening Mr. Spalding, the violinist, experienced a severe seizure; while Mr. McCormack—to sing with the orchestra early next month for the first times—is reported as already disclosing unmistakable symptoms. Sometimes there is no recovery from it, and to this day Mr. Ysaye, the violinist of many stages and many concerts, vows that he can never play at his best with the Symphony Orchestra behind him and the public of the Symphony Concerts before him. Again there are occasional relapses and it was such mischance that on Friday befell Mme. Homer—the more susceptible, perhaps, since she had three of her husband's songs among her numbers. Yet others more illustrious than she have experienced these disturbing tremors. Mme. Melba at the noon of her powers has confessed to them; the poised Mr. Kreisler does not deny them. Of such is the established prestige of the orchestra and the accepted prestige of the audiences—and there scrutiny may stop.

Mme. Homer's uneasiness disclosed itself in the usual fashion—in the dryness and even occasional sharpness, of tones that are normally warm, round and mellow, in sundry slips from the true pitch and in sedulous and unconcealed pains, especially with details, that deprived her singing of the customary freedom. In a sense she was herself, as the long and loud applause of that mistrusted audience testified, but it was an unstable, labering and somewhat overclouded herself. Perhaps, too, other numbers would, from two points of view, have lent her more confidence and more freedom. She does well to search out the airs of Bach: but her first choice—music of sombre meditation from "The Passion According to John"—little impresses ear or imagination out of its place in the course and circumstance of the whole oratorio. Interjected into the concert of yesterday, it did no more than serve the darker colors of Mme. Homer's tones and her practised skill with broad declamatory phrases. Her second number from Bach—the more familiar "My Heart Ever Faithful" out of one of his last church cantatas—bears ill transposition from a soprano to an alto voice. So shifted, the music loses ardor, elasticity; while Mme. Homer's singing itself was not exactly plastic and ardent with the gladsome progressions. Moreover, in spite of all her honest zest with them, Mr. Sydney Homer's songs are hardly distinguished pieces, with or without the orchestral decoration and over-decoration Mr. Stock has bestowed upon them. The swift, expansive upward progressions of "Sing to Me, Sing" are a well-tried means to a sure effect, no less effective because it happens to be only a blur racing past ear and fancy. "The Song of the Shirt," in turn, is too simple commonplace and reiterated a ballad to bear the tone-poem in little that Mr. Homer has erected upon it with a tingling modulation as often as the text gave him remotest warrant for it. In fact, the far less aspiring and labored song of the nightingale and the rose—melancholy musing upon the transitory nature of all created things—better proved him a composer of pleasant lyrical invention and sensibility. Wifely zeal and rising confidence warmed Mme. Homer's tones in these final songs, and once again she sang in rich and long-spanned phrases. Her audience heard kindly.

The other adventure of the concert was Mr. Edward Ballantine's tone-poem, "The Eve of St. Agnes," suggested and in some degree following the like-named verbal poetry of Keats. The verse teems with sensuous imagery, sensuous sensation, translated into streaming word, silver-splendent phrase and velvety or gleaming cadence. There are sensuous musics akin to it, such as Strauss, for example, has written in "Don Juan," or Stravinsky in parts of "The Fire-Bird" and "The Nightingale," or Wagner in the rites of the grail in "Parsifal." Keats's poetry, in and out of "The Eve of St. Agnes," may well tempt composers to translate the sensuous sensation that pulses endlessly through it into a medium that can be, at a tone-poet's hand, yet more sensuous. But the anomaly —repeated time and again in all the arts—is that the composer who essays the translation may be, so far as his work discloses him, obviously lacking in the essential sensuousness of mind and will, invention and imagination. Not by meditation alone, not by carefully considered means, not by expert application of them, may the suggestion of sensuous verse pass into the suggestion of sensuous tones. With the best will and the keenest application in the world, Mr. Ballantine seems not of the temperament that achieves "Don Juans," "Fire-Birds" or even "Eves of St. Agnes."

Thoughtfully the composer apprehends [illegible] etry, every image, every implication of which was to Keats a sensuous tremor undulating as sensuous a melody. Thoughtfully, he sets about the making of the design, the assembling and the working of the means by which these sensations shall pour through him into his music. He gains his end, as it seems by a curious mingling of insistent will and adroit procedure, at the beginning of the tone-poem in the music of the still, silvery, glinting cold; in the music that weaves the spell by which maidens on St. Agnes's Eve—this very night by the way—may vision their lovers. The means are ultra-modern in harmonic and instrumental color, in play with chord and progression; imagination utilizes them; the impression is keen, subtle, sensuous, mysterious. Thence forward, however, the tone-poem withers into thoughtful ingenuity, making discriminating use of artful resource. Madeline is appropriately defined rather than glowingly visioned in her white fires. There is large stress upon a conflict "of foemen" that is more of the composer's than of Keats's imagining, since the formula for a symphonic poem and of orthodoxy in music in general insists upon contrasting passages. There is final love-music, as of Madeline and her knight, but music that lacks tingling eagerness and piercing elation, that is of mental rather than spiritual process. (Besides, the figures of Keats's imagining were by no means bodiless). In a word, once past cold and spell, which praise him, Mr. Ballantine's music misses the moonlit shimmer, the silvery melody, the passion white and virginal in youth as well as maid that are the sensuous beauty, the sensuous thrill of "The Eve of St. Agnes." As he should he has written a finely-tempered and finely-fibred music—that for most of the way gives off cerebral, not sensuous impression. It lacks the molten silver which in the poem was Keats's ink.

There was no lack of sensuous quality in the repertory piece that began the concert, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, or of sensual quality in the repertory piece that ended it, the abbreviated version of the overture to "Tannhauser" as Wagner joined it to his mature and Parisian music of the Venusberg. Neither, however, was played—as few are in Dr. Muck's day—after the manner of a repertory piece. In fact, the Unfinished Symphony, like Beethoven's eighth symphony of three weeks ago, deserves more to be counted among the finer virtuoso pieces of orchestra and conductor than three "Españas" or six "Spanish Caprices." Where in these virtuoso pieces with intention so to be, may the wood-wind choir play with such loveliness of translucent tone, with such perfection of euphonious phrase as they may through music of Schubert? Where may the strings flow in such perfectly rhythmed tone? Where may the conductor seem more the master who finds the animating and distinctive voice for motive and melody and then leads it, like some radiant figure of even Keats's imagining, through the lights and shades of Schubert's fancy and Schubert's feeling that welled on the instant into the making of music? A few have said that Dr. Muck's insistence upon the flawlessly exact phrase stays the flight of such a lyric music as Schubert's. Rather it mounts higher on such sure and gleaming wing.

Some like to flatter themselves—and impress others—with the belief that they have outgrown Schubert. As well outgrow the pleasures of spring sunshine, spring air, spring impulses, spring melancholy, for with all the undernote of passing passion and pain, the Unfinished Symphony sings a springtime music. Some also flatter themselves that they have outgrown the very different music of the Venusberg —conventional Wagner, conventional nineteenth-century romanticism, conventional eroticism of the opera house. But who before or who since has written such music of impulses and excitements that are not less human because even the arts usually hush them, or satiated them out of the imaginative power of music that first kindles and then burns them away? No: the Venusberg music is unique in a kind that even the super-sensual generation presumed to follow Wagner, has not remotely attained. And the Paris version is not a new one, as it was possible to hear in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, "made by the French on account of the war." And for thirty long years there has been a programme-book.

H. T. P.

From the Globe Jan.21,1917.

Last Tuesday evening a special concert was given at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Vacation Association by Paderewski, Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this is what Pitts Sanborn of the New York Globe says about "our band": I have been hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra since childhood and am not likely to be bowled over now by any of its miracles. But last evening! In the three orchestral pieces and in the accompaniments to the violin concerto of Mendelssohn and the piano concerto of Schumann the performance of the orchestra was simply marvellous, amazing, astounding, bewildering, stunning, flabbergasting, dumfounding, electrifying, staggering, overwhelming, and the rest of them, suppose some would say the incomparable band played "on its mettle." Why spout further vocables in an effort to convey an impression which nothing but the Boston Symphony Orchestra can convey? After all these years of it I heard it as for the first time.

Tour of Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on its January trip of a week to the Middle West. Its first concert will be given in Syracuse tomorrow evening, then it will proceed in order to Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. It will return direct from Detroit to Boston arriving here next Sunday evening.

From the Journal Jan.27,1917.

M'CORMACK TO BE STAR WITH THE SYMPHONY

Famous Tenor to Sing Classic Airs at Concerts Next Week.

John McCormack will make his first appearance as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

As Mr. McCormack has long excelled in the singing of the suave music of the 18th century, it is but natural that he should go to Mozart and Handel for his selections. His first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-set opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin "Per Pieta non Ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

M'CORMACK WEEK

The week of Feb. 18 may well be considered, musically speaking, McCormack week, for the popular tenor is to give four concerts in eight days at Symphony Hall. These concerts will be given Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18, Tuesday evening, Feb. 20, Thursday evening, Feb. 22 and Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. These will be McCormack's only appearances in Boston this season.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday. The program comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Monitor Jan.27.1917.

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

John McCormack, tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the thirteenth pair of concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His first number will be an air from Mozart's one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin "Per pietà non ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing?" from Handel's "Acis and Galatea." The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme by Hiller, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will comprise César Franck's symphony in D minor, Richard Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From the Record Jan. 26,1917.

The great event in the near future at Symphony Hall, however, is the sixth appearance of John McCormack, the Irish tenor. Mr. McCormack will sing as soloist with the Symphony Friday and Saturday of next week. He will sing arias by Mozart and Handel. The invitation to the Irish tenor is a well deserved honor, his friends think. He is so essentially the singer for the people—for whom he sings ballads which make an immediate and obvious appeal—that one is sometimes inclined to forget his rare artistry. Few singers on the stage today are blessed with a finer natural voice, few sing with more consideration of the rule of singing that Mr. McCormack.

He has often offended by choice of songs, but that one artistic sin should not ostracize him from occasional appearances with America's finest band of instrumentalists. His four other appearances will be on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18; Tuesday evening, Feb. 20; Thursday evening, Feb. 22, and Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. These will be McCormack's only recital appearances in Boston this season.

From the Globe Jan.27,1917.

John McCormack Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

John McCormack, the popular tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As Mr McCormack has long excelled in the singing of the suave music of the 18th century, it is but natural that he should go to Mozart and Handel for his composers.

His first number will be an air from Mozart's little one-act opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," the words of which begin, "Per Pieta non Ricercate." His second number will be the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," followed by the air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overtures to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a "Merry Theme," by Hiller, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

ENQUIRER

ess: Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible] 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

Under the able direction of Dr. Karl Muck, pronounced by many critics as the world's foremost orchestral conductor, the company of accomplished musicians comprising the Boston Symphony orchestra, delighted a capacity audience of music lovers in Elmwood Music hall last evening.

Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39, an elaborate composition by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, was the first number on the programme. This was in four parts. In the first was brought out the wonderful tonal qualities of Dr. Muck's organization. The strings, predominating in the initial passages, lead to a crescendo climax of the theme by full orchestra. Part two, Adante, E flat, major, contains a beautiful motive, with melody for horn, delicately assisted by violins and harp. In part three, the themes are treated capriciously. In the finale, most prominent of the movements is the mood of lamentation, followed by an overpowering climax, tempestously passionate.

The ovation accorded Dr. Muck at the conclusion of this Sibelius presentation must have warmed his heart. Such scenes as was that ovation are not common to Elmwood Music hall, and not typical of Buffalo audiences.

The second number on the programme, the overture to Richard Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman," a familiar work, must have been selected as the chief medium for bringing out the full individual and collective talents of the Boston Symphony.

Brahm's "Variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56-a", was no exception to the skillful presentation resulting from each effort. The theme, adopted by Brahms from Haydn's unpublished collection, is a masterly one of complex nature, and, as read by Dr. Muck last night, delighted every hearer.

Tte closing number was the overture to Von Weber's romantic opera, "Oberon." Violins predominate in the first part, and throughout the composition there is shown constantly that perfect execution, that instant response from lead instruments to smallest minor parts, to the direction of the conductor, and the thorough artistry of every cog in the Boston machine of classic music, that has always featured its concerts.

LEADER

ss: Pittsburgh, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Coming Here Soon

Two of the world's greatest orchestras are to visit Pittsburg this month, and noteworthy programs will be presented by each.

On Wednesday evening, January 24, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players will give the closing concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie Music hall, and on Monday evening, January 29, and Tuesday afternoon, January 30, the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, will give the third pair of concerts in the Pittsburg Orchestra association series.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra for its annual visit in January is always a notable event, and this season it promises to attract even greater interest than before owing to the exceptional program to be given by Dr. Karl Muck, which is announced here for the first time, and the following numbers are sure to arouse enthusiasm.

Sibelius .....

Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39

Beethoven.....

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

Brahms .....Variations

on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56

Debussy .....

(Prelude to the Afeternoon of a Faun.)

Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune.

Chabrier .....

... Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra

[72]

m POST HAND

dress: Syracuse, N.

JAN 23 1917

PACK WIETING TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONISTS

Record Concert Crowd Delighted With Recital Conducted by Dr. Karl Muck.

NEUTRAL PROGRAMME GIVEN

One Number Is French; Others by Brahms and Wagner, Germans Noted for Their Musical Fued, and by Russian Borodin.

BY GEORGE L. MAC DONNELL.

IN a biting Arctic wind and falling snow more than 200 men, women and even children stood in line for nearly two hours last night waiting for the doors of the Wieting Opera House to open for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. And such a concert was worth waiting for, even in the shadow of an iceberg. It was the most expressive orchestral recital ever heard in Syracuse.

That good music in this city is no longer considered a luxury, but a necessity, was amply demonstrated by the attendance, which in numbers, applause and reverent attention paid an honor to Syracuse and showed its appreciation for the famous orchestra from the Hub. There was not a vacant seat in the house, and the attendance was said to be the largest ever seen at a similar concert here. That the alleged economic havoc caused by the high cost of living had any affect on the attendance was not discernible and emphasizes the former statement that the best in music is demanded by Syracuse.

A Neutral Programme.

The concert programme combined a symphony and overture from two of the most illustrious German composers, Brahms and Wagner, the parties to one of the most historic musical feuds on record and which continues even to the present time between the respective adherents of the composers. And it is a coincidence in referring to this feud that it arose over the appearance of the symphony of Brahms which was the premier number on last night's programme.

The two other numbers consisted of an overture by the French composer, Berlioz, and the almost unknown Russian, Borodin. It may have been a diplomatic stroke on the part of the Teuton, Dr. Muck, so to constitute the programme, two representing the allies and two the German empire, for it would seem the proper thing in a neutral country. On the other hand, some might take exception to the placing of Brahms and Wagner on the same programme for the reason that there was trouble between them. Wagner accused Brahms of plagiarism in his symphony No. 1, which was played last night.

Plagiarism Charged.

It was charged that he stole the theme from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. While there is a striking similarity in some harmonies of both, those who have repeatedly heard and studied each find that the theme, construction and other elements of the symphony of Brahms are divergent. Wagner was simply jealous of Brahms, just as some of the modern musicians of smaller caliber cavil over their respective qualities and knowledge. These little ones, however, can take consolation in having for their prototypes such men as Wagner and Brahms.

Dr. Muck did not come to his rostrum on the stage until nearly 8.30 o'clock. All of his 100 performers were seated. Every eye in the vast audience was strained for several minutes, waiting to see the far-famed conductor of the wonderful organization. Some of the old-time opera goers and patrons of orchestral concerts must have been disappointed in his appearance. Dressed in the most conventional manner and looking physically like the son-in-law of President Wilson, Secretary McAdoo, Dr. Muck impressed the audience as being a man with a pronounced personality expressing the great mentality behind it. He seemed like a typical American business man as the audience broke into a storm of applause.

(Concluded from Page Six.)

No Flowing Locks or Scarf.

He is clean shaven, short haired and well groomed. The old timers may have missed the long-haired conductor of the olden days who interlaced his rotund digits in a bristling pompadour and affected the poetic conceit of a flowing scarf. Slovenliness has no place to-day in art. It never did, but it almost became a custom among some of the great masters.

Dr. Muck is a conductor of the new school, but combines the best in the old. He typifies the raison d'etre for the incomparable excellence of his orchestra. From the descent of the baton every instrument becomes an integral part of one vast harmonious machine. He is the center which radiates the musical nerves which respond to his presence and whose ear is attuned to every chord, phrase and melody sounded by every individual instrument. He is a man with a message vitalized by his orchestra.

Gem of Musical Architecture.

The opening number on last night's programme, Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, was rendered with exquisite effects in each movement. This is regarded as one of the gems of musical architecture. It has even been styled architecture in motion, so intricate are the movements at times and so melting in its diminuendos and pianissimos. The first movement starts in an austere style and is a mine of pystique melodies that seem at first to confuse the ear, but to the initiated the movement is but a mystical prologue to the greatest harmonies that were ever brought into symphonic form.

Technicians may find loopholes for criticism in the merging of one movement into another and all such technical fault finding. They may talk of contrapuntal effects, nuances and musicianship, but it is the spirit of pedantry that makes such criticisms. To enjoy a symphony such as that of Brahms it is not necessary to take a dissecting table to the concert.

A Torrent of Harmony.

The real way to enjoy such productions is to sit and listen, become deluged with the torrent of harmony and do the dissecting afterward. It is as the beauty of some classic minster or cathedral, which must be seen as a whole to be enjoyed.

The third movement of the symphony was one of the brilliant features of last night's concert, closing with a triumphant flourish that simply electrified the audience. There were no explosive tones. The execution was marked by masterly graduations of tone, while the swells and decrescendos produced thrilling effects.

The Berlioz overture to the Corsair, Op. 2L, which has seldom if ever been heard here before, was typically a production of the master of programme music and to whom is attributed the genesis of modern orchestra instrumentation. Berlioz is considered one of the most illustrated of French composers, but his works are of the filligree kind, replete with beauty and color, and as some of his enemies claim, lack ideas or substance.

Founded on Byron's Poem.

Whether this is the case, it is certain that his overture to the Corsair, founded on Lord Byron's poem of that name, was rendered in a style that showed the work to be as full af animation, variety and color as a Parisian boulevard. It has almost an Italian tempo and, perhaps, too much of the staccato quality. But that may be justified by the theme on which the concert was constructed, for it has long been established that the rythm of Byron's poetry has always appealed more to Frenchmen and Celts than to his own fellow countrymen.

This number seemed to give an unusual pleasure to the audience, who were attracted by the tempo and the animation. It was thoroughly Berliosque. The third number, unheard of to nearly the entire audience, was an orchestral sketch entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," by Borodin, a Russian. It was a charming insertion prior to the all-resounding overture of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was a melange of Russian folk songs and Oriental melodies. The peasant's lute sounded far away, and soothing, and as the harmonious sounds drew closer and merged with the Asiatic melodies produced a wonderful and thrilling effect.

Wagner Number as Finale.

The concert closed with the Wagner number, which was rendered in a style that might have made Wagner himself envious. "The Flying Dutchman" is based on one of the most interesting and romantic sea legends on record. In the opening of the overture is seen in forcible style the claim that Wagnerites make for their master as the author of the "music of nature" and the "music of the future."

What the music of the future may be is as tangible just at present as is the nebular hypothesis, but that the music of nature is peculiarly Wagnerian there is no question. In the overture rendered last night there is produced by the drums, cymbals and all the instruments the loud-resounding sea as it beats on a rock-ribbed coast, the forests torn by the shrieking of the wind and a general cataclysmic effect in nature. The storm fantasy becomes almost realistic as one watches the forest of boughs as they bend, rush backward and forward like mighty elms or oaks in a forest. The music, like most of Wagner's, is wild, weird and wanton at times, but always full of elegant harmony. At times it may sound chaotic, but it is the chaos of melody and consonance. Some call it the dissonance of harmony, while Wagner calls it the "cry of the mind." Wagner, probably, expressed the idea better than anybody else. The overture was a fitting close to an unusual musical evening.

That such concerts have an enlightening influence on the public must not be forgotten. The public is indebted to the Morning Musicals and the Salon Musicals for bringing such organizations as the Boston Symphony to Syracuse. It was one of the many that have come here this winter and there are more coming.

To Miss A. Kathleen King and Miss Laura Van Kuran must be given credit for their enterprise in the presentation of these concerts. Their enterprise is one of culture and refinement and makes for social security.

EVENING NEWS

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 20 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ANNUAL BUFFALO CONCERT TUESDAY NIGHT AT MUSIC HALL

Noted Conductor of Community Singing at Hutchinson High School Saturday Night, January 27—Solo Quartet for Elijah Performance at May Festival—Cleveland Organist at Free Organ Concert—Damrosch to Play Lenore Raff Symphony at February Concert—Henry Zeintz and William Walsh Give Tomorrow's Recital at South Park High School—Shattuck-Glenn Concert at Twentieth Century Club January 30—Church Choir Music—Ratan Devi Sings Thursday Afternoon Next at Twentieth Century Club.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra wil be given in Elmwood Music hall next Tuesday evening, January 23, at 8:15. This is the third of the very interesting series of subscription concerts which Mrs. Mai Davis Smith arranged for the current season. Since October, 1905, when the orchestra returned after an absence of 12 years, it has been an annual visitor in this city and its coming (which almost goes without saying) is always welcome. Whatever may be the character of a series of concerts, when one is by the Boston Symphony orchestra that must always make the climax, for with this wonderful organization one reaches the perfection of ensemble playing, which in the end is the highest point attainable in music.

The orchestra gives in Buffalo the second concert of its annual Western trip this year, the other cities visited being Syracuse, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. It brings its entire personnel and, of course, its great conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will come with it.

The program is one which should give great pleasure to the patrons of the concerts. It comprises the First Symphony in E Minor of the Finnish composor, Sibelius; Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination. He is a follower of none of the schools of today. True, he casts his early symphonies in the classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. Like all musicians who come from the far north of Europe, his music reflects to a certain degree the characteristics of his land and his people.

Much sea music has been written but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of Nature into tone. So far as sea music is concerned one has only to recall the opening act of "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The early part of his great love tragedy he is writing of a summer sea, glinting in the sunshine. In the "Flying Dutchman" overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The overture, in a sense, like most of his overtures, and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of "Das Ewig-Weibliche" as personified by Senta.

Ordinarily variations are used to display the learning of musical pedants and have as little interest as such music naturally might have. The great exception to the rule was Brahms who delighted in this form of composition and succeeded in it as no other composer has. On the quaint Chorale of St. Anthony written by Haydn, Brahms has built a series of variations which hold the attention most closely and incidentally demand the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra.

The final number, the "Oberon" overture of Weber, is familiar to all concert-goers. It is one of the three great overtures written by this genius which are among the most precious legacies of the past.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Sibelius. Symphony No. 1 in E-Minor
Wagner. Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman"
Brahms. Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Opus 56a Weber. Overture to the opera, "Oberon"

m GAZETTE TIMES

dress: Pittsburg, Pa.

e JAN 21 1917

Orchestra Treats in Store.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, January 24, will mark the close of the fourth season of Ellis Concerts in Carnegie Music Hall. Again on January 29 and 30, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Conductor Leopold Stokowski will give the third pair of concerts in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Heinrich Warnke.

First Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

always an unusual treat, and the program announced here for the first time, promises even greater pleasure than any previous visit during the past three seasons. The works to be performed represent five of the most favorite composers. They follow:

Sibelius..Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39
Beethoven .....
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Brahms ..... Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56
Debussy.....Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune—(The Afternoon of a Faun)
Chabrier..."Espana." Rhapsody for Orchestra

EXPRESS

ess: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 20

Boston Symphony Orchestra's seat sale opens this morning

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Buffalo next Tuesday night, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music hall. The seat sale opens this morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

In many respects the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most notable event in the subscription series, for it brings to Buffalo the complete orchestra, the greatest symphonic organization in America and one of the greatest in the world.

Leaving Boston next Sunday night the orchestra will start its midwinter tour, giving the second concert of this tour in Buffalo. Dr. Muck will conduct. From Buffalo the orchestra will go to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities farther west.

Jou

JAN 20 1917

ess: Syracuse, N. Y.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eagerly expected concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes next Monday evening at the Wieting. One of the largest and most brilliant audiences of the season will greet these "gentlemen from Boston," as the New York critics are fond of calling the orchestra. The orchestra is leaving Boston to-morrow (Sunday) night, arriving here Monday morning. It will spend the night here and the next day go on to Buffalo for its concert on Tuesday night. As is the custom on all its tours the orchestra is bringing its entire personnel and there will be 108 in the party, which arrives by special train. This includes the musicians, Dr. Muck and the members of the administrative staff. The orchestra was last heard here in January, 1914, and Syracuse is getting its concert this year in the regular order for the schedule of the orchestra calls for a visit to this city once every three years. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged is decidedly a tribute to the musical perception of this city. At the particular request of a great many of the musicians here he is including the First Symphony of Brahms, that in C minor, which Hans von Buelow once called 'The Tenth Symphony," as though it were (as it is) the true successor to the immortal nine of Beethoven. It is quite the greatest contribution to symphonic literature since Beethoven wrote his Ninth Symphony, and has won its way into the esteem of musicians as one of the immortal master works of the world.

COURIER

ss Buffalo, N. Y.

The third in the series of subscription concerts under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith will beg vine in the Elmwood Music hall on Tuesday evening of this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the twelfth consecutive season that Boston's great orchestra has been an annual visitor to this city. It has appeared in that time under three conductors, Gericke once, Fiedler four times, and this is Dr. Muck's seventh visit. Thus largely due to the enterprise of Mrs. Smith Buffalo is enabled each year to keep in touch with the best that music offers in this country.

The programme is one which should give great pleasure to the patrons of the concerts. It comprises the first Symphony in E minor of the Finnish composer, Sibelius; Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Brahams's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Weber's "Oberon" Overture.

